[1] It appears from the evidence that in the year 1897 the decedent resided with her husband, Giacomo Gallo, in the city of Stockton. They had but one child, John Gallo, one of the contestants, who was then of the age of about 10 years. July 24, 1897, they took into their home Esta F. Badua, now Esta F. Galbraith, the other contestant, who was then a babe in arms. Esta was treated in all respects as their own child, the fact that she was not such being concealed from her, and in 1907 she was legally adopted by them. At all times up to her death Mrs. Gallo manifested the greatest affection for Esta, and a motherly pride in her accomplishments. January 19, 1911, Giacomo Gallo died. Prior to his death he conveyed all of his property to his wife. He and a Mr. Bardoni were partners in the saloon business, and after his death contestant John Gallo took his father's place in the management of the saloon, and Mrs. Gallo later acquired Bardoni's interest therein. John continued in the management of the saloon until October, 1917, when his mother commenced an action against him for possession of the saloon, alleging that he claimed to be the owner thereof; that he refused to account to her for the proceeds of the business, and threatened her life if she attempted to eject him. She recovered judgment against him, and John thereafter had nothing to do with her business or the management of her affairs, but engaged in business for himself in Stockton. He was married, and lived with his wife in his own home.

Dario Panini occupied a room in the Gallo home from June, 1909, to the time of Mrs. Gallo's death. He began taking his meals there some time prior to her husband's death, and continued to do so at all times thereafter. His laundry was sent out with that of Mrs. Gallo, and he seems to have been treated as would be a member of the family. He was a barkeeper at the saloon at all times after 1911, having been employed by John. When John was ousted Panini succeeded him as manager, and continued as such at all times thereafter. Under her direction he paid all bills, including grocery, household, and all other bills. She paid him wages. She was paying him "wages at the time of her death, and right along." After the advent of prohibition he conducted a soft drink place for her, and received half of the profits. During the last 18 months of her life she was ill more or less. Her brother, Peter Foppiano, who with his young daughter lived at Mrs. Gallo's home, seems generally to have taken care of her during such illnesses, though Panini sometimes took care of her, and sat up with her at night "more than once." Panini testified that "during most all of that 18 months there was not a single night that Mrs. Gallo was home that there was a woman in the house with her all night." While she was in the hospital, Panini visited her twice a day. He acted as her agent in the sale of her lease of the saloon building. He had the keys of her safe when she died. The jury would have been warranted in finding that the relations between Mrs. Gallo and Panini were confidential.

Rose Bacigalupi and Lena Ciari are surviving sisters of the decedent, both residing in Stockton. They manifested a sisterly interest in the care of Mrs. Gallo during her illness, visiting her frequently, and administering to her wants. Louis Bacigalupi, the executor, is the husband of the former sister, and Peter Ciari, a subscribing witness to the will, is the husband of the latter. The mother, a third sister, and four brothers survived the decedent. Her mother was a widow, residing in Stockton, and in needy circumstances. The third sister was a widow, dependent upon her children for support.

Esta was married May 5, 1917, and she thereafter resided with her husband in Stockton until some time in 1918, when they went to San Francisco, where they thereafter resided. They seem not to have been in affluent circumstances, both being in employment, and living in a small flat. During her childhood Esta was sent to grammar school, and later to high school. John and his father purchased and gave Esta a piano. Mrs. Gallo knew at all times that the piano belonged to Esta, and after the latter's marriage recognized Esta's right to take the piano whenever she chose, though it was left with Mrs. Gallo because Esta did not have room for it in her flat. Esta was given musical instruction, and Mrs. Gallo took pride in her daughter's ability to play the piano. Both before and after Esta's marriage Mrs. Gallo was accustomed to calling her "my baby," and at all times both displayed a great affection for each other, frequently visiting each other after Esta's marriage. While residing in San Francisco, Esta wrote Mrs. Gallo regularly three times a week, and frequently called her up by long distance telephone. At one time Mrs. Gallo arranged to pay for such calls, because she thought the expense was too great for Esta to pay. For many years Mrs. Gallo was in the habit of talking with her acquaintances about the good qualities of her children, especially Esta, and telling such persons that John and Esta would receive all of her property at her death. A large number of these acquaintances testified at the trial. Their testimony shows a steadfast purpose on the part of Mrs. Gallo to give her property to her children. During 1920 Mrs. Gallo was in a hospital from February 26th to March 19th, from April 19th to April 24th, and from July 10th to July 31st. She died August 27, 1920. Shortly before she was first taken to the hospital she said she had her property "all fixed up for my baby and my boy Johnnie." April 18th, the day before the will in suit was executed, she told one of the witnesses, in the presence of Panini, that she had made a will "leaving equal shares of her estate; that she thought it was the only right way to do." Frequently thereafter and up to within a few days of her death, she stated that she had willed her property to her children. The foregoing testimony was given by so many apparently disinterested witnesses that the truth thereof cannot well be doubted, even if the rule governing the disposition of motions for nonsuits did not require that full credence be given thereto. Mrs. Gallo's affection for Esta continued to the very last. The night before her death she said that "she was going to take a trip to Los Angeles and on her way back she was going to go and see her baby Esta in San Francisco."

The testimony shows that, after the termination of Mrs. Gallo's litigation with her son, their relations were friendly. He visited her on an average of once a week. She offered to assist him in his business. She gave him "jellies, mushrooms, or anything she had cooked" to take home. In 1918, in conversation with a man who had been a witness for John at the trial of the case brought against him by Mrs. Gallo, she said that "she didn't have anything against Johnnie, but against the daughter-in-law, Nellie, and (in suing him) she was doing it to protect Johnnie." John's wife died December 31, 1919. In July, 1918, she said to her son:

"If you want to go in any kind of business, why come down, if I can help you, because it was your money. You are entitled to it. You made it." On this appeal it must be assumed that there was no estrangement existing at the time the will was executed.

The persons to whom the decedent's property was given by the will and the inventory values thereof are as follows: John Gallo, 160 acres of land, $12,000; Esta Galbraith, $10 and piano, $100; Lena Ciari, victrola, $75; Rose Bacigalupi, trunk, linens, and diamonds, $864; Dario Panini, residue of estate, $30,871.88. That the will is unnatural and unjust in giving the bulk of the estate to Panini, is apparent. Esta was the owner of the piano, and hence received but $10 under the will. It is most unnatural for a woman, without cause, to disinherit a daughter for whom she had entertained the greatest affection to the very last in favor of one to whom she owed no duty or obligation. The fact that Esta is an adopted daughter, rather than of the decedent's own blood, is not material, because it must be assumed that the decedent acted in good faith when, in the adoption proceeding, she agreed to treat Esta in all respects as her own lawful child should be treated. Civ. Code, § 226. After adoption the two sustained towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, and had all the rights and were subject to all the duties of that relation. Civ. Code, § 228.

At the time of the preparation and execution of the will the decedent was surrounded by those who benefit by its provisions, and the son and daughter had no knowledge of the serious illness from which their mother was suffering. Mrs. Gallo was taken to the hospital February 26, 1920, and it appears that an operation was performed the next day, by which a large number of gallstones were removed. Panini testified: "Dr. Craviotto examined her, and then he came out and he says, exactly like that, 'Best somebody tell her to fix up her will,' or something about, before she go operation, on table. That was the first operation, in February. * * * I sent for Mr. Jeffry at that time. I went and told him Mrs. Gallo wanted to see him. * * * Mrs. Bacigalupi did not tell me to go and tell Mr. Jeffry that. Dr. Craviotto told me at that time it was a very tough matter. * * * He come out and says, * * * 'The operation is awful dangerous.'" It does not appear that Panini had any conversation with Mrs. Gallo about making a will, or that she directed him to call Jeffry. Jeffry went to the hospital on that day, but it does not appear what, if anything, was then done relative to Mrs. Gallo's affairs. With full knowledge of the dangerous operation Mrs. Gallo was to undergo, none of the beneficiaries under the will notified John of the fact, but he was informed of his mother's condition, after 7 o'clock in the evening of the day she was taken to the hospital, by a Mrs. Gianelli, and he immediately drove out to see his mother.

Mrs. Gallo returned to her home March 19th, and was up and about for a month. In the forenoon of April 19th she became violently ill again. One witness, F. J. (Joe) Green, testified that Mrs. Gallo was in such agony that "she hollered to me, 'Oh, my God, Joe, what will I do, what will I do!' and she was just about * * * to tear the night gown off of her; * * * tore it right off at the shoulder." Peter Foppiano telephoned to Jeffry that Mrs. Gallo wanted to see him. Jeffry went to her home, and evidently had a consultation with her. He then left the house, and presumably prepared the draft of the will in question, the same being typewritten. Mrs. Bacigalupi testified that, in the forenoon of that day, Mrs. Gallo "was sick, too sick to talk of anything. In the afternoon we took her out to St. Joseph's Home; so I think nobody can make a conversation when they are so sick to be taken out to St. Joseph's Home; I don't think so, myself. She certainly felt very much better after she got to St. Joseph's Home." This answer was given in reply to a question as to what she and her sister talked about at Mrs. Gallo's home on the 19th. John testified that, after learning of his mother's illness on the 20th of April, he went to the hospital, arriving there after 7 o'clock in the evening, and that his mother then had a high fever, and "was lying there, groaning." The will was executed at the hospital. Mrs. Bacigalupi testified that she saw her sister sign a paper there, but she did not know whether it was a will, and that Peter Ciari and Mr. Jeffry, the subscribing witnesses, signed it. Again John was not notified of his mother's illness, but learned the next day, from some one not a member of the family, that his mother was in the hospital. Mrs. Gallo returned home on the 24th of April, and seems to have suffered no further violent illness until July 10th, when she was again taken to the hospital, where she remained until July 31. During that time a second operation was performed.

About 8 o'clock in the morning on August 26th she became very ill, and apparently gave up hope of recovery. She said to Mrs. Bacigalupi: "Don't leave me alone. * * * I am going to die." She died the next morning at 20 minutes to 7 o'clock. In the presence of Mrs. Gallo's approaching death no word was sent by any of the beneficiaries to either of the children, though John was in Stockton. Mrs. Gianelli testified that between 5 and 6 o'clock in the evening of the 26th Mrs. Bacigalupi "came to my house and said that her sister was dying, * * * and that she knew she was going to die. And I then asked her if she had notified the children; if John, or John Gallo knew. She said 'No;' that he didn't know it; that she didn't want him, because he would send for the sister in the city, if he knew the mother was dying, and that they didn't want her." Mrs. Bacigalupi denied having made the statement, but on motion for a nonsuit Mrs. Gianelli's testimony was entitled to full credit. Mrs. Bacigalupi testified that she did not notify Esta of her mother's condition, and explained: "I didn't know her address, and I didn't send no message to her." She did not testify that she made any effort to learn Esta's address. It is apparent that she would have had no difficulty in ascertaining such address if she had endeavored to do so.

Mrs. Gianelli testified that Mrs. Gallo "seemed to be frightened about going to have an operation. * * * She thought she was going to die. * * * She was sick, and very miserable, nervous; had headaches, and seemed as though she was sick all over. * * * She was * * * very, very sallow at that time. * * * She was sick in general, all over, especially her head. With reference to her head, she just said she had awful headaches. * * * She would lay down her glasses, or something—her purse or something. * * * Then she would have to look for it. She would then say: 'I think I am going crazy.' * * * The latter part of 1919 she used to say that she would get those periodical spells; she was at one time better; then, again, she would get worse with those pains that she had, and the gallstones; and the doctor told her she would suffer headaches, and that seemed to be periodical. * * * She almost incessantly spoke of being ill." Eugene B. Podesta testified that after Mrs. Gallo returned from the hospital the second time she "said she almost died." Clarence A. Garrett testified that in 1918 Mrs. Gallo said "If she didn't get a change and the people would leave her alone, she was losing her mind. She couldn't remember nothing. She had to get away from them. I told her * * * to forget it; that she was a young woman yet; to get away from it. She said she couldn't; that it kept preying on her mind all the time. * * * She said the only trouble she ever had between her and her son was other people interfering. * * * I saw her crying or nervous more than once. * * * She said she was losing her mind on account of people preying on her."

F. J. Green testified that "shortly before the first operation" Mrs. Gallo said that "the way she felt, she was going to be pretty sick; liable to die. * * * She was worried about her money matters. Ever since her place was out of business, seemed to worry her." Mrs. Molini testified that two or three weeks before her death Mrs. Gallo said that "somebody was talking about her children, and she told me that she didn't like anybody to talk about her children. If there was any talking to do, she would do that herself." John Gallo testified that when he visited her the evening of April 20th "she talked fair. I says: 'Awful funny you come out to the hospital and don't let one know;' and she says: 'I told them to tell you.' I says: 'Who?' And she says: 'Lolly and Panini.' * * * Lolly is her brother, my uncle, Peter Foppiano. * * * Peter Foppiano or Mr. Panini had not given me any information that she was ill or at the hospital, no time. When I told her they had not let me know, she says: 'Kind of funny; I told them.' I says: 'Maybe they didn't want me to know; maybe they got things fixed up to suit themselves.' * * * She said: 'If I get better this time, nobody will get my money. I am going to have my dear friends—' I says: 'There is no one looking for your money, that I know of, unless it is your dear friends.' And she says: 'Well, I think so too.' * * * She said she had pains; the pains were choking her—suffocating her. She was kind of throwing herself back. * * * The next day she said they didn't feed her much. * * * She complained about not getting enough to eat. And I saw a tray setting there. She didn't eat but part of what was on the tray." He said that when Panini was present in his mother's home she "just looked to be so scared and nervous—shaking like."

Mrs. Eberhardt testified that she observed Mrs. Gallo's manner during the years 1919 and 1920, and that "at times I really thought that she sometimes did not really know what she was talking about. * * * At times I thought she used to act very excitable;" that before the first operation "she made the remark that she was bothered." Of the many witnesses examined by contestants, none expressed an opinion as to the mental sanity of decedent. Mrs. Bacigalupi testified that her sister was of sound mind. She admitted that once or twice before Esta's marriage she referred to Esta, in Mrs. Gallo's presence, as the "queen," and said "she had a good home and didn't appreciate it." John Gallo testified: "I first learned that my mother had made a will the morning she died, about 10 minutes after having taken her out of the house. Mrs. Bacigalupi, Pete Foppiano, and Panini were present, and there was some other gentlemen. * * * They were talking together. Mrs. Bacigalupi said the will was made; if the 'queen' knew what she was going to get, she couldn't buy very much with it." Mrs. Bacigalupi testified that she did not make such statement, and that "my first information that my sister had left a will came when I seen it in the paper." She and Panini both testified that they never talked with Mrs. Gallo about making a will or suggested to her the manner in which she should dispose of her property.

From the evidence as a whole it may fairly be inferred that Mrs. Gallo was unable to read or write, except that she was able to write her name. The will declares that the testatrix thereby revokes and annuls "all former wills and codicils by me made." Other than this provision of the will the evidence is silent as to whether she had made a prior will. Her declarations, made prior to April 19th, to the effect that she had made a will, of course, are not competent evidence of the fact so stated. Mr. Ashley, attorney for contestants, was attorney for Mrs. Gallo in her suit against her son. Both before and after April 19th, she stated that her will was in his possession. Her apparent confidence thus manifested in the attorney who had successfully conducted her litigation in the past suggests the query whether the selection of another attorney to draw her will was her own act. These facts are entitled to consideration in connection with other circumstances, in determining the issue of undue influence.

> "In determining whether or not in a proceeding to contest a will, the evidence produced by the contestants is sufficient to require the submission of the case to the jury the same rules apply as in civil cases. Every favorable inference fairly deducible and every favorable presumption fairly arising from the evidence produced must be considered as facts proved in favor of the contestants. Where evidence is fairly susceptible of two constructions, or if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, the court must take the view most favorable to the contestants. All the evidence in favor of the contestants must be taken as true, and if contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded. If there is any substantial evidence tending to prove in favor of the contestants all the facts necessary to make out their case, they are entitled to have the case go to the jury for a verdict on the merits." Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 586, 82 Pac. 252, 253; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532; In re Ross, 173 Cal. 178, 159 Pac. 603; Estate of Campbell, 46 Cal. App. 612, 189 Pac. 812.

Applying the foregoing rules, it sufficiently appears from the evidence: (1) That at the time Mrs. Gallo presumably gave directions for the preparation of the will, and at the time she signed it, she was troubled in mind, weakened in body, and suffering greatly from a serious illness; (2) that the will is very unnatural and unjust; (3) that Panini selected the attorney who drew the will, knowing that such attorney was not the one who had theretofore attended to Mrs. Gallo's legal affairs; (4) that Mrs. Bacigalupi, charged with undue influence, entertained a settled dislike for Esta; (5) that the testatrix was surrounded exclusively by those who benefit by the terms of the will; (6) that the beneficiaries thereunder designedly refrained from notifying the son and daughter of their mother's dangerous illness, at times when the presence of the children would naturally have tended to frustrate any purpose the beneficiaries may have had to influence the testatrix in the disposition of her property. The evidence must be weighed in the light of the fact that the circumstances surrounding the immediate execution of the will were within the exclusive knowledge of those interested in upholding it while the opportunity of acquiring such knowledge was withheld from contestants. The latter were under the necessity of calling the defendants as witnesses to prove the circumstances attending the execution of the instrument. The unfortunate situation of contestants cannot dispense with proof of their case, but "evidence is to be estimated not only by its own intrinsic weight, but also according to the evidence which it is in the power of one side to produce and of the other to contradict." Code Civ. Proc. § 2061.

[8, 9] The law is settled beyond controversy in this state that a will cannot be set aside on the mere ground that it is unjust or unnatural. Estate of Wall, 187 Cal. 50, 200 Pac. 929; Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 168 Pac. 561; Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 151 Pac. 138; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 Pac. 915. Such facts, however, have weight in determining whether a testator was mentally competent at the time of executing a will (Estate of Martin, 170 Cal. 657, 151 Pac. 138; In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 49 Pac. 172, 711; Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 Pac. 504, or was acting under undue influence (Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 301, 107 Pac. 598). The weight to be given such evidence depends upon how far the provisions of the will depart from what would be natural. As bearing upon the importance which courts have given to unnatural provisions in wills, it may be noted that in some states, where a testator has left his property to strangers in blood, to the exclusion of his wife or children with whom he had lived on apparently friendly terms, evidence of such facts has been held sufficient to shift the burden of proof and to require the proponents of the will to show "that it was the free and deliberate offspring of a rational, self-poised, and clearly disposing mind." 1 Redfield on Wills, p. 537; Schouler on Wills, Executors and Administrators (5th Ed.) § 77; Mullen v. McKeon, 25 R. I. 305, 55 Atl. 747; Lancaster v. Alden, 26 R. I. 170, 58 Atl. 638; Gay v. Gillilan, 92 Mo. 251, 5 S. W. 7, 1 Am. St. Rep. 712; Weston v. Hanson, 212 Mo. 248, 111 S. W. 44; Harrel v. Harrel, 1 Duv. (62 Ky.) 203; Johnson v. Shaver, 41 S. D. 585, 172 N. W. 676.

overturn it, but, when such beneficiary "has actually participated in procuring the execution of the will, the burden is on him to show that the will was not induced by coercion or fraud." Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 381, 384, 168 Pac. 561; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 536, 119 Pac. 915; Estate of Packer, 164 Cal. 525, 129 Pac. 778. The fact that the will attempts to dispose of the piano which belonged to Mrs. Galbraith, whose ownership Mrs. Gallo knew and recognized, is entitled to some consideration, however slight, as tending to show that the will was the product of a mind other than her own. "Such fact would make the will more unnatural, and although it would not prove undue influence, it would be a proper circumstance to be considered in connection with other facts tending to prove such influence." In re Ruffino, 116 Cal. 304, 317, 48 Pac. 127, 130. The circumstances attending the execution of a will by a testator who is dangerously ill and expecting to die, at a time when he is surrounded exclusively by those who benefit by it, are subject to close scrutiny. Goble v. Grant, 3 N. J. Eq. 629; In re Knight's Will, 87 Misc. Rep. 577, 150 N. Y. Supp. 137. In addition to the foregoing, the successful efforts of the beneficiaries to keep the son and daughter out of their mother's presence at times vital to the defendant's purpose, as alleged in the petition, are entitled to weight. In building up a case on circumstantial evidence, it is not necessary that any single fact proved, standing alone, shall establish the issue, but it is sufficient if all the facts and circumstances given in evidence, considered together, lead to a rational inference that the ultimate fact is as alleged. Of course, it is not intended to intimate that the weight of the evidence is on the side of one party or the other, but it is held that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the issue of undue influence.

[15-20] Many rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence are assigned as errors. In several instances the testimony ruled out was later admitted. Of the more than 300 exceptions noted a comparatively small number have merit. In view of the fact that contestants were compelled to make out their case on circumstantial evidence, together with the testimony of defendants, they were entitled to as great latitude as the rules of evidence will permit. Panini testified that he was born in Italy December 26, 1875. The court struck out this testimony as immaterial. Since Panini was charged with undue influence, in determining the probability of such having been exercised and the probable effect thereof upon Mrs. Gallo, the nationality of both and their relative ages were material. Without considering all of appellants' contentions specifically, it may be said generally that contestants had the right to show that the property of decedent had been accumulated in part by the efforts of the son, because such evidence would tend to prove that the will was the more unnatural (In re Wilson, 117 Cal. 262, 280, 49 Pac. 172, 711); that the children owned little or no property, because it would be more unnatural for a parent to disinherit a son or daughter, having limited means of support than one who was in affluent circumstances; that any of the beneficiaries had attempted to prejudice the testator's mind against either contestant; that such beneficiaries, having Mrs. Gallo in their charge at times of her dangerous illnesses, did not notify the son and daughter thereof. While Louis Bacigalupi was on the witness stand he was asked whether, on the 19th day of April, 1920, his wife, Rose Bacigalupi, said to him: "You hurry up and go and make Annie's will. She wants to make a will." The court sustained defendants' objection to the question on the ground that no foundation had been laid, in that Mrs. Bacigalupi had not been asked while on the stand whether she had made such statement. The court seems inadvertently to have overlooked the fact that the question was not asked for purposes of impeachment, but to show the activity of Mrs. Bacigalupi in trying to procure the execution of a will by decedent. Such activity would be a circumstance to be considered on the issue of undue influence.

[21] While the declarations of the testator were admissible to show her feelings and desires with respect to her children, and as bearing upon her state of mind, the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury on the issue of undue influence is not based upon the assumption that such declarations as to any past event are competent proof of such event.

CARLETON v. BONHAM et al. (Civ. 4081.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 8, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1058(1)—Sustaining objection not prejudicial where matter objected to immediately afterward admitted.

Where an objection to testimony is sustained, but no motion to strike out is made, and the matter objected to is immediately afterwards brought out without objection, no prejudice results from the fact that the objection was sustained in the first instance.

2. Appeal and error 🔑237(2), 692(1)—Exclusion of evidence not prejudicial error in absence of motion to strike, record not showing what answer would have been.

In a suit to set aside certain deeds, exclusion of evidence was not reversible error where no motion to strike out the incomplete answer was made, and the record did not show what the answer would have been if the witness had been permitted to finish it.

3. Witnesses 🔑240(2) — Leading questions within discretion of court.

It is within the discretion of the trial court to permit leading questions.

4. Evidence 🔑471(14) — Question as to whether grantor appeared to be a mentally keen woman, calling for appearance, held proper.

In a suit to set aside certain deeds on the ground of undue influence, a question whether in all her business transactions at the bank grantor appeared to be keen mentally, and a business woman, was proper as calling for appearances, and not for a state of facts.

5. Appeal and error 🔑1053(1)—Striking evidence held to cure error, if any, in its admission.

Striking a statement objected to from the record held to cure the error in its admission, if any.

6. Witnesses 🔑206—Communications by client to attorney in presence of third person not "privileged communications."

Communications made by a client to his attorney in the presence of third persons are not privileged within Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, subd. 2.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Privileged Communication.]

7. Deeds 🔑203—Evidence as to grantee's relationship and position in household of grantor held admissible on question of undue influence.

In a suit to set aside deeds made by a mother to her daughter on the ground of undue influence, it was not error to admit evidence by the daughter as to what work she did during the early years of her life at home with her mother; the relationship and position of the daughter in the household of her mother being material, relevant, and competent.

8. Witnesses 🔑167—Evidence as to value of property concerned held not inadmissible under statute.

In a suit to set aside a deed from a mother to her daughter on the ground of undue influence, evidence as to a conversation between grantor and grantee concerning some furniture, and of a statement by the grantee regarding the value of the amount of her share of the income property, was not inadmissible as in violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, disqualifying certain persons from testifying as to matters occurring before death of a decedent; such section being inapplicable.

9. Deeds 🔑203—Evidence as to joint bank account between grantor and grantee held admissible as showing relationship.

In a suit to set aside a deed from a mother to her daughter on the ground of undue influence, evidence by the daughter that her husband gave her some checks which were later deposited in the joint bank account of the mother and daughter was not inadmissible, it having a direct tendency to show the business dealings and relationship existing between the mother and daughter as to the joint banking account.

10. Witnesses 🔑388(2)—Impeaching question without foundation laid improper.

Where no proper foundation for an impeaching question has been laid, an objection thereto is properly sustained.

11. Deeds 🔑72(1)—"Undue influence" sufficient to avoid deed defined.

Undue influence in the execution of a deed must arise from a confidence reposed by the grantor in the grantee, with the added feeling on the part of the grantor that the grantee has some power or authority over him, and it must appear that such power or authority was used by the grantee on the will of the grantor for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage of his weakness of mind or body, or of his necessities or his distress, and that such feeling of power and authority on the part of the grantor was actually present and operating upon his mind with such pressure as to overpower the mind and overcome the volition of the grantor at the very time the deed was executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Undue Influence.]

12. Gifts 🔑47(3)—Burden on grantee in gift deed to show that it was voluntarily made.

In a suit to set aside a deed by a mother to her daughter, where it appeared that the mother lived in the household of the daughter, that she was aged and feeble in body, and that opportunity for undue influence existed, the burden was upon the grantee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with perfect understanding of its effect.

13. Deeds 🔑211(4)—Finding that undue influence had not been exercised sustained.

In a suit to set aside certain deeds made by a mother to her children, wherein it appeared that the mother was aged and feeble in body, and that an opportunity for undue influence existed, evidence held to sustain a finding that undue influence had not in fact been exercised.

14. Appeal and error ⚷1011(1)—Fact findings of court on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where fact findings by the trial court are based on conflicting evidence, they will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Melville B. Carleton against Anna Bonham and others, to set aside certain deeds. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Allen, of Santa Ana, and J. W. Hocker, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. C. Verge and O. V. Willson, both of Los Angeles, and C. L. Brown and Joseph F. Seymour, both of El Centro, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In this action Melville B. Carleton sued his sister, Anna Bonham, and her husband, Lyman L. Bonham, and his sister's five children and his own daughter, Ruth Melrose Carleton, for the purpose of having set aside and canceled certain deeds made in favor of the several defendants by the mother of the plaintiff and his said sister. The plaintiff charges the defendants with having obtained the deeds by means of fraud and undue influence exerted and practiced by them upon the mother at a time when she was sick and incapable of transacting any business. The court found against plaintiff on all the material issues of the complaint, and directed judgment in favor of the defendants, from which judgment plaintiff appeals.

It appears that the mother, Lydia E. Hildreth, was a widow of the age of 72 years at the time the deeds which are sought to be canceled were executed; that she was an invalid, and had suffered greatly for many months prior to her death; that she was possessed of considerable property, located in the city of Brawley, Cal., worth approximately $25,000, and that she had lived for several years with her daughter, Mrs. Bonham, and her husband and children. Mrs. Hildreth died on the 15th day of December, 1920. On October 18, 1919, in consideration of "labor performed" by Lyman L. Bonham, Mrs. Hildreth deeded to him one of the pieces of property which is the subject of one of the attacks by plaintiff herein. On October 30th of the same year Mrs. Hildreth made her will, by which she devised all the other pieces of property, and her devisees under that will were the same as the grantees in the several deeds which are the subject-matter of this suit—the only difference between her will and her deeds being that in the will she devised one particular lot, together with its improvements, etc., to the plaintiff and Mrs. Bonham in equal shares, while in the deed she granted that particular lot to the defendant Anna Bonham alone. That piece of property is estimated to be worth $8,500. There is another difference between the will and the deeds, which is that, where by the will a particular lot was devised to one of the children of Mrs. Bonham and another lot to another of her children, by the deeds these children exchanged places as to those particular lots. All these deeds were executed on the 29th day of December, 1919. All the property owned by Mrs. Hildreth was located in Brawley, with the exception of an equity in certain property in Orange county, which equity she deeded to plaintiff. That equity was worth about $640. She also deeded to plaintiff one of the lots in Brawley, the value of which was estimated to be about $1,000. There were 11 different pieces of real property, and Mrs. Hildreth made a separate deed for each piece. The income property was granted by these several deeds to Mrs. Bonham and to one or more of her children. Some of the unproductive property was granted to some of the other children of Mrs. Bonham, and some of it was granted to Mr. Carleton and to his daughter, Ruth Melrose Carleton. The deeds, with the exception of the one conveying the Orange county property to plaintiff, were all recorded on the 31st day of December, 1919; but the plaintiff first learned of the execution and recording of the several deeds to which he takes exception on January 17, 1920, at a time when his mother was very ill.

In December, 1919, which was perhaps a month or six weeks after the will was drawn, Mrs. Hildreth, who for about two months before that time had been living in a cottage with a colored woman named Mrs. Smith, who was a janitress, and who looked after Mrs. Hildreth at night and prepared some of her meals for her, went to live with her daughter, Mrs. Bonham, in one of Mrs. Hildreth's houses in Brawley. Mrs. Hildreth was on friendly terms with the plaintiff, who lived in Los Angeles, and during the last few months of Mrs. Hildreth's life she visited her son in Los Angeles, and he visited his mother at Brawley on one or two occasions. Mrs. Hildreth and Mrs. Bonham had joint checking accounts in two different banks at Brawley, and Mrs. Bonham had an individual checking account.

[1] 1. Appellant has specified many particulars by which he contends that the court committed prejudicial error as to his rights. His first specification of error is that the court erred in excluding the testimony of the witness Mamie Smith, as follows:

"Q. How was—tell the court her condition at that time. A. When I went in she was so bad off she asked me, 'Where is Mel?'

"Mr. Brown: Now we object to what was said.
"The Court: Sustained."

Immediately following the order of the court sustaining the objection, the following occurred:

"Q. Was Mrs. Bonham present? A. She let me in; she told me to go in.
"Q. Was she there when her mother asked you where Mel was? A. Yes, sir; and I turned to Mrs. Bonham, and said, 'Why don't you write to him and tell him?'
"Q. What did her mother say about that? A. She asked me to go tell Mel that she wanted him."

It will be noted that, although the objection was sustained, no motion was made to strike out. Furthermore, that the same matter to which objection was made came in immediately afterward without objection; consequently appellant could not have been prejudicially affected by the fact that the objection was sustained in the first instance.

[2] 2. The second specification of error is that the court erred in excluding the testimon of Mrs. Ida Burger, as follows:

"A. When the little girl came to me, she (Mrs. Hildreth) was wringing her hands and screaming and crying and going on because she was all alone, and didn't have any place to die in where she could have peace and comfort. She said, 'Ada, I have done for every one—
"Mr. Brown: Object to that.
"The Court: Any statements she made can't be competent."

From an examination of the transcript it appears that the question which brought out the matter to which counsel refers was put to the witness by one of the attorneys for defendants, and that the objection to the answer was not made by either of the attorneys for plaintiff, but was made by another of the attorneys for defendants. Moreover, there was no motion by any of the attorneys to strike out, and the record is silent regarding any effort to show what the witness would have testified to had she been permitted to finish her answer. Certainly no prejudicial error may be predicated on such a record.

3. The third specification of error relates to the overruling of an objection to a question asked by one of the attorneys for defendants of a witness who was a bank clerk in one of the banks where Mrs. Hildreth had her joint checking account with Mrs. Bonham, and with which clerk Mrs. Hildreth generally transacted her banking business—the record showing as follows:

"Q. I'll ask you whether in all her business transactions at the bank she appeared to be keen mentally and a business woman.
"Mr. Allen: Objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial; no foundation laid, and directly leading; calling for a conclusion.
"The Court: Overruled.
"A. She did."

Counsel argues that—

"Neither the question nor the answer thereto referred to any period of time, and therefore incompetent, and as to whether or not she was a business woman, is both irrelevant and immaterial. The question clearly calls for a conclusion and is leading."

[3, 4] The transcript of the testimony fairly shows that the time referred to was, at most, not more than a year before the death of Lydia E. Hildreth. While the question was somewhat leading, it was clearly within the discretion of the court whether or not to permit it to be answered. Besides, the question merely called for appearances—not for a state of facts. That such a question is proper, see Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 636, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231; Robinson v. Exempt Fire Co., 103 Cal. 5, 36 Pac. 955, 24 L. R. A. 715, 42 Am. St. Rep. 93; In re Wax, 106 Cal. 350, 39 Pac. 624; People v. Manoogian, 141 Cal. 596, 75 Pac. 177; People v. Wong Loung, 159 Cal. 533, 114 Pac. 829.

4. Specification of error No. 4 has to do with the refusal of the court to grant plaintiff's motion to strike out all the testimony given by witness Wilson, because of the fact that the relation of attorney and client existed between him and Mrs. Hildreth. The particular statement made by the witness, to which objection is made, is as follows:

"Mrs. Hildreth called me to her residence, Mrs. Bonham's place, and she was confined to her bed, and asked me to prepare these deeds."

The reporter's transcript on appeal shows, immediately after the foregoing statement, the following:

"Mr. Hocker (attorney for defendants): I move to strike out what Mrs. Hildreth said, if he referred to Mrs. Hildreth telling him to prepare the deeds, for the reason it is incompetent. Move to strike out any conversation or statement made by Mrs. Hildreth with reference to this transaction.
"The Court: I'll grant the motion."

[5] It would therefore appear that, as to that particular statement of the witness, and it being the only objectionable one pointed out by appellant, the error, if any, was cured by the court in granting appellant's motion to strike same from the record. But, assuming the rule to be contrary to what actually is the case, that it is the duty of this court to search the record to determine whether testimony other than that specifically referred to by appellant may possibly come within the specification of error, it still appears that counsel's position is untenable, as illustrated in the case entitled Estate of Nelson, 132 Cal. 187, 64 Pac. 296, where the court, in discussing a question similar to the one here involved, said:

"The proponents afterwards called as a witness Mr. Goad, who had drawn the codicil of October 20th, and, against the objection of the contestants that he was incompetent under section 1881, the court permitted him to testify concerning his interview and conversation with Nelson preparatory to drawing the codicil, and the instructions which he received from Nelson therefor. * * * The communication, as well as the relation between the attorney and his client, ceases to be confidential when it is clearly manifest that it is the intention of the client that the communication should be disclosed, if any occasion therefor should be presented. The consent of the client to such disclosure, which is provided for in section 1881, may be implied, as well as express, and by requesting his attorney to draw his will the client impliedly asks him to do and say whatever may at any time and place be requisite for the purpose of establishing the integrity of the will. Goad had prepared the codicil under the directions of the testator, and, by employing him as his attorney for this purpose, the testator had waived the protection of the statute, and released the attorney from the obligation of secrecy as fully as if the attorney had become a subscribing witness to the will. The client thereby makes the attorney the medium through whom the right which he seeks to create may be established." And see, also, In re Wax, 106 Cal. 348, 39 Pac. 624; Ruiz v. Dow, 113 Cal. 490, 45 Pac. 867; Estate of Dominici, 151 Cal. 181, 90 Pac. 448.

In addition thereto, the testimony given by Mr. Wilson shows that at times Mrs. Bonham was present during the conversations, the testimony referred to being as follows:

"Q. Whom did you talk with when you went to the residence? A. Mrs. Hildreth.

"Q. Was any one present? A. Mrs. Bonham was there.

"Q. She was there each time you were talking with her? A. I think she was.

"Q. And there at the time the deeds were signed? A. I don't know she was there at the time they were signed because she wasn't in the room very much as she was in the house."

[6] If the testimony may be construed to the effect that there was a third person present, there was nothing really confidential about the several conversations between Mr. Wilson and Mrs. Hildreth—the rule in such cases, which is so well understood as to require no citation, being that communications made by a client to an attorney in the presence of third persons are not privileged within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[7] 5. Specification of error No. 5 deals with an alleged error of the court in permitting Mrs. Bonham, one of the defendants, to testify, over the objection of plaintiff's attorney, as to what work she did during the early years of her life while she was living at home with her mother, the answer being that she lived on a ranch, and did nearly all the housework. In view of the fact that undue influence is one of the issues in this case, the relationship and the position of the daughter in the household of her mother was material, relevant, and competent, and it follows that there was no error committed by the court in admitting the testimony to which objection was made.

[8] 6. In specification of error No. 6 appellant asserts that a conversation between Mrs. Bonham and Mrs. Hildreth concerning some furniture, and in specification No. 7 a statement by Mrs. Bonham regarding the value of the amount of her share of the income property concerned herein—all of which was introduced into evidence by defendants and objected to by plaintiff—amounted to prejudicial error because it was in violation of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure; but an examination of that section will show that it has no application to a case of this kind.

[9] 7. By specification of error No. 8 it is claimed the court erred in admitting testimony given by Mrs. Bonham to the effect that her husband gave her some checks which the witness later testified were deposited in the joint bank account of Mrs. Hildreth and Mrs. Bonham. The objection that this testimony was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial was not well taken, as it had a direct tendency to show the business dealings and relationship existing between the mother and the daughter, especially as to the joint banking account.

[10] 8. Specification of error No. 9 relates to an alleged error by the court in sustaining an objection to a question calling for a conversation, but at the time the objection was made the proper foundation for the question, which was impeaching in its nature, had not been laid; hence the objection was properly sustained. However, as the proper foundation was immediately laid, the witness was permitted to answer the question without objection.

No evidence was introduced which tended to support the general allegation of fraud, and all the remaining specifications of error refer to findings on the issue of undue influence. It is contended that there is no sufficient evidence to support such findings, and that such findings are contrary to the evidence. Contained within the issue of undue influence is the question of the mental capacity of Mrs. Hildreth at the time of the execution of the deeds in question. While there is some testimony in the record to the effect that Mrs. Hildreth was failing in health, and was very weak both before and at the time of the execution of the deeds, and that she was not mentally competent, the evidence taken as a whole preponderates the other way—in fact, it is so satisfactory and convincing on that point that it would be extremely difficult to understand how the judge of the trial court could have reached any different conclusion than he did. It would appear that the finding in that regard is unassailable, and, if counsel's brief is to be taken as an indication of their views thereon, great reliance is not placed on that contention.

Dealing, then, with the remaining general specification of undue influence, the evidence received by the court, as given by three witnesses, was to the effect that about the 1st of September, 1919, which would be about four months before all the deeds but one were executed, Mrs. Hildreth was nervous, crying, and hysterical; that Mrs. Bonham was also crying, and the mother and daughter were quarreling over some bedroom furniture and a lot or some lots—Mrs. Bonham contending that, while Mrs. Hildreth had given the furniture, consisting of a dresser and a commode and a bedstead, to Mrs. Bonham some two years before that time, and Mrs. Bonham had had the use and possession of it during all the intervening period, Mrs. Hildreth at the time they were quarreling had already, in the absence of Mrs. Bonham, taken back the furniture, and then wished to make other disposition of it by dividing it between two of Mrs. Bonham's young daughters; and in regard to the lot Mrs. Bonham was insisting that Mrs. Hildreth deed that lot to Mr. Bonham, as she had theretofore agreed to do, in payment of labor which Mr. Bonham had performed for Mrs. Hildreth. There was also some testimony by one or two of the witnesses, in substance, that Mrs. Bonham had said that, if Mrs. Hildreth would not deed the lot as Mrs. Bonham wished, she would not take care of her mother any longer; also, by one witness, that the mother had said to the daughter, "Anna, I don't want to do that; I don't want to wrong Mel; I want to do the right thing by you both; I want to divide that between the two of you;" and that Mrs. Hildreth had also said, "Anna, do you think I am going to deed you all my stuff before I die? I am not going to deed any of the children anything until I get ready." The same witness further testified that Mrs. Bonham told her mother that she had agreed to deed the lot to Mel, and that she had also promised to deed it to Lyman (Mr. Bonham) for the work he had done. Another witness said he had heard Mrs. Bonham threaten to sue Mrs. Hildreth if Mrs. Hildreth did not deed a lot worth about $800 to Bonham.

It appears in evidence that the furniture was later returned to Mrs. Bonham, and that the lot was deeded to Mr. Bonham on October 18, 1919, for "labor performed," which would be approximately six weeks after the date of the quarrel between Mrs. Bonham and Mrs. Hildreth, as testified to by the several witnesses.

The only other direct evidence which tended to establish plaintiff's case on the issue of undue influence was certain testimony to the effect that during the last 3 or 4 months of Mrs. Hildreth's life the rents were collected by Mrs. Bonham, and that for a considerably longer period Mrs. Hildreth and Mrs. Bonham had joint checking accounts in two different banks at Brawley. Opportunity to exert undue influence was shown by the fact that at the time the deeds were drawn, and for perhaps 30 days prior thereto, Mrs. Hildreth, who was quite ill, was living in the same house with Mrs. Bonham, who was caring for Mrs. Hildreth during all that time.

With reference to the quarrel between the two women, Mrs. Bonham denied having made the exact statements which some of the witnesses testified she made, but said that she charged her mother with being an "Indian"—that is, that, after having made a gift, she would take it back—and that her mother cried because Mrs. Bonham had called her an Indian. Mrs. Bonham's testimony shows a long line of devotion to her mother and service in her behalf. She testified that up to the time she was 24 years of age she lived with her parents on a farm; that her mother was ill in bed during a considerable portion of the latter part of that time, and that the household duties fell upon Mrs. Bonham. She testified:

> That her mother "would probably get up about 9 o'clock in the morning and get around a little bit, and I farmed out with the men folks. I was kind of delicate, and I drove a team and done a lot of work like that outside, * * * and came in at night and helped to get dinner up and supper up and breakfast ready for the men in the morning, and then I would go out and work with a team and with a cultivator and rake. * * * I did the washing of her (Mrs. Hildreth's) bandages and rolled them for her, and we generally would have about one a day. I took them and washed them and ironed them and would roll those up and have them ready for her, and she would dress her limb when she would wake up about 9 o'clock."

Mrs. Bonham married when she was 24 years of age, and was away from home for 2 or 3 years, when she returned to take care of her father, who had become blind in the meantime, and also to care for her mother who was ill again. That continued for a little over a year. After the year 1913, and up to the time of her death, Mrs. Hildreth lived with Mrs. Bonham the greater part of the time. In 1916, and continuing for 3 years thereafter, Mrs. Bonham and Mrs. Hildreth ran a lodging house in Brawley. That is the property which, by the will, was to be divided between plaintiff and Mrs. Bonham, but which, by one of the deeds made on December 29th, was granted to Mrs. Bonham. The arrangement between Mrs. Hildreth and Mrs. Bonham was, according to Mrs. Bonham's testimony:

> "I was to have half of everything. I rented the rooms and houses and furnished them out of the rooming house and my own house to make the money to pay the debts."

Mrs. Bonham's testimony regarding the terms of her arrangement with her mother in connection with the management of the rooming house is corroborated by the testimony of the bank clerk, who testified that the "exact wording of this account" was as follows:

> "Lydia E. Hildreth, in trust for herself and Anna Bonham, joint owners, subject to the check of either, and balance at the death of either to belong to the survivor."

But Mrs. Bonham never received anything other than a few dollars for a pair of shoes, etc. The receipts averaged $350 per month, which was all turned over to Mrs. Hildreth and was used by her to pay for the lodging house and other properties. Mrs. Bonham did all the work, "sweeping, dusting, being night clerk and day clerk, mopping and polishing floors, putting down carpets and taking them up," general rooming house work, collecting rents for the rooms, and waiting on her mother, who was sick in bed most of the time. Mrs. Bonham also did the washing. Regarding the making of the deeds, Mrs. Bonham testified as follows:

> "Q. I'll ask you if you know how the deeds were to be made that were made, or who was going to get the property, prior to the time the deeds were executed? A. No, sir.
> "Q. When Mr. Wilson came there as notary public prior to the execution of the deeds, did you have any knowledge about how she was going to dispose of her property? A. No, sir. She just said she was going to deed them and have it over with; $1,000 would be charged, anyhow, for probating it, and she said she was through with her property.
> "Q. She was going to make deeds and settle it without probate? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. To save that expense? A. Yes, sir.
> "Q. I'll ask you, then, whether or not, so far as you know, that the deed she made on the 29th of December, 1919, was made in accordance with her will and wish and without any influence or duress or fraud or anything of that kind. A. Yes, sir."

With reference to the joint bank accounts, Mrs. Bonham testified that her husband's wages went into those accounts, and that she rented her own piano for a year, and later sold it for $100, and those receipts were also turned into the joint bank accounts; that receipts from sales of chickens and eggs which belonged to her personally went into her private bank account.

Mrs. O'Blenes, who for two years, between 1917 and 1919, lived "right across the alley" from Mrs. Bonham and Mrs. Hildreth, never saw either of them crying or heard them having any dispute over the furniture. G. R. Beasley, a son of Mrs. Bonham, never saw any difficulty between them, and never heard either his mother or his father try to influence Mrs. Hildreth with reference to the disposition of her property. The testimony of Mr. Wilson, attorney at law and notary public, who prepared the deeds and took the acknowledgment of Mrs. Hildreth's signature thereto, is significant. Prior to the time the deeds were drawn he had acted as Mrs. Hildreth's attorney in various matters covering a period of several years. In connection with the drawing of the deeds Mr. Wilson said:

> "The first time I went to see her it seems to me, as far as I can remember, I was there five or six times. There was some little matters about her rooming house which she and Mrs. Bonham had rented to some party, I forget the name now, and she asked me about that contract, and then she brought up the matter of making these deeds, and I told her to give me the description of the property and the parties to whom she wanted the deeds made, and I would look the matter up and prepare the deeds and when I got them prepared I would bring them around to her to sign."

Mr. Wilson prepared the deeds at Mrs. Hildreth's request, and she read them before they were signed. They were made and executed by her in accordance with her express will at that time. He neither saw nor heard any indications of any persons influencing Mrs. Hildreth in the execution or just prior to the execution of the deeds. The matter of giving the direction to draw the deeds, the actual delivery of them, and their execution covered a period of about two weeks. The description of the property covered in some of the deeds was not very good, and it was necessary to take time to write to Orange county to get the proper description. Mrs. Bonham was nursing Mrs. Hildreth at the time the deeds were signed, and she was in and out of the room. Mrs. Hildreth was in bed the first time that Mr. Wilson saw her in connection with drawing the deeds, which was about two weeks before the deeds were executed, and he saw her in connection with that matter five or six times. When the deeds were finally executed Mrs. Bonham came into the room and propped Mrs. Hildreth up in her bed. She did not sign the deeds immediately, but read them, and then signed them.

Counsel for appellant concede the rule of law in a case of this kind to be that the mere fact that a conveyance is made by a person to his child "does not render the deed presumptively invalid." In 17 Ann. Cas. at page 989, it is said:

> "The courts have universally held that no presumption of undue influence in the case of a conveyance inter vivos by a parent to a child arises from the mere relation of the parties, and that, therefore, the burden is upon the party attacking the conveyance to show undue influence"—citing many cases.

And it has been held that the circumstances of age and enfeebled condition, together with the added fact of an unequal division among the children of the property of the parent, and that the parent resided with the more fortunate child from a pecuniary standpoint—all of which facts fit this case to a nicety—are not sufficient to create a presumption of undue influence. Jones v. Thomas, 218 Mo. 508, 117 S. W. 1177. But the California cases, notably Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, Becker v. Schwerdtle, 6 Cal. App. 462, 92 Pac. 398, and Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 Pac. 289, are to the effect that, where great age and enfeebled condition in the parent, together with such a division of the parent's property among the children as would in itself suggest great partiality, are shown, the burden is upon the attacked donee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with full knowledge of the facts and a perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer.

[11] General influence, however strong, is not undue influence. The opportunity may be present and the grantee may suggest or advise or give good reasons, such as appeal to the affections or sentiments of gratitude for past services, or even argue with the grantor and thus persuade him to deed his property to him; and, in the absence of any showing or any presumption that the importunity was such that it could not be resisted by the grantor, and that the very act of the grantor in executing the deed was the result of force or coercion or something of that nature, which broke down his will or destroyed his free agency at the time the deed was executed, undue influence cannot be said to exist. Undue influence in the execution of a deed must arise from a confidence reposed by the grantor in the grantee, with the added feeling on the part of the grantor that the grantee has some power or authority over him; and it must appear that such power or authority was used by the grantee on the will of the grantor for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage of his weakness of mind or body, or of his necessities or his distress, and that such feeling of power and authority on the part of the grantor was actually present and operating upon his mind with such pressure as to overpower the mind and overcome the volition of the grantor at the very time the deed was executed.

There is nothing here that indicates with any clearness that Mrs. Hildreth was in the least affected by anything or by any act or conduct emanating from the daughter. True she returned the furniture to her daughter, but the furniture already belonged to her. True, she made a deed to Mr. Bonham of the lot regarding which the two women had their quarrel, but the evidence showed that she owed it to him for "labor performed," and that she was simply paying her debt in the manner in which she had theretofore agreed to pay it. The furniture was returned shortly after the quarrel, and the deed to Mr. Bonham was made within six weeks thereafter. The will was executed within two months, while all the other deeds were not executed until after the expiration of four months from the date of the quarrel. If the execution of these deeds was brought about through the exercise of undue influence, it would seem reasonable and probable that they should all have been executed at the time the deed was made to Mr. Bonham, or, failing in that, that the will, which was practically identical with the deeds as far as plaintiff is concerned, with the exception of this particular piece of property, should have disposed of the matter completely at that time, subjugating the will of Mrs. Hildreth to that of Mrs. Bonham, and to the entire satisfaction of Mrs. Bonham.

[12, 13] In this case, while the opportunity for the exercise of undue influence undoubtedly existed, and while the law of this state appears to be that, in circumstances such as the evidence shows were here present, the burden is cast upon the grantee to show that the gift was made freely and voluntarily, and with perfect understanding of the effect of the transfer, the findings of the court based upon the testimony of many apparently credible witnesses preclude any conclusion other than that at all times, including the act of the execution of the deeds, the grantor was acting with the utmost freedom, of her own volition, and with the greatest clarity of her mental perceptions, which, according to all the witnesses, was far above the average of ordinary attainment. If the evidence can be said to show any one thing clearly in this case, it is that at no time before the execution of the deeds was Mrs. Hildreth's mind in any wise affected. Her body was weak, and she was suffering from the effects of disease, but her mind retained its full vigor. Her act in giving the bulk of her property to her daughter, rather than to her son, was most natural. The evidence shows years of continuous devotion, solicitude, and kindly care by the daughter for her mother, to say nothing of the labor, sacrifice, and hardship expended and suffered by the daughter on the mother's account. The mother's gift to the daughter was but a recognition, and in no sense a full compensation, for the daughter's service to her. On the other hand, while friendly relations existed between the mother and the son, nothing appears in the record to show that any particular interest or attention was ever shown by the son in his mother's welfare. Perhaps he was unable, either from his nature or from his financial condition, to respond in great volume to his mother's necessities. The deeds to him of a portion of his mother's property amply cover any pecuniary or parental obligation arising out of the conditions as shown by the record herein.

[14] The findings of the court on all issues of fact were against plaintiff's contentions. A careful review of the evidence contained within the reporter's transcript on file in this appeal convinces this court that such findings are supported by a preponderance of the evidence, and are therefore legally unassailable. As to some of the issues the evidence is overwhelmingly in favor of the findings, and as to each and all of the others there is at least a substantial conflict in the evidence upon which each of them is based. California cases so numerous as to require no citation, and for reasons so thoroughly understood as to require no elucidation, are practically unanimous in holding that in such circumstances the findings are conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

UNGER v. SAN FRANCISCO-OAKLAND TERMINAL RYS. et al. (Civ. 4404.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 26, 1923.)

1. Street railroads ⚷117(24)—Negligence in riding in automobile struck by street car held for jury.

Where plaintiff, after having assisted a friend in starting a recently purchased automobile truck, offered to ride with him on the trip which the friend was about to take to become accustomed to his car, and the car became stalled on defendant's street car track, and was struck by a street car and plaintiff injured, and it appeared that plaintiff's friend was an experienced mechanic and driver of automobiles, although inexperienced in the mechanical operations of the particular car driven at the time of the accident, whether plaintiff was negligent in riding in the car was for the jury.

2. Negligence ⚷136(30)—Automobile driver's negligence imputable to occupant of vehicle held for jury.

Where plaintiff volunteered to ride with a friend in his newly acquired automobile truck, which became stalled on defendant's street car track and was struck by a street car, and it appeared that plaintiff's friend was an experienced mechanic and driver of automobiles, even though inexperienced in the mechanical operations of the particular car driven at the time of the accident, it could not be said as a matter of law that the friend was negligent in driving along the street to get used to his newly acquired car, or to attempt to make the particular crossing, even though it be conceded that plaintiff and his friend were engaged in a common enterprise.

3. Street railroads ⚷117(35)—Negligence under last clear chance doctrine held for jury.

Evidence of negligence on the part of the motorman in the operation of a street car, striking an automobile truck stalled on the track, held to make a case for the jury under the last clear chance doctrine.

4. Street railroads ⚷117(33)—Negligence of driver of automobile stalled on track held for jury.

The driver of an automobile or other vehicle, stopped for any temporary cause in front of an approaching street car, cannot be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he does not desert his vehicle, at least until it is reasonably certain that an impact is unavoidable, as he has a right to assume that those in charge of the approaching street car, seeing his predicament, will not recklessly run him down, and a right to make reasonable effort to start his vehicle, and so save it from a collision, and whether his acts constitute negligence is a question for the jury, in view of the circumstances.

5. Street railroads ⚷117(33)—Negligence of occupant of automobile stalled on track held for jury.

Where plaintiff, riding with his friend in the latter's recently purchased automobile truck, was injured in a collision between defendant's street car and the truck at a crossing after the truck became stalled in front of an approaching car, plaintiff was not negligent as a matter of law in failing to desert the vehicle; he having a right to rely on the driver's ability to extricate it from its dangerous position and on the duty of the motorman on observing his predicament not to recklessly run him down.

6. New trial ⚷144—Finding that verdict had not been improperly arrived at sustained.

Where, in a personal injury action against a street railroad company, the charge was made that the jury arrived at a verdict for plaintiff by a process of addition and subtraction, but there were counter affidavits by certain jurors denying that any agreement that the jurors should be bound by the computation had been made, it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to resolve the conflict adversely to defendant's contention.

7. New trial ⚷114—Newly appointed judge, who did not preside at trial, may determine motion for new trial on preponderance of evidence.

Where, in a personal injury action, a verdict for plaintiff had been returned, and pending motion for new trial the presiding judge resigned and a new judge succeeded to his office, it was the duty of such new judge to determine the motion for new trial according to his conception of the preponderance of the evidence, notwithstanding that he had not seen or heard the witnesses.

A. L. Whittle and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco (Orrin K. McMurray, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellant.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor, after a jury trial, for damages resulting from a collision between an automobile in which the plaintiff was riding and a street car of the appellant. The contentions of the appellant are chiefly predicated upon the evidence in the case, which will be reviewed in dealing with the various points made in the course of these contentions. The collision occurred upon East Twelfth street, in the city of Oakland, along which the street car tracks of appellant extend, and at a point thereon a short distance east of the intersection of Twelfth street with Fallon street. The accident occurred between 5:30 and 6 o'clock in the evening of April 7, 1919, at which time there was much travel by street cars, automobiles, and other vehicles at and in the vicinity of the immediate point where the collision took place. The plaintiff, immediately prior to the time of said collision and of his injuries, had been riding in an automobile truck owned and driven by one Parley Cook, and it is the appellant's first contention that the plaintiff's acts and conduct in riding in said automobile truck prior to and at the time of said accident constituted negligence as a matter of law which should have prevented his recovery in this action. This contention is based upon the following state of facts:

On the afternoon of April 7, 1919, the plaintiff, while walking along East Twelfth street, observed Parley Cook, with whom he was acquainted, in front of his residence trying to start his said automobile truck. The machine in question was an old Rambler touring car made over into a truck, which Cook had purchased that day, and with the mechanical operation of which he had theretofore not been familiar. He was having difficulty in getting the machine started, and the plaintiff, observing this, went up to offer what suggestions he could in aid of Cook's effort to start the machine. The plaintiff was somewhat familiar with this type of car, having driven one like it before. He suggested to Cook that he should drain his carburetor, and he did so, and then had no difficulty in starting the machine. Cook was going down the street for the purpose of getting used to the car, and plaintiff asked if he could help him, and said if he could he would be glad to ride downtown with him, and if there was anything he could show him he would be glad to do so. Cook assented to this and they boarded the car; the plaintiff knowing that Cook had just purchased the car and had never driven a car having the same sort of gear shift before. They proceeded down Twelfth street westerly, Cook with two of his younger children sitting upon the driver's seat, and the plaintiff standing in the body of the truck behind, resting his hands upon the back of the seat. The two older children of Cook were also in the rear with plaintiff. The truck, thus occupied and driven, came down on East Twelfth street until it passed the Civic Auditorium, when Cook turned south to cross the railroad track on Twelfth street. There were at that point two main tracks on Twelfth street used by the appellant for its cars, running easterly and westerly thereon, comprising several lines radiating from the center of the city of Oakland to various portions of the city and its suburbs. The plaintiff observed that several other machines were passing and called to Cook to "look out." Cook stopped the truck on the tracks of appellant and had difficulty in starting again in time to avoid a collision with one of appellant's east-bound cars.

The foregoing facts, which are practically undisputed, are relied upon by the appellant to sustain its contention that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in riding with Cook down Twelfth street to the busy crossing where the car was stalled, and where the collision occurred. There were certain other facts, however, shown in the evidence which have an important bearing on this question. It appeared that Cook, while unfamiliar with the mechanical operation of the truck he had just purchased, was a mechanic by trade, and was familiar with the mechanism and operation of automobiles generally; that he had been working as a mechanic in several garages in Oakland and other places for about two years prior to the date of this collision, during which he had driven automobiles of various types to various places throughout the state. It also appeared that on the evening in question, when the plaintiff first approached Cook in front of the latter's residence and found he was having trouble in starting his car, the trouble was not in the operation of its starting mechanism, but was in the flooding of the carburetor, and that when this was relieved Cook started his car without further trouble. It also appeared that Cook stopped at least twice on the way down Twelfth street, once at a garage to get supplies, and again as he neared the crossing where the collision occurred, and there is nothing to show that he had any difficulty in manipulating the gears or starting the car on either of these occasions. These latter facts bear directly upon the question as to whether the plaintiff was negligent in riding down Twelfth street in said truck and with Cook as the driver, under the circumstances above related.

[1, 2] Upon this question we think men might reasonably differ in opinion, and, this being so, the question of fact as to the plaintiff's negligence in so doing would, under well-settled rules of law, be one which should have been submitted to the jury. Conceding for the sake of argument that the plaintiff and Cook were, under the circumstances as above detailed, engaged in a common enterprise, it cannot be reasonably held that Cook, an experienced mechanic and driver of automobiles, even though inexperienced in the mechanical operations of this particular car, was, as a matter of law, negligent in driving along Twelfth street in order to get used to his newly acquired car, or that he was so negligent in essaying to negotiate this particular crossing as to bar the plaintiff's right to recover as a coadventurer with him in that expedition. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the trial court properly refused to grant the appellant's motion for a nonsuit upon that ground.

As to the appellant's contention that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in not deserting the car after it had been stalled upon the appellant's track, and after he had become aware of the approach of appellant's street car, we shall deal with that contention at a later point in this opinion.

[3] The appellant's next contention is that the evidence in the case shows that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant's employees in the operation of its said street car at and prior to the time of said collision. It is the claim of the appellant in this regard that the evidence was clearly and conclusively that, when the plaintiff called to the driver Cook, to "look out," whereupon Cook stopped the car, the said stopping occurred upon the north or west-bound track, and it continued to stand there up to the moment before the collision, and that while it was so standing the defendant's car, in approaching easterly upon its south track, had a clear passage, and that its motorman was therefore justified in continuing to approach said crossing along said unobstructed track, and that it was only when he had thus proceeded to a point almost opposite to where said truck was standing that the driver thereof suddenly started his truck and ran it unexpectedly in front of said moving street car, when it was too late to stop the same in time to avoid a collision. If these were the undisputed facts in the case, it would necessarily follow that the defendant was guilty of no negligence in the premises and hence that the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover for whatever injury he suffered as the result of said collision. But the difficulty with this contention is that these facts are not undisputed. The plaintiff and Cook and the young son of Cook all testified positively that the truck was stalled upon the south track in the direct path of the approaching car, and that by the time Cook had succeeded in getting it started again the car was so near as to make the collision inevitable. The testimony of these witnesses created a substantial conflict in the evidence as to the precise location at which said truck was stalled upon the appellant's tracks, and it was the exclusive function of the jury to resolve that conflict which way they believed the truth to lie. If, upon the evidence last above recited, the jury found the fact to be that the truck was standing apparently stalled upon the south track, upon which the east-bound street car of the appellant was approaching, then it would be a matter of deduction for the further determination of the jury as to whether under the conditions attending that approach the motorman in charge of said street car was negligent in continuing the advance up to the instant of the collision with said truck. The facts upon which such deduction might reasonably be drawn are briefly these:

The appellant's street car swung into Twelfth street from Oak street, one block west of Fallon street, coming east. From the time the said car passed the easterly line of Oak street, the point where the collision occurred was within the range of vision of the motorman on said street car, about 600 feet to the eastward, and continued to be visible by him during his approach from that distance and up to the moment of the collision. There is a slight down grade to the tracks coming eastward on Twelfth street from Oak, varying from 2.71 per cent. at Oak street to 1 per cent. at or near the place of the collision. The street car, as it emerged from Oak street, was going at about the rate of 15 miles an hour, according to the testimony of the motorman, but slowed down to 10 or 12 miles an hour and coasted down toward the crossing. The motorman testified that, as he came into Twelfth street he saw the truck standing still at a point north of both tracks, and in this regard he is supported by the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses. The motorman further testifies that his view of the truck at that point was intercepted by the passing of another street car going west, and that when it had passed he again saw the truck, standing still, but at a different point, viz. upon or partly upon the north track along which said west-bound car had just passed. As to the passage of said west-bound car the motorman is also supported by the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses, who stated that the truck had stopped at a point north of the crossing to permit said west-bound car to pass. The conflict between the testimony of said motorman and that of the plaintiff and his witnesses arises over the question as to where the truck again stopped after the passage of said west-bound car. The motorman testifies that, when he next observed said truck after the passage of said west-bound car, he was about 50 feet away from the point where it was then standing, and that he observed the driver of the truck looking in his direction and leaning forward over his steering wheel, and that he proceeded sounding his gong loudly.

which the appellant is bound, the deduction is irresistible that, wherever the truck of Cook had moved to and was standing after the west-bound street car had passed by, the motorman saw it there, and it continued within his unobstructed view up to the moment of the collision; and if, as the plaintiff and his witnesses testify, it was then stalled upon the south track and in the direct path of the approaching east-bound car, then the motorman saw it there. If he did so, and continued to approach so near to the standing car and at such a speed as would render unavoidable a collision, unless the driver of the truck succeeded in starting it and clearing the track, the jury would be justified in finding the motorman guilty of such negligence in so doing as would constitute the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. The evidence is conflicting as to the distance the street car was away when the motorman had a clear view of the truck standing upon the tracks. The plaintiff testified that as soon as the truck stopped upon the south track he ran to its rear end, and looking up the track saw the approaching car about 450 or 500 feet away. If this evidence was accepted by the jury, it would follow that for that distance the motorman saw the truck standing in his direct path upon the track. From the fact that it continued to stand there with its driver at the wheel, observing the street car's approach and apparently trying vainly to start the truck, the jury might reasonably have concluded, not only that the motorman actually knew that the truck and its occupants were in a place of danger, but that he also reasonably must have known that the driver of the truck was for some reason unable to extricate himself from his place of imminent danger, in the immediate path of the approaching car.

If the jury so found the facts to be, it would be its duty to apply the doctrine of last clear chance to such a situation under a proper instruction from the trial court (Hansen v. N. W. P. R. R. Co. [Cal. App.] 209 Pac. 63); and this would be so, notwithstanding the driver's antecedent negligence in driving the car into such a dangerous position, if he was so negligent, in case the jury should find that, being there, he was doing all that a reasonable man could do to escape the impact and avoid the collision. The instruction which the trial court gave upon the doctrine of last clear chance came fairly within the rule as stated by the Supreme Court in the recent case of Young v. Southern Pacific Co., 210 Pac. 259, and the cases therein cited. The chief objection which the appellant makes to the court's instruction upon the doctrine of last clear chance is not so much to the statement of the rule as to its application to the facts of this case as the appellant conceives and argues them to be.

In the discussion of the facts of the case thus far, and of the law applicable thereto, we have been considering the subject from the viewpoint of the driver of the truck rather than that of its other occupants, of whom, up to the moment of the impact, the plaintiff was one. We have done this upon the theory advanced by the appellant, which for the sake of argument thus far we have conceded, that the negligence of the driver of the truck was imputable to the plaintiff to the extent of preventing a recovery by him, if the driver himself could not have recovered for injuries to his truck or to his own person. A new element enters, however, into the discussion at this point, immediately and independently affecting the plaintiff's right of recovery. It arises at the moment when the plaintiff became aware that the truck was stopped or stalled upon the defendant's track in the path of an approaching car. The plaintiff's own evidence upon this subject, by which, of course, he is bound, is that as the truck came upon the crossing he warned the driver to "look out." This was not a direction to stop, but only to drive carefully, in view of the fact that several other machines were passing and that there was danger of a collision with them. The driver, however, stopped his car by putting his foot on the brake and throwing out the clutch, keeping the engine running. The plaintiff ran to the rear of the truck "to jump out," as he says, and he then saw the approaching street car, which he estimates was from 350 to 450 feet away. He did not jump out, but turned back to assist the driver in starting the truck. He found him trying to switch gears, and told him to "put it in low." The gear shift stuck, and thereupon the plaintiff, again looking up, saw the street car bearing down upon them at a distance of but 25 or 30 feet away. He ran to the rear to jump out, but as he did so the driver of the truck succeeded in starting it, and had almost cleared the track when the shock of the impact between the car and the rear end of the truck came, throwing the plaintiff out directly in front of the car, which ran over his right leg, stopping within about 8 feet.

[4, 5] This is the plaintiff's own story of how his injury occurred. It is in conflict with that of some of the defendant's witnesses, but it is supported in its essential aspects by the testimony of other eyewitnesses of the accident. If the jury believed the plaintiff's testimony in this respect, it was for them to determine whether or not the plaintiff was negligent during the moments between the time when the truck was stopped on the track and the instant of the impact. The driver of an automobile or other vehicle stopped for any temporary cause in front of an approaching street car cannot be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he does not desert his vehicle, at least until it is reasonably certain that an impact is unavoidable. He has a right to assume that those in charge of the operation of the approaching street car, seeing his predicament, will not recklessly run him down. He has a right to make a reasonable effort to start his vehicle, if it is susceptible of being started, and so save it and its occupants from injury. Whether his acts in so doing or attempting to do were unreasonable and negligent would be a question of fact, which it would be the province of the jury to determine, in view of all of the circumstances of the particular case. The same reasoning and the same rule would apply to the plaintiff herein, if we assume the fact to be as the appellant insists it is, that he was engaged with the driver of the truck in a common adventure; and if he were not so engaged, but was the occupant of the truck as a passenger, a like rule must be applied to his case, since the occupants of vehicles placed in dangerous positions, as in the way of approaching cars, are not ordinarily required to desert the vehicle, nor are they ordinarily to be held guilty of negligence as a matter of law in not doing so, since they also have a right to rely upon the ability of the driver of the vehicle to extricate it from its dangerous position and upon the duty of the motorman observing his predicament not to recklessly run them down. Whether the plaintiff herein was negligent in remaining in the truck as long as he did, or in attempting to leave the same and in the manner he did, are questions for the determination of the jury, in view of all the circumstances of the particular case. Dowd v. Atlas Taxicab, etc., Co., 187 Cal. 523, 202 Pac. 870.

The appellant makes several objections to the instructions of the court other than that relating to the doctrine of last clear chance. These have been considered by us in the light of the entire body of such instructions, and we do not deem it necessary to deal with them in detail, for the reason that, taken as a whole, the instructions of the trial court were not only very full and fair, but we think clearly embodied the law touching the questions to which they related, while practically every instruction which the defendant requested was given by the court in the precise form of such request.

[6] The appellant charges that the jury was guilty of misconduct in the manner in which its members arrived at their verdict, and offers in support thereof the affidavit of one of the jurors, to the effect that after several ballots had been taken, the jury standing 9 to 3 for the plaintiff, one of the jurors stated that the amount of the verdict could be arrived at by a simple method of addition and subtraction; that thereupon each of the jurors then in favor of the plaintiff named the amount he or she thought should be awarded him in damages. These amounts were written down by the foreman and divided by 9, and the sum of $9,500 was thus arrived at. This juror stated that he agreed to be bound by the result so determined, and gave up his own opinion that $2,500 would be an adequate sum to be awarded plaintiff, because of his belief that he had agreed so to do. In opposition to this affidavit counter affidavits were presented from several of his fellow jurors, denying that any agreement that a juror should be bound by the computation had been made, or that any of said jurors were so bound, but that, on the contrary, the verdict was finally arrived at after further discussion and consideration following the foreman's said calculation. The trial court resolved this conflict in these affidavits against the defendant's contention, and we cannot say that it abused its discretion in so doing. The case of Dixon v. Plums, 98 Cal. 384, 33 Pac. 268, 20 L. R. A. 698, 35 Am. St. Rep. 180, cited by the appellant is not parallel as to its facts with the case at bar, and in its statement of the law rather opposes than upholds the appellant's contention.

[7] Finally, the appellant contends that it is entitled to a reversal of this case for the reason that the trial court did not properly exercise its judicial discretion in respect to the granting or denial of the defendant's motion for a new trial. This contention is based upon the following facts as described in the record before us. The cause was tried in the superior court of Alameda county, before Hon. Everett J. Brown and a jury. Judge Brown resigned his judicial position after the trial of the cause but before the motion for a new trial had been brought on to hearing. The motion for a new trial was heard before his successor in office. In passing upon said motion the judge then sitting in said court indicated that on the face of the record he would feel that the preponderance of the evidence on certain vital points in the case was in favor of the defendant, and that he therefore would be justified in granting the motion for a new trial, but that, not having seen or heard the witnesses, or been able to observe their appearance, attitude, or manner of testifying during the trial, he did not feel that he was in a position to pass upon the matter of the conflict in the evidence, and that he would therefore refer the whole matter to the appellate court by denying the motion for a new trial. It may be conceded that the judge, in his attitude in thus passing upon the motion for a new trial, was mistaken in his conception of the duty and function of the magistrate, who, not having presided or been present at the trial of a cause nevertheless is called upon by the fact of his succession to pass upon and determine the merits of the motion for a new trial.

Trial judges are not infrequently called to decide motions for new trials in cases tried before juries in which the most material evidence is partly, or even wholly, in the form of depositions. In such cases, as in this case, the judge, in considering the motion for a new trial, is deprived of the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses testify; but the judge should nevertheless determine the motion upon his best judgment as to where the preponderance of the evidence lies. It would appear in this case that, had the judge, in passing upon the motion for a new trial, done this, the motion for a new trial would have been granted instead of denied; but it does not therefrom follow of necessity that this cause must for that reason be reversed upon this appeal. This court, having had cast upon it the burden of considering this appeal, must do so in the light and under the mandate of section 4½ of article VI of the Constitution, which forbids this court to set aside a judgment for any error in any matter of procedure, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, this court shall be of the opinion that there has been a miscarriage of justice. Assuming this burden, this court has carefully examined the entire record in this case, including the evidence. Upon such examination we are satisfied that the record herein discloses no such preponderance of evidence in the defendant's favor upon any vital element in this case as would justify the conclusion that the jury were unwarranted in resolving its conflicts in the plaintiff's favor. Having thus concluded that the jury, which did see and hear the witnesses, were justified by the state of the evidence as a whole in returning their verdict in the plaintiff's favor, it would be a miscarriage of justice for this court to set aside that verdict and the judgment based thereon merely because the judge of the trial court in passing upon the motion for a new trial mistook his duty and function in the regard above indicated. It was an error in procedure which did not result in a miscarriage of justice.

ST. SURE, J. I concur in the affirmance of the judgment. Lord Mansfield is said to have given this advice to a friend newly appointed to a colonial judgeship:

> "Never give reasons for your decisions; your judgment will very probably be right, but your reasons will almost certainly be wrong."

The Supreme Court of this state expressed a similar thought when it said:

> "With the process of reasoning by which the court reached its conclusion we have nothing to do. That may have been erroneous, and the ruling correct." Chabot v. Tucker, 39 Cal. 434; In re Kingsley, 93 Cal. 576, 29 Pac. 244; Davey v. Southern Pacific Co., 116 Cal. 325, 48 Pac. 117; People v. Bailey, 30 Cal. App. 581, 590, 158 Pac. 1036.

It is the duty of the trial court to grant a new trial when it is not satisfied with the verdict; and it is not bound by the rule as to conflicting evidence, as is the appellate court. Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 59 Pac. 26; Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 417, 95 Pac. 1029; Weringer v. Rutledge, 180 Cal. 566, 569, 182 Pac. 31. I am of the opinion that, when the trial court considered and passed upon the evidence adduced at the trial and gave its order denying the motion for a new trial, it fully performed the duty enjoined by law. Upon appeal it then became the duty of this court to examine the evidence, and, if there was a conflict therein, affirm the order. That, in effect, has been done. In the lower court, before denying the motion, the judge, who had not presided at the trial, spread upon the record for the benefit of this court his reasons for thinking why, upon the cold record, a new trial ought to be granted, and in the same breath denied the motion. We are not concerned with the mental attitude of the trial judge, except as shown by his acts. In its processes of reasoning the human mind takes many slants, which may be interesting from a psychological standpoint; but we are bound by the rules which the wisdom of the law has established, two of which I have stated above and now invoke. It may be that the defendant has been placed at a disadvantage by having the motion heard by a judge who could only gain his impressions from the record. Still the rules of law placed him in the shoes of the judge who presided at the trial, clothed him with all his powers and duties, and we are not permitted to otherwise regard him or his order made in the case. Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 355, 362, 59 Pac. 791; Hausmann v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 174, 72 Pac. 905; Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 244, 88 Pac. 911; Wendling, etc., Co. v. Glenwood, etc., Co., 153 Cal. 411, 417, 95 Pac. 1029.

TYLER, P. J. I dissent. It conclusively appears from the record that the trial judge was of the opinion that a new trial should be granted, and that his sole reason for denying the same was his mistaken belief that he was without power so to do, because of the fact that, there being a conflict in the evidence and he not having heard the testimony, he was unable to judge of the credibility of the witnesses as indicated by their demeanor upon the stand, and was therefore not in a position to consider the motion upon its merits. The court stated, in denying the motion, that it desired the appellate court reviewing its action to fully understand this as the reason for its conclusion, and it was on this precise understanding that the motion was denied.

As indicated in the prevailing opinion the court was mistaken in the conception of its duty and functions in passing upon the motion. It is the province and duty of the judge of the trial court in such a proceeding to inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict or finding, and to grant a new trial if in his judgment such evidence is insufficient to support the decision. This power and duty are in no manner affected or impaired by the fact that the trial was not had before him, and that his only knowledge of the facts in the case was obtained from the cold record. Garton v. Stern, 121 Cal. 347, 53 Pac. 904; Jones v. Sanders, 103 Cal. 678, 37 Pac. 649. Such motions are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court. Drathman v. Cohan, 139 Cal. 310, 73 Pac. 181. The appellate court has not the power to act merely because of its belief that the evidence preponderates one way or the other; this power resides in the trial court, and appellant herein was entitled to have that court properly exercise its discretion. This duty cannot be passed on to us.

In considering the application the court below is not bound by the rule as to conflicting evidence, as is the appellate court. Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 59 Pac. 26. As before stated, that court was of the positive opinion that a new trial should be granted, and only denied the motion under the mistaken belief that its opinion as to the effect of the evidence having been reached by a mere perusal of the record, unaided by an opportunity to observe the demeanor of the witnesses while testifying, it was unable to give effect to such opinion, notwithstanding that thereby the defendant was practically deprived of all benefit arising from its right to make the motion. Such is not the law. There is a very serious conflict in the evidence, and appellant was entitled to have the court properly exercise its discretion in determining the motion, and failure on its part to do so manifestly deprived the appellant of the benefit which would follow from such proper exercise of discretion. Hughley v. City of Wabasha, 69 Minn. 245, 72 N. W. 78.

It is not for us to say that from a consideration of the entire case, including the evidence, that in our opinion the act of the court in refusing to grant the motion was justified, irrespective of error. The constitutional provision has no application to such a situation. Nor does the fact that an appellate court is not usually concerned with the reasons given by the trial court for its action in a given matter preclude it from reviewing such action, where the reason given indicates an entire misconception of the trial court's duty and power. If in the present case the judge, in passing upon the motion, had said, "Gentlemen, this is a very voluminous record; I have had no time to read it; I have great confidence in the judgment and common sense of the jury; therefore I will deny the motion," it would not be questioned that these reasons, however excellent in themselves, would not justify the court's action, and that it would be the duty of this court to reverse the order. But such a case would be less aggravated than the present; for there it might well be that upon reading the testimony the court might justly deny the motion, whereas here his study of the record led him to the conclusion that he ought to grant it, but he nevertheless denied it for an obviously invalid reason.

No useful purpose would be served by a further discussion of this subject. In conclusion, however, it might be said that the error in abuse of discretion of the trial court had the effect of depriving the defendant of its substantial right of a trial by jury with all its incidents, one of which embraces the privilege of having the verdict controlled by the judge. "The very definition of 'trial' carries with it the idea of superintendence of the judge." Capitol Traction Co. v. Hof, 174 U. S. 1, 13, 19 Sup. Ct. 580, 585 (43 L. Ed. 873); Horne v. Rogers, 110 Ga. 362, 35 S. E. 715.

For the reasons given, I am of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

1. Injunction ⚷135—Refusal of temporary injunction in suit against majority stockholders not an abuse of discretion.

In a suit by minority stockholders of a corporation against majority stockholders and a majority of the board of directors, to enjoin the extending time of payment on a note for $25,000 due the corporation, alleged to have been executed by a majority stockholder to get money to aid him in gaining control of a majority of the stock, where affidavits filed by defendants showed a prosperous financial condition of the corporation, and that its indebtedness was being reduced, refusal to grant a temporary injunction was not an abuse of discretion of the trial court, such refusal not causing an irreparable injury.

2. Appeal and error ⚷954(2)—Refusal of temporary injunction not disturbed on appeal, in absence of showing of abuse of discretion.

A decision of a trial judge, refusing a temporary injunction, will not be disturbed on appeal, in absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion.

der refusing a temporary injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Walter G. Bonta, of San Francisco, and Edward W. Engs, of Oakland, for appellants.

Robt. B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, Wm. R. Geary, of Oakland, and Fred C. Peterson and Charles M. Bufford, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from an order denying a temporary injunction, by which plaintiffs sought to enjoin the majority stockholders and the majority of the members of the board of directors of the San Francisco Laundry Association, a corporation, from dismissing two of the employees of said corporation, and also from extending the time of payment of a certain promissory note executed by one of the defendants, Charles M. Bufford, to said corporation for the sum of $25,000, dated May 13, 1918, payable two years after date.

Upon this appeal the appellants make no point of the refusal of the trial court to enjoin the dismissal of said two employees, but they do claim that the court erred in denying the injunction to restrain the defendants, pending trial, from extending the time of the payment of said loan. In this respect appellants, in their opening brief, say:

> "As to this order, while we believe it to be erroneous as a whole, we have no desire specially to urge error, in so far as the court refused to restrain the removal from their positions of the two persons above named. What we do urge upon this court as error is the refusal of the court below to restrain any and all corporate action extending the time of payment of the loan to defendant Bufford."

The record upon which the motion for the injunction was made consists of the verified complaint and of certain affidavits presented by the respective parties.

The allegations of the complaint cover many extraneous matters which are unnecessary to relate here, but the substance of the allegations which are pertinent to the issue raised by this appeal may be stated as follows: The entire capital stock of said corporation consisted of 1,000 shares, of the par value of $100 each. The board of directors was composed of five members. It is then alleged that some time prior to February, 1917, the defendant Charles M. Bufford, who then owned or controlled 259 shares of the capital stock, planned to gain control of said corporation; that, pursuant to said plan, he bargained with certain stockholders for the support of 214 shares belonging to them, and that he purchased 109 shares more from another stockholder named Wells, for which he paid some cash, and to secure the payment of the balance pledged the stock so purchased, together with an additional 25 shares of which he was the owner; that he then forced the resignation of the president and general manager of said corporation and was himself elected to those positions; that he was afterwards unable to make the payments on the purchase price of the Wells stock, and said stock was consequently sold, but that some time afterwards Bufford obtained from the new owner an option for the repurchase of said stock for the sum of $12,471, and that May 13, 1918, at 3 o'clock p. m., was fixed as the time limit for the exercise of said option; that an annual meeting of the stockholders had been called for the day following, May 14, 1918. It is then alleged that, at a directors' meeting held the day previous, to wit, May 13, 1918, at which were present three directors, including Hazel E. Wood, one of the plaintiffs, a proposition in writing was submitted by Bufford and accepted by the directors—director Wood alone voting against the proposition—whereby Bufford agreed to assume the active management of said corporation at a salary to be thereafter fixed, providing said corporation would loan him the sum of $25,000; that thereafter Bufford's salary was fixed at $60 a week for a period of two years.

The complaint further alleges that, in order to make such loan to Bufford, it became necessary for said corporation to increase its incumbered indebtedness from $40,000 to $65,000; that, as security for the payment of said loan to said corporation, Bufford pledged with said corporation 447 shares of capital stock, part of which belonged to him and the balance to Frances V. Wagner and Lawrence Bufford; that with the money thus borrowed Bufford completed the purchase of the Wells and other stock, and that he also liquidated a private debt and thereby obtained the release of certain other stock he had previously pledged.

Said complaint further alleges that Bufford continued to act as president and general manager of said corporation until December 13, 1920, at which time he was removed. Upon information and belief it is alleged that the defendants Frances V. Wagner and Lawrence Bufford have, in writing, bound themselves, jointly and severally with the said Charles M. Bufford, to pay said loan of $25,000; that no interest has been paid on said loan since March 6, 1919, and that said corporation is much in need of said money for the development and successful operation of its business.

Plaintiffs further allege that on May 2, 1921, the board of directors left to its then president, A. P. Wagner, the matter of the enforcement of the payment of said loan, and that a directors' meeting would be held on May 12, 1921, at which time, it is alleged, directors Bufford, Wagner and Schilling had threatened to, and unless restrained by the court, would extend the time of the payment of said loan, and that irreparable injury would thereby result to the said corporation.

On behalf of seven of the defendants, including the defendant Charles M. Bufford, certain affidavits were filed in opposition to said motion, in which the facts alleged in the complaint were in the main controverted.

By those affidavits it is, among other things, made to appear that the San Francisco Laundry Association was organized by the respective parents of the Bufford and Schilling families in 1868, and was operated by Bufford's father for 40 years prior to 1908, and that the defendant Charles M. Bufford, prior to 1917, had been a director of said company for 15 years and was thoroughly conversant with all of its business; that in 1917 the defendant Bufford realized that the business of said corporation had greatly decreased, and that its plant was deteriorating and depreciating in value; that its gross income had gradually fallen from $218,267 in 1912 to $180,022 in 1917, and that its net gain during those five years was only $5,129; that, foreseeing the disastrous future of said corporation and desiring to rehabilitate its business, the said Bufford and Schilling interests, which represented 473 shares of the capital stock, sought to reorganize said business and place it on a sound footing and paying basis; that in order to do so it was necessary, in the interest of harmony, to acquire the Wells stock, which they finally accomplished on May 13, 1918. But it is averred that said stock was purchased by Bufford prior to the directors' meeting of May 13, 1918, and with "funds in which the laundry company had no interest, present or future, direct or indirect, but which funds were under the sole control and in the ownership" of said Charles M. Bufford. It is also averred that the loan of $25,000 was made to said Bufford "on, and not before, May 15, 1918." It is also stated in said affidavits that, under the management and direction of said Bufford, the business of said company steadily increased, and that for the years 1918, 1919, and 1920 showed a net profit of $25,891.-25; that the gross income for 1920 was $347,-806.51, as against $180,022.02 for 1917. It is further stated, in said affidavits, that at the time the loan of $25,000 was made the valuation of all property of said company, over all liabilities, was $211,513; that at the time of the hearing of said motion the weekly income from said business was $7,000, and that the indebtedness of said company amounted to $52,000, and no more, and was being reduced at the rate of $500 per month; that the value of the net assets of said company at the time of the hearing of said motion was in excess of $200,000, and that the book value of the capital stock amounted to a sum in excess of $200 a share. It is further averred that the said loan of $25,000 was amply secured by the pledge of the said 447 shares of capital stock.

The complaint was filed on May 10, 1921. The motion was heard on June 3, 1921, and was by the court denied on August 15, 1921. The defendants, in the interim, were restrained from taking any corporate action concerning the matters covered by plaintiff's complaint.

The prayer of the complaint is that defendants be not only enjoined from taking any corporate action concerning the dismissal of said employees, and the extension of the time of the payment of said loan, but also that the defendant Bufford be foreclosed from redeeming the pledged stock, and that said stock be sold to satisfy the amount due on said promissory note.

Much of the briefs of the respective parties is devoted to a discussion of the question of the validity of said loan. In this respect appellant argues that the transaction was in violation of "the fundamental principles of our corporate law," in that it enabled the defendant Bufford, while acting as a director and the president of the company, to buy additional stock in the corporation for himself with the corporation money; and, furthermore, that it was unlawful, in that it was in violation of the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, because the loan was in effect an unlawful distribution to Bufford of a part of the capital stock of the corporation.

We are not concerned on this appeal, we think, with either of those questions, but only with the propositions of whether or not the time for the payment of the loan was likely to be extended pending the trial of the action on the merits, and, if so, whether such extension would result in an irreparable injury to the corporation.

As to the latter propositions, the defendants deny that they intend to extend the time of the payment of said loan. And from the statements contained in their affidavits as to the prosperous financial condition of said corporation at the time the motion was heard, it is apparent, we think, that the corporation will suffer no irreparable injury by the refusal to issue such temporary injunction. In that state of the record the order of the trial court must not be disturbed. Moriyama v. Veysey (Cal. App.) 198 Pac. 225; Martin v. Danziger, 21 Cal. App. 563, 132 Pac. 284.

[2] It is the well-established rule that the decision of the trial judge in refusing a temporary injunction will not be disturbed upon appeal in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion. Pellissier v. Whittier Water Co. (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 593; Miller & Lux v. Madera Canal, etc., Co., 155 Cal. 59, 99 Pac. 502, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 391; Asiatic Club v. Biggy, 160 Cal. 713, 117 Pac. 912. In this respect the rule is stated in Schwartz v. Arata, 45 Cal. App. 596, 188 Pac. 313, as follows:

> "It is as firmly settled as is any rule of law that whether in a particular case a restraining order or an injunction pendente lite should be granted or refused is a matter resting largely in the discretion of the trial court before which the application is made and heard. See Raub v. Los Angeles T. Ry. Co., 103 Cal. 473, 37

Pac. 374; Rogers v. Tennant, 45 Cal. 184; Patterson v. Board of Supervisors, 50 Cal. 344; Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 534; White v. Nunan, 60 Cal. 406; Porters Bar Dredging Co. v. Beaudry, 15 Cal. App. 751, 754."

We are satisfied that there has been no abuse of discretion shown in this proceeding and therefore the order of the trial court is affirmed.

BOU et ux. v. WILLITS, City Clerk, et al.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1923.)

1. Deeds 🔑147—Deed to city held not void, as made on unlawful conditions of exemption of donor from assessments.

A deed to a city, from a street railroad company for a right of way over land, containing a recital that the city, in consideration of the dedication of the right of way by resolution of its counsel had agreed that the company should not be called upon to pay any portion of the cost of any paving or other street improvements, but that any assessments would be paid by the city, was not void as containing a covenant violating Street Improvement Act, § 20, subd. 10, requiring land to be assessed in proportion to benefits to be received, as the dedication was not made upon the consideration that no assessment be levied, but that the city would pay all such charges.

2. Deeds 🔑145—Grantee's agreement to do certain things construed as covenant, not as condition.

A provision to the effect that a deed is given and accepted on an express agreement on the part of a grantee to do certain things, imports a personal covenant rather than a condition.

3. Deeds 🔑155—"Conditions subsequent" not favored.

"Conditions subsequent" in a deed are those which in terms operate upon an estate conveyed, and render it liable to be defeated for breach of the condition, and are not favored in law because they tend to destroy estates, and no condition in a deed will be interpreted as a condition subsequent, if its language will bear any other reasonable construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Condition Subsequent.]

4. Dedication 🔑1—Deed to city held supported by consideration.

In a deed to a city from a street railway company, of a right of way over land in an avenue, reciting, with another consideration, the consideration of the benefits to accrue from widening the street by reason of the dedication of the land, the latter consideration was good and valid and in itself sufficient to support the dedication.

5. Municipal corporations, 🔑293(2)—Publication of notice of intention to order improvements held sufficient, though name of street misspelled.

Where resolution of intention to order street improvements designated among others "Easton avenue" and "Masson avenue" as streets to be improved, but in subsequent proceedings, including the publication, such streets were described as "Easton Mason avenue," such error in publishing the names of the streets did not render the notice to property owners insufficient, for the misspelling of the word "Masson" was not misleading, and the word "avenue" implies a public street, so that the omission of such word after the word "Easton" was immaterial, as the resolution called for the improvement of streets "hereinafter referred to, * * * to wit," followed by the words "Easton Mason avenue."

6. Names 🔑16(1)—Rule of idem sonans applies to legal proceedings.

Under the rule of idem sonans, absolute accuracy in spelling names is not required in legal proceedings; and if the word as spelled, though different from the correct spelling, conveys to the ear when pronounced a sound practically identical with the sound of the correct name, the name as thus given is a sufficient designation, and no advantage can be taken of the clerical error.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑293(2)—Error in publication of notice of intention to make improvements immaterial, where plans and specifications referred to in notice cured the error.

Misspelling of name of avenue to be improved, in published notice of intention, did not invalidate the proceedings, where, in the resolution of intention, the plans and specifications were referred to and made a part of the same, and therein the name of the avenue was correctly spelled, for the Improvement Act requires the act to be liberally construed, and provides that irregularities not going to the jurisdiction shall not invalidate proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Prosper Bou and wife against Nettie A. Willits, as city clerk of the city of San Bruno, and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. Coleberd, of South San Francisco, for appellants.

H. A. Mason, City Atty., and Kirkbride & Gordon, all of San Mateo, for respondents.

TYLER, P. J. This action was one brought by a property owner to enjoin the doing of certain street work in the city of San Bruno, county of San Mateo, under the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730). Judgment went for defendant city officials, and the owner appeals.

The facts giving rise to the controversy are as follows: On the 25th day of May, 1921, the board of trustees of the city of San Bruno passed its resolution of intention to order certain street improvements. The resolution described the work to be performed on "Hensley avenue, Green avenue, Easton avenue, Masson avenue, Mills avenue, Huntington avenue and * * * Euclid avenue. * * *" By subsequent proceedings a contract for such improvements was awarded to respondent Municipal Improvement Company. Prior thereto, and on the 29th day of May, 1917, the United Railroads of San Francisco, a corporation, had executed to the city a deed purporting to convey to it a right of way over the land designated in the resolution of intention as "Huntington avenue." This deed contains a recital to the effect that the city, in consideration of the dedication of the right of way, had, by resolution of its council, agreed that the company should not be called upon to pay any portion of the cost of any paving or other street improvements whenever it might be deemed necessary to cause work of that character to be done under the local assessment plan, but that in such case any assessments which might be levied against the property would be paid by the city. Further recitals are to the effect that, in consideration of the premises and of the benefits to accrue therefrom, the company dedicates the land to the city for the purpose and use of a public highway.

Under these conditions appellant contends that the agreement on the part of the city that the company should not be called upon to pay any portion of the cost of the work on the strip of land dedicated was void, for the reason that there is no provision of law which permits such an exemption, but, on the contrary, the covenant is in direct violation of subdivision 10 of section 20 of the Street Improvement Act, requiring the land to be assessed in proportion to the benefits to be received. From these premises it is argued that the deed is void as against public policy, and that there never was a dedication of the land to public use, from which the conclusion is drawn that the work provided by the resolution of intention to be performed on Huntington avenue was ordered to be done on private property not dedicated to public use, for which no valid assessment can be levied, citing Spaulding v. Wesson, 115 Cal. 441, 47 Pac. 249.

[1-3] We are of the opinion that there is no merit in this contention. Conceding, for the purpose of the argument, that the covenant in the deed to hold the railroad harmless from any assessment by reason of its dedication to be void, it by no means follows that the deed itself is void, or that the grant or dedication was affected thereby. It is to be noticed that the dedication is not made upon the consideration that no assessment be levied on the land, but that the city will pay all such charges; and it is to be presumed that the officer making up the assessment will perform his duty. A donor of land to public use cannot, as a rule at least, annex any condition which will have the effect to take from the proper local authorities the power to improve the way granted; but, as we have seen, such is not the case presented here. A provision to the effect that a deed is given and accepted on an express agreement on the part of a grantee, to do certain things, imports a personal covenant rather than a condition. 8 R. C. L., p. 1101. The mere recital, therefore, in a deed that the grantee shall do things specified therein does not create an estate upon condition Conditions subsequent in a deed are those which in terms operate upon an estate conveyed, and render it liable to be defeated for breach of the condition. They are not favored in law, because they tend to destroy estates, and no condition in a deed will be interpreted as a condition subsequent, if its language will bear any other reasonable construction. Hawley v. Kafits, 148 Cal. 393, 83 Pac. 248, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 741, 113 Am. St. Rep. 282; Fitzgerald v. County of Modoc, 164 Cal. 493, 129 Pac. 794, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1229; Behlow v. S. P. R. R. Co., 130 Cal. 16, 19, 62 Pac. 295; Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th. Ed.) § 1075.

[4] The deed herein recites two considerations, one of which includes the objectionable covenant; that other "the benefits to accrue" from the widening of the street by reason of the dedication of the land in question, and the forfeiture provided for in it is upon the sole condition that the highway be abandoned. This additional consideration is good and valid, and is in itself and apart from the other sufficient to support the dedication.

[5] Appellant argues the further point that the resolution of intention to order the improvement work was not published as required by law. This contention is based upon the fact that, among the names of the streets mentioned in the resolution of intention appear "Easton avenue" and "Masson avenue," whereas in the proceedings subsequent thereto, including the publication, the streets are described as being "Easton Mason avenue." It is apparent that the errors consist in the omission of the word "avenue" after the word "Easton," in omitting a comma after the word "avenue," and in the omission of the letter "s" in the word "Masson." It is claimed that this error in the publishing of the names of the streets to be improved is misleading and does not give the notice contemplated by law to which the property owner is entitled.

The mere omission of the word "avenue" cannot have the claimed effect. If there was an entire absence of such word following all of the names of the different streets mentioned in the resolution of intention, we do not see how a party could be misled. It is manifest that the object of publication and posting is to give notice to the property owners affected by the improvement. The language of the resolution of intention imports that certain streets are to be improved. Lexicographers have defined the word "avenue" to mean a principal street. Standard Dict. The word implies a public street. People v. Underhill, 144 N. Y. 316, 39 N. E. 333. So that in the present case, the names which follow the words "to wit" in the resolution of intention which provides for the improvement of "the streets hereinafter referred to are the following, to wit," etc., are streets, without being specifically described as streets or avenues or any other designation indicating a public thoroughfare.

[6] Nor do we think that the misspelling of the word "Masson" by the omission of the letter "s" could in any manner mislead plaintiff. Under the rule of idem sonans absolute accuracy in spelling names is not required in legal proceedings; and if the word as spelled, though different from the correct spelling, conveys to the ear when pronounced a sound practically identical with the sound of the correct name, the name as thus given is a sufficient designation, and no advantage can be taken of the clerical error. Kelly v. Kuhnhausen, 51 Wash. 193, 98 Pac. 603, 130 Am. St. Rep. 1093.

[7] However this may be, it is a question which we are not called upon to and do not here decide. In the resolution of intention, the plans and specifications are referred to and made a part of the same, and therein the name of said avenue was correctly spelled, so that the property owner, upon an examination of such plans and specifications, or of the original resolution of intention, could fully inform himself of the situation of the work proposed to be done. Federal Construction Co. v. Wold, 30 Cal. App. 360, 362, 158 Pac. 340. Mistakes of this character are discussed in Perine v. Erzgraber, 102 Cal. 234, 36 Pac. 585. In that case the resolution of intention, as here, was in proper form. The error there made was in the printing of the notices posted by the street superintendent—a jurisdictional matter. The resolution of intention provided "that the roadway thereof be paved by bituminous rock, where not already so paved." The notice provided "that the roadway where not already so paved crossing." This misprint was held to be not fatal. See, also, McGarry v. Ellis (Cal. App.) 202 Pac. 463.

While the objections to the notices in the cases cited referred to the character of the work to be done rather than to a description of the property, the same reasoning, in our opinion, applies, and such defect is cured by a reference to the plans and specifications. There can be no question of the importance of properly publishing a resolution of intention as a basis for obtaining jurisdiction over property sought to be impressed with an assessment so as to constitute due process of law; but minor defects, such as are here involved in such notice, ought not to be allowed to constitute a failure of publication, where such notice is manifestly sufficient to call the attention of the property owner to what is proposed to be done and does not have the effect of misleading him. Such an objection does not constitute a failure of publication.

The Improvement Act under which these proceedings were had provides that the act shall be liberally construed, to the end that its purposes may be effected, and that no error or irregularity of any procedure taken thereunder, which does not directly affect the jurisdiction of the city council to order the improvement shall avoid or invalidate such proceeding or any assessment for the cost of the work thereunder, and that the exclusive remedy of any person affected or aggrieved thereby shall be by appeal to the city council.

We conclude, therefore, that the deed from the United Railroads to the city of San Bruno in no manner affected the validity of the proceeding; and that the defect shown in the description of the work subsequent to the original notice of intention and the specifications therein referred to are minor and trivial, and that neither of the objections affect the validity of the proceedings.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte BERGEN. (Cr. 930.)

Weapons 🔑17(1)—Complaint for carrying concealed weapon held defective; "carry."

A complaint that accused did willfully and unlawfully conceal on his person a pistol without a license to carry such firearm did not state an offense under the statute providing that every person who carries a pistol or other firearm concealed on his person, without a license, shall be guilty of misdemeanor, the absence of allegation of carrying leaving the complaint defective in form and substance; "carry" in an indictment conveying to a defendant the thought of going about armed, as well as the further proposition that he is charged with transporting it with intent to use.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Carry.]

Original application by M. J. Bergen for a writ of habeas corpus, against the Chief of Police of Bakersfield. Writ granted.

F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for petitioner.
J. R. Dorsey, Dist. Atty., and E. F. Brittan, both of Bakersfield, and M. G. Brittan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is a petition for writ of habeas corpus. The complaint, in so far as it is material here, reads as follows:

> "Personally appeared before me this 11th day of August, 1922, George Hudson, of Bakersfield, in the county of Kern, state of California, who, being first duly sworn, complains and accuses M. J. Bergen of the crime of misdemeanor, to wit, carrying concealed weapon, committed as follows: That said M. J. Bergen, on or about the 10th day of August, 1922, within the corporate limits of the said city of Bakersfield, county of Kern, state of California, did then and there willfully and unlawfully conceal upon his person one Iver-Johnson .38 pistol, without a license to carry such firearm."

Petitioner contends that this complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a public offense. The language of the section of the statute (St. 1917, p. 221) under which the charge is made reads as follows:

> "Sec. 3. Carrying Firearms Without License, Misdemeanor. Every person who carries in any city, city and county, town or municipal corporation of this state, any pistol, revolver, or other firearm concealed upon his person without having a license to carry such firearm as hereinafter provided in section six of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor."

Section 1426 of the Penal Code requires that the complaint through which an action for a public offense is begun must set forth "the offense charged, with such particulars of time, place, person, and property as to enable the defendant to understand distinctly the character of the offense complained of, and to answer the complaint."

It seems apparent that in any accusation the name given the offense by the pleader is separate from the charging part of the instrument. This was held to be the rule in People v. Cuddihi, 54 Cal. 53. In that case the prosecution was by way of indictment, but the same reason is equally applicable to a complaint. A person of ordinary understanding who reads a formal accusation of crime, and finds himself charged with an "assault with intent to commit murder," "committed as follows," would know that he must look to what follows to discover the alleged facts, and, if they were to the effect that he had administered to some one a large quantity of a certain deadly poison with intent to murder such person, he would understand the offense charged to be that named in section 216 of the Penal Code, and he would pay no further attention to the name erroneously applied to the alleged offense by the pleader. Likewise, one reading the complaint in the instant proceeding passes on from the designation of the offense. There is no suggestion that the name is intended to be part of the charge, but, on the contrary, upon its face it purports to be nothing more than a name. When the complaint says, "committed as follows," we look to that which follows to see what it is alleged that Bergen did to commit an act violative of the law. There we find it said that he did "willfully and unlawfully conceal upon his person" a certain pistol "without a license to carry such firearm." Two facts are contained in this charge: First, that he concealed the pistol on his person; and, second, that he had no license to carry the same. But the act under which the prosecution is brought does not make it an offense to conceal a weapon upon one's person without a license to carry it, unless the concealment is joined with the carrying of the same. Without doubt, the purpose of the Legislature in enacting this law was to prevent citizens going armed in such fashion as to constitute a danger to the public; we think it was not designed to prohibit the concealment of a weapon upon one's person on his own premises or in his own home.

The technical meaning of the word "carry" seems not to have been given extended consideration in the cases involving this class of public offense. Webster's dictionary defines it as "to act as bearer; to convey anything; as to fetch and carry. To have or exert propulsive power." At common law the offense of carrying concealed weapons involved riding or going about, and not merely holding or possessing a weapon. State v. Huntly, 25 N. C. 418, 40 Am. Dec. 416.

The use of the word "carry" in an indictment conveys to a defendant the thought of going about armed, as well as the further proposition that he is charged with transporting the weapon with intent to use it as such. State v. Larkin, 24 Mo. App. 410; State v. Murray, 39 Mo. App. 127; State v. Gilbert, 87 N. C. 527, 42 Am. Rep. 518; Mangun v. State, 15 Tex. App. 362. The absence of an allegation of "carrying" leaves the accusation defective, not merely in form, but in substance; the complaint is lacking in an essential allegation, and therefore cannot confer jurisdiction upon any court to require the defendant to submit himself to processes in connection with any proceeding based upon it.

But it is said that, from the fact that the complaint alleges that petitioner was without a license "to carry" such firearm, it might be understood that the pleader intended to charge the defendant with having carried as well as concealed the pistol. This would be overstraining even the "squint" doctrine announced in Re Avdalas, 10 Cal. App. 507, 102 Pac. 674.

The complaint in the Matter of the Application of Winston, 160 Cal. 18, 116 Pac. 390, contained every element of the statute. As the opinion points out, it clearly charged a simple battery, and disclosed the "character" of the offense charged. It was therefore unlike the one in this proceeding which, as already stated, makes no mention of the element of "carrying" the weapon in question, which is surely essential to the statement of the offense attempted to be charged. There is nothing in the Matter of Winston, supra, or Ex parte Mansfield, 106 Cal. 400, 39 Pac. 775, which authorizes holding a defendant on a complaint entirely omitting the allegation of a fact essential to the statement of such offense.

The petitioner is discharged.

BROWN et al. v. MONROE, Judge.

(Civ. 3919.)

Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Court's refusal to certify purported transcript of evidence not error where appellant had not given clerk notice requiring transcript.

Where appellant had not served notice to the clerk of the court requesting a transcript of the evidence, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, the court did not err in refusing to certify transcript tendered by appellant.

Mandamus by Alma Brown, as administratrix of the estate of Sarah Lee, deceased, with the will annexed, and the estate of Sarah Lee, deceased, against Judge Charles Monroe, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Los Angeles. Writ denied.

Charles S. Darden, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is a proceeding of mandamus to compel the defendant to attach his certification to a purported reporter's transcript.

It appears that a case entitled Louis Armelin and Alice Armelin, His Wife, v. Alma Brown, Administratrix, etc., was tried in the department of the superior court presided over by the defendant, and judgment was rendered by him therein on September 20, 1921, in favor of the plaintiff; that on the 6th of the following October the defendant served and filed a notice of appeal; that on October 15, 1921, defendant in said action served and filed a notice to the clerk of the court stating that the defendant had appealed from the final judgment entered and requesting "a transcript of the following documents, to wit: Complaint, answer, judgment, Defendant's Exhibits 1, 2, and 3, notice of intention to move for new trial, tender of installment payment and interest due under agreement of sale of real estate, and notice of appeal"—that on the 26th day of January, 1922, defendant delivered to the clerk of the said court a document purporting to be a reporter's transcript of the trial, and asked the defendant to certify to it as provided in section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, whereupon the court, after objection by the plaintiff in said action, refused to certify to said alleged reporter's transcript. The above are the facts essential to a determination of this petition.

[1, 2] It must be held that the defendant in said action, petitioner in this proceeding, having served notice of appeal, at least from that time had notice of the rendition of judgment. Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. 113, 110 Pac. 109; Fiske v. Gosbey, 168 Cal. 334, 143 Pac. 611. She served a notice to the clerk within 10 days, as required by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, but in it made no mention of a reporter's transcript. By this method of appeal the phonographic report of the trial must "after due proceedings pointed out in the section" be authenticated by the judge. Williams v. Lane, 158 Cal. 39, 109 Pac. 873. It is not intended or required that the trial judge shall settle, allow, and certify any purported transcript that may be presented to him by the defendant. A transcript produced "after due proceedings pointed out in section 953a," ordinarily requires no personal detailed examination by the judge to satisfy him of its correctness. An appellate court will not compel the trial judge to attach his certification to a document presented to him in entire disregard of the proceedings clearly provided to be pursued as precedent to such certification.

The petitioner, a long time after the notice had been served and filed, made a motion in the trial court for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, asking that the notice to the clerk be corrected by adding the words "transcript of testimony," which motion was denied. This fact has no bearing upon the decision of the instant mandamus proceeding.

Petitioner places much reliance upon what is said in Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 Pac. 1023, 1026. In that case a notice to the clerk requiring a phonographic report was served in time, but the report was filed subsequent to the time prescribed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure. It was held that the failure of the reporter to file the transcript within the period allowed is not jurisdictional, and that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in certifying to its correctness.

In the instant proceeding the record shows that the trial court refused its certification, not only because the phonographic transcript was not presented in time, but because no notice requiring such a transcript had ever been served or filed, and hence the one presented to the court had no standing; "due proceedings" had not been taken to furnish it with legal credentials sufficient to require its recognition as the transcript which it purported to be.

The petition is denied.

BURGESSER et al. v. BULLOCK'S et al.

1. Municipal corporations 🔑705(2) — Neither pedestrian nor automobile has superior right of way on street.

Neither a pedestrian nor an automobile has a superior right of way on a street; each is entitled to its use, and the conduct of both must be regulated with reference to this fundamental rule.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Whether one crossing street in front of automobile was contributorily negligent held for jury.

Where one injured by an automobile saw it approaching as he was crossing the street before he entered its path and continued to observe it thereafter, but apparently misjudged its speed, the question whether he was negligent was a question for the jury.

On Rehearing.

3. Evidence 🔑265(17) — Admissions of employee driving automobile held not binding on corporation employer.

In an action against a corporation for injuries sustained when struck by one of its automobiles driven by an employee, admissions by such employee that he was exceeding the speed limit, and that his brakes were defective, and that for that reason he could not stop or avoid the collision, are not binding on the corporation.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑706(6)—Whether defendant was negligent, resulting in injury to pedestrian, held for jury.

In an action against a corporation for injuries sustained from being struck by an automobile driven by its employee, testimony that the automobile traveled 50 or 60 feet after the collision, and that at a speed of 20 miles an hour, with the brakes in good condition, it could have stopped in 20 or 25 feet, and evidence that the brakes had not in fact been working well, held sufficient to make defendant's negligence a question for the jury.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑706(5)—Automobile driver, unable to stop within distance illuminated by car lights, held not free from negligence as matter of law.

Though the rule making it negligence as matter of law to operate an automobile at night at such speed that it cannot be stopped within the distance that the highway is illuminated by its lights has never been adopted, it cannot be said that it is no negligence whatever for a driver of an automobile to travel at a speed of 20 miles an hour with his lights so dim that he is unable to see more than 10 feet in advance of his headlights, and when he cannot stop within 20 or 25 feet, and particularly where the evidence shows that he did not in fact stop for 50 or 60 feet.

6. Courts 🔑104—Supreme Court not obligated to distinguish between decisions of District Court of Appeal apparently inconsistent with its own opinion.

There is no obligation on the part of the Supreme Court to interpret and distinguish decisions of the District Court of Appeal, merely because it is contended that the rule there laid down is inconsistent with the one adopted by the Supreme Court, either in its previous opinions or in the opinion then pronounced.

7. Negligence 🔑136(5)—Question for jury.

Negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury, where there is substantial evidence; but the court may withdraw the case from the jury and direct a verdict, where the evidence is undisputed, or is of such conclusive character that in the exercise of a sound discretion, it would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Ada M. Burgesser and others against Bullock's, a corporation, and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Norman A. Bailie and Michael F. Shannon, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Haas & Dunnigan, S. F. MacFarlane, and Clair Tappaan, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action by the heirs of John Q. Burgesser, deceased, to recover damages due to his death. The trial court instructed the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. The question presented on the appeal is whether or not there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury.

The decedent was killed by a collision between himself and an automobile belonging to the defendant Bullock's, a corporation, and operated by defendant Clopton, its employee. The accident occurred November 29, 1919, at the intersection of West Jefferson street and Budlong avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. About 6:15 p. m. of that day the deceased alighted from the front end of a west-bound Jefferson street car, passed around the front end of such car and in front of the headlight of the car, and was walking across Jefferson street in a southerly direction towards the curb on the south side of Jefferson street, when he was struck by the defendant's automobile, proceeding easterly on Jefferson street. The trial court granted the motion for an instructed verdict in favor of the defendants upon the ground that the decedent was negligent as a matter of law. The trial court evidently arrived at this conclusion because of the testimony of the decedent given by deposition in an action to perpetuate his testimony to the effect that he looked to the left and then to the right toward the defendant's automobile and saw the headlights of the approaching automobile, and continued to observe them while he walked rapidly toward the curb. The opinion of the trial court in granting the motion for the instructed verdict is incorporated in the transcript, and it appears that the trial judge was of the opinion that the decedent, having observed the approaching automobile before he entered its path, and having continually observed it thereafter, and having apparently misjudged its speed, was therefore guilty of contributory negligence. The fallacy of the conclusion reached by the trial court results from the assumption that the automobile had the right of way, and that it was the duty of the pedestrian to assume that the automobile would continue in its direction without diminishing its speed or yielding to the pedestrian.

[1] The law is that neither the pedestrian nor the automobile has a superior right of way, and that each is entitled to use the highway, and that the conduct of both must be regulated with reference to this fundamental rule. The decedent testified that when he first saw the defendant's automobile it was about 25 feet on the other side of Budlong avenue, and that he had just passed around the front of the street car and had looked toward the rear of the street car before starting to cross, and then, looking to his right, saw the headlights of defendant's machine. These lights, he testified, were "low down," apparently meaning that they were dim. He stated it was "very dusk" and he could not see the automobile itself.

[2] Whether or not the decedent was negligent in crossing the street in front of the approaching automobile was primarily a question of fact for the jury, and for that reason we do not wish to enter into a further discussion of the matter, for it is sufficient for us to say that the jury might have concluded that the decedent was not negligent in so doing.

This case was transferred to the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2, and an opinion was rendered by that court affirming the judgment of the trial court. That court, in affirming the judgment, relied upon a rule of law which it stated as follows:

> "A foot traveler is negligent who fails to look both ways before crossing a highway where vehicles frequently pass. Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry et al., 117 Cal. 257, 49 Pac. 185; Hamlin v. Pac. Electric Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 776, 89 Pac. 1109; Spring v. Tawa, 49 Cal. App. 100, 192 Pac. 1051."

It is true that an instruction to that effect was given in the first case cited, Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry et al., supra, and also in the case of Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 478, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493. The same rule is also stated in the case of Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 Pac. 586, but these cases must all be read in the light of the facts involved in the particular case. In the case of Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry et al., supra, the jury had rendered a verdict in the defendant's favor. The plaintiff's own testimony showed that he stepped into the street intersection where the cross street was about 20 feet wide, without looking toward the left, from which traffic would be expected to come on the side of the street he was entering, and that he was almost instantly struck by the right hub of the front wheel of the laundry wagon, so that apparently the horses drawing the laundry wagon had passed him when he stepped into the street and directly into the side of the wagon. The plaintiff had his attention directed towards some boys fighting further up the cross street to his right, and did not look at all in the direction from which traffic was to be expected as he stepped from the curb. The real question therefore involved was whether or not it was the duty of the pedestrian in entering the street to look toward the direction from which he would expect traffic to approach if it was traveling on the right-hand side of the street he was about to enter. Under these circumstances the approval of the trial court's instruction amounted to no more than an approval of the rule that, where a pedestrian steps from a curb into a narrow street where the traffic is heavy, it is his duty to look in the direction from which such traffic would be likely to come before stepping from the curb.

In the case of Davis v. Breuner Co., 167 Cal. 683, 140 Pac. 586, supra, this court was considering the question as to whether or not there was sufficient evidence to justify the finding of the trial court that the pedestrian was negligent. The statement in that case that it was the duty of the foot passenger to look both ways before starting to cross the street in entering a busy thoroughfare, was directed to the propriety of the jury's finding of fact. The jury in that case had found that the pedestrian was negligent.

In the case of Sheldon v. James, supra, the instruction given in the case of Niosi v. Empire Steam Laundry et al., supra, was given. A verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed, claiming that the instruction was erroneous. In passing upon that instruction the court, having in mind the circumstances as disclosed by the evidence, said:

> "We construe it to be no more than a declaration that in the exercise of ordinary care it is the duty of such a pedestrian to look to the right and to the left whenever he has voluntarily put himself in a position which may be one of peril coming from either direction, and in particular where he has received adequate warning of the likelihood of peril. * * *"

The statement just quoted concerning adequate warning related to the evidence in the case that the defendant had blown a horn, and that the pedestrian, in disregard of this warning, had nevertheless stepped from the sidewalk in front of defendant's approaching machine.

The question of whether or not the pedestrian is negligent in crossing a street is one which, in the absence of express statutes regulating his conduct, must ordinarily be left to the jury; for the conduct of an ordinarily prudent person under such circumstances must be largely determined by the condition of the traffic at the particular time and place in question. There may be circumstances under which it can be said that the pedestrian is negligent as a matter of law. For instance, in the case of Finkle v. Tait (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 1031, in the case of a directed verdict, the District Court of Appeal affirmed the decision, but, in denying the transfer to this court (Finkle v. Tait, 203 Pac. 1034), we sustained the conclusion of the District Court of Appeal solely for the reason that the pedestrian was crossing the street without looking and under such circumstances that he could not see in the direction from which traffic might be expected.

In the case of Mann v. Scott, 180 Cal. 550, 182 Pac. 281, we adopted a portion of the opinion of Mr. Justice Finlayson, written in deciding the case in the District Court of Appeal (180 Cal. 550, 554, 182 Pac. 281, 282), as follows:

> "There is no positive duty to stop, look, and listen when a pedestrian is about to cross a city street. * * * And it may be that if the jurors in this case rejected, as improbable, respondent's testimony that she looked and saw no approaching automobile, they, nevertheless, concluded—as well they might—that if she did see the automobile before leaving the sidewalk, she reasoned that its driver would comply with the city ordinance, referred to in the court's instructions, requiring an automobile traveling behind a street car to stop 10 feet in the rear of the car if it stops to let off or take on passengers, until the passengers have safely alighted from or boarded the car. Whether, if she saw the automobile, respondent would have been warranted in going toward the street car without further watching the automobile approach, relying upon a compliance by the appellants with the requirements of the ordinance, was a question upon which men's minds might well differ, and hence it was properly a case for the jury. * * *"

In the late case of Reaugh v. Cudahy Packing Co., 208 Pac. 125, we had occasion to again consider the rule with reference to the obligations of a pedestrian in crossing a business street. It is there pointed out that the question of whether or not a pedestrian is negligent is to be determined from all the facts and circumstances in evidence in the case, and whether or not it was the duty of the pedestrian to look in a given direction at a given time was a question for the jury. See, also Haines v. Fewkes (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 490. On the other hand, in Klusman v. Pac. Elec. Ry. Co. (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 38, we sustained the trial court in holding that the pedestrian was negligent as a matter of law in failing to look for an approaching interurban car.

It is sufficient for the purposes of a new trial in this case to say that, where the evidence showed that the decedent looked in the direction of the approaching automobile and saw the automobile, and nevertheless proceeded to cross the street, it is for the jury to say whether or not his conduct with reference to the approaching automobile was, under all the circumstances at the time and place and conditions of the traffic, negligence on the part of the decedent.

We have not discussed the question of the negligence of the defendants for the reason that it seems to be conceded by the parties and is assumed by the trial court that there was sufficient evidence of such negligence to go to the jury.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: KERRIGAN, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; SEAWELL, J.; WASTE, J.; MYERS, J.

On Rehearing.

WILBUR, C. J. [3, 4] The defendants petition for a rehearing on the ground that the question of their alleged negligence is not sufficiently disposed of in the opinion. The defendant Clopton, who was driving the automobile, admitted that he was exceeding the speed limit and that his brakes were defective, and that for that reason he could not stop or avoid the collision. It is conceded that upon this statement there was sufficient evidence of his negligence to go to the jury. It is pointed out, however, that these admissions were not binding upon the respondent Bullock's Company, and this is true. We will, therefore, give further consideration to the claim of respondent Bullock's. In respondents' brief the facts are thus stated:

> "It appears affirmatively that the deceased saw the automobile in time to avoid the accident, and it also appears without contradiction that the driver of the automobile did not see the deceased until he was within 10 feet of the radiator, when he used every effort to avoid the accident. The driver of the automobile had the headlights of the street car shining in his face, and both the driver and the deceased testified that under the existing conditions visibility was low."

The appellants state additional facts in their reply brief bearing upon the question of the negligence of the defendants as follows:

> "It is admitted that the defendant Clopton was the driver of the car that struck the deceased, Burgesser, and that at the time of the accident Clopton was acting within the scope of his employment for the defendant Bullock's. Clopton testified that he was driving a Ford speedster; that it was heavy twilight, and that he could not see an object very well; that he was driving about 20 miles an hour; that his brakes did not respond; that they were either worn or strained; that on other stops that day his brakes appeared to be somewhat lax or loose; that when he first saw the deceased he was about a foot or a step south of the street car; that the headlight on the street car did not affect him much; that he observed a number of persons getting off the street car just about the time he struck the deceased; that they all flashed up like a pistol shot; that when he hit the deceased it somersaulted him. * * *
> "The automobile, Clopton testified, was traveling 20 miles an hour. According to the testimony of Clopton, the deceased traveled more than half way across Jefferson street while he (Clopton) traveled 10 feet in his automobile, the automobile traveling at a speed of 20 miles an hour. * * *"

The respondents are in error in stating that there was no direct statement as to the speed of the automobile. The driver Clopton was asked:

> "How fast were you traveling at the time of this accident when you saw Mr. Burgesser? A. I think about 20 miles an hour and possibly less."

There was other evidence from which the jury might have inferred the speed of the automobile, which we need not state in detail. There was testimony that the automobile traveled 50 or 60 feet after hitting the deceased and that at the speed of 20 miles an hour with the brakes in good condition the automobile could have been stopped in from 20 to 25 feet. There was also other evidence that the brakes were not working well. The defendants' automobile crossed an intersecting street after it was first observed by the deceased. In view of the necessity of a new trial, we refrain from a careful analysis of the testimony, for the reason that the question of negligence and contributory negligence is essentially one for the jury.

In view of the fact that respondents so earnestly insist that there is no substantial evidence of negligence on their part, it should perhaps be said that in many jurisdictions it is held negligence as a matter of law for a person to operate an automobile in the night time at such speed that he cannot stop the machine and avoid an obstruction or other traveler within the distance that the highway is illuminated by his lights. These cases are collated in the note to section 307 of Huddy on Automobiles, 5th edition, wherein the rule is stated as follows:

> "Reasonable care requires in many cases that the driver of a motor vehicle drive at a slower speed at night than during the day. It may be true that in a busy street in a large city a greater speed would be justified at night, for then the other traffic would be lighter, but ordinarily a greater speed is allowed in the daytime. One restriction on his speed is that he shall keep the machine under such control and operate it at such speed that he can stop the machine and avoid an obstruction or other traveler within the distance that the highway is illuminated by his lights. As was said in one case: 'It was negligence for the driver of the automobile to propel it in a dark place in which he had to rely on the lights of his machine at a rate faster than enabled him to stop or avoid any obstruction within the radius of his light, or within the distance to which his lights would disclose the existence of obstructions. * * * If the lights on the automobile would disclose obstructions only ten yards away it was the duty of the driver to so regulate the speed of his machine that he could at all times avoid obstructions within that distance. If the lights on the machine would disclose objects further away than ten yards, and the driver failed to see the object in time, then he would be conclusively presumed to be guilty of negligence, because it was his duty to see what could have been seen.' This proposition applies when the driver is making a turn in the road, and is applicable when the bright light from another machine is shining in the face of the driver. Moreover, the rule applies where the regular lights are not working and the driver is using a lantern hung in front of his radiator. The same principle is involved when, on account of a blinding snowstorm, the driver can see but a short distance ahead of his machine."

[5] While this court has never adopted that rule, we are certainly not prepared to go to the other extreme of holding that it is no evidence of negligence whatever for a driver of an automobile to travel at a speed of 20 miles an hour with his lights so dim that he is unable to see a pedestrian more than 10 feet in advance of his headlights when he cannot stop within 20 or 25 feet and when the evidence shows that he does not in fact stop for 50 or 60 feet. We repeat the question of the negligence of the defendants was one for the jury to determine under the evidence. In defendants' petition for a rehearing it is urged that it is our duty to at least mention and repudiate the doctrine announced by the First District Court of Appeal in Mayer v. Anderson, 36 Cal. App. 741, 173 Pac. 174, if that is the effect of our decision, and it is also urged that the decision of that court in Spring v. Tawa, 49 Cal. App. 100, 192 Pac. 1051, is directly in point and was entitled to consideration.

[6, 7] While we do not recognize any obligation on the part of this court to interpret and distinguish decisions of the District Court of Appeal because it is contended that the rule there laid down is inconsistent with the one adopted by this court, either in its previous opinions or in the opinion pronounced, in view of the respondents' insistence, it is proper to say that both cases are readily distinguishable from the case at bar. In Spring v. Tawa, 49 Cal. App. 100, 192 Pac. 1051, the pedestrian was standing in a position of safety and being frightened by the approaching automobile ran toward it and into its side as it passed her. Moreover, the rule stated in that case as to the duty of the trial court in directing a verdict is incorrectly stated as follows:

> "The rule has been laid down, both in the Supreme Court and in this court, that the ruling of a trial court as to whether a given state of facts presented before it does or does not amount to negligence as a matter of law will not be disturbed on appeal in the absence of a clear showing of an abuse of discretion. Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 173, 175 Pac. 690; Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38; Charves v. S. F. O. T. Ry., 186 Pac. 154."

The authorities cited do not sustain the rule laid down. The case of Mayne v. San Diego Elec. Ry. Co., supra., cited by the District Court in support of its statement was one involving the alleged contributory negligence of a child of 14 years of age and it was in this connection that it was stated:

> "That as a rule courts upon appeal have not interfered with the discretion of trial courts in referring or in refusing to refer to juries the question as to whether the contributory negligence of children of the age of 14 years or under was such as to prevent their recovery for injuries sustained by them." 179 Cal. 177, 175 Pac. 692.

The correct rule is stated in Diamond v. Weyerhaeuser, 178 Cal. 540, 174 Pac. 38, supra:

> "If there was any substantial evidence tending to show that the collision was caused by negligence on the part of defendant's driver, the action of the court in directing a verdict was, of course, erroneous. The existence or nonexistence of negligence is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by a jury. On the other hand, the court may withdraw the case from the jury and direct a verdict where the evidence is undisputed, 'or is of such conclusive character, that the court, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, would be compelled to set aside a verdict returned in opposition to it.' Davis v. California St. C. R. R. Co., 105 Cal. 131; Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471."

With reference to the case of Mayer v. Anderson, supra, respondents earnestly insist that the case is "not distinguishable and is in direct conflict with the principle of law announced in the case at bar." To distinguish that case from this it is only necessary to note that the plaintiff in that case walked across Kearny street on the north side of Market street in San Francisco at 5 o'clock in the afternoon when the traffic was very heavy, "looking straight ahead, without glancing to either side, and was absolutely oblivious to the proximity of the automobile right up to the moment of the impact, at which time he had traversed about three-quarters of the distance across the street." The court properly held that the pedestrian was bound to do more than this, in the exercise of due care, to avoid colliding with an automobile traveling no faster than the pedestrian was walking.

PEOPLE v. CRAWFORD. (Cr. 673.)

1. Criminal law 🔑511(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for forgery, evidence held to sustain conviction as against contention that there was not sufficient testimony to corroborate an accomplice.

2. Criminal law 🔑780(3)—Instruction as to corroboration of accomplice's testimony in language of statute held sufficient.

In a prosecution for forgery, instruction as to necessity of corroboration of accomplice's testimony in the language of Pen. Code, § 1111, as amended, held sufficient.

3. Criminal law 🔑1064(7)—Blanket claim of error that instructions invaded appellant's substantial rights held insufficient.

Appellant's blanket claim of error reading, "The refusal to give these instructions invaded the substantial rights of the defendant, deprived him of his liberty, and for that reason a new trial should be granted," held sufficient.

4. Criminal law 🔑829(1)—Refusal of requested instructions covered by those given not error.

The refusal of proposed instructions, where the statements of law contained therein were substantially included in the instructions given by the court, was not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Robert Crawford was convicted of forgery, and, from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Ford and E. M. Frost, both of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of forgery, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

Frank Thomas testified that he and the defendant entered a poolroom, where the defendant procured a pen and ink from the proprietor; that they then retired to another part of the poolroom, where the defendant wrote and signed the check alleged to have been forged; that the defendant handed the check to the witness, who cashed it at another place of business; and that he gave a part of the money received on the check to defendant. The proprieter of the poolroom testified that he gave the defendant a pen and ink and that the defendant and Thomas then went to another part of the poolroom. Two other witnesses compared the signature attached to the check with the proven handwriting of defendant and testified that in their opinion the signature was in defendant's handwriting. The check and the exemplars of defendant's handwriting were before the jury for comparison. Other witnesses testified to the passing of the check by Thomas.

[1] It is contented that, since Thomas was an accomplice, there was not sufficient, or any, corroboration of his testimony to sustain a conviction. The foregoing statement of the evidence shows, not only that there was sufficient corroboration, but that, independent of the testimony of Thomas, the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

[2] The court refused to give one of defendant's proposed instructions in the language of section 1111 of the Penal Code as it read prior to the amendment thereof in 1911, but instructed the jury in the language of that section as it now reads. The instruction given was sufficient.

The court refused to give five other instructions proposed by defendant.

[3, 4] Appellant's only attempt to point out error in such refusal is the statement that "the refusal to give these instructions invaded the substantial rights of the defendant, deprived him of his liberty, and for that reason a new trial should be granted." While such a blanket claim of error is wholly insufficient, an examination of the proposed instructions shows that any correct statements of law contained therein were substantially included in the instructions given by the court.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SIEBOLD v. BERDINE et al. (Civ. 4369.)

1. Fraud 🔑58(1)—Findings on specifications of fraud supporting judgment sustained.

In an action by the purchaser of a bakery business against the sellers for fraud and deceit, evidence held to support the findings on the specifications of fraud which were sufficient to support the judgment.

2. Fraud 🔑35—Fraud in sale of business held not waived.

Where plaintiff purchased a bakery business under certain representations relating to the income thereof, and to the cost of materials and equipment, the payment of the full purchase price in reliance on defendant's offer to repurchase held not a waiver of fraud; such offer to repurchase relating solely to the matter of income from the business.

3. Partnership 🔑371—Special partner held liable for fraud in sale of partnership property.

Where a special partner in a bakery business fails to comply with Civ. Code, §§ 2477 and 2501, relating to special partnerships, and the limitation of their liability on a sale of the business, and the purchaser subsequently sues the partnership for damages from fraud and deceit, the special partner is liable for such damages, notwithstanding that he has only a limited interest in the partnership which had been returned to him on the consummation of the sale; a general partner's liability being the same as that of a principal for the fraud of his agent while acting within the scope of his authority.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

Action by John E. Siebold against E. S. Berdine and others, for damages for fraud and deceit. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ernest K. Little, of San Francisco, and James P. Montgomery, of Oakland, for appellants.

Jesse Robinson and Robinson & Sizer, all of Oakland (Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is an action for damages for fraud and deceit arising out of the sale of a bakery. The sale was made on the 14th day of January, 1920, at which time $7,598.81 was paid to the defendants as part of the total purchase price of $12,598.81, the balance of which ($5,000) was agreed to be paid on or before January 28th of the same year. Plaintiff entered into possession on the 15th day of January, and on the 29th of January paid to the defendants the sum of $4,677, which at that time the parties agreed was the proper amount to be paid after making certain deductions following their inventory of the stock in trade. Plaintiff elected to stand upon his contract and to sue for the fraud. Evidence was offered that the market value of the property at the time of the sale was $7,500 and thereupon the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $5,098.81.

The plaintiff relied upon four specifications of fraud, consisting of representations made by the defendant Berdine to the plaintiff as inducements for the sale: (1) That the business had been yielding an average net profit of $200 or more per week; (2) that there was on hand as part of the inventory of said business 120 sacks or 60 barrels of "Minodak flour"; (3) that the cost of certain fruits inventoried at the time of the sale was 147 cases at $7.25 per case; and (4) that the actual and true cost of equipping and installing said business, plus cost of fixtures, stock and trade, and baking materials, was the sum of $12,598.81.

The trial court found that all the allegations of the complaint containing the specifications of fraudulent representations were true, that these representations were false, and that there was no waiver on the part of the plaintiff. The judgment which followed is attacked upon the ground that the evidence does not support these findings, and also that whatever fraud was committed and whatever misrepresentations were made were waived by the respondent before he made his final payment upon the contract.

[1] Upon the first specification of fraud there is evidence in the record to support the finding that at the particular time in question the average weekly net profit of the business did not amount to $200. There was evidence to show that respondent took possession of the premises at a particularly unfavorable period of the year, and that both the receipts and profits were higher at different periods of the year, a fact which was made known to the respondent before he consummated the purchase. However, there is evidence to support the finding of the trial court that these representations made by the appellants were untrue, and that the respondent relied upon them to his injury. The same may be said as to the finding relating to the representations covering the number of sacks of flour which were included in the sale, although it is evident that these representations resulted from mistake on the part of appellants rather than fraud, and that they had no possible connection as an inducement for the sale, the mistake having been discovered long before the sale was consummated, and having been adjusted by the parties before the final payment was made.

The finding relating to the cost of certain fruits inventoried at the time of the sale is not supported by the evidence. The claim is that the appellants represented to the respondent that the cost of this fruit was $7.25 per case, whereas the cost was $7.25 for two cases, or one dozen. The evidence is that, when the parties were going over the inventory, the respondent inquired as to the cost of this fruit, and one of the appellants showed him an invoice from a dealer for the sale of baker's apples at $7.25 a dozen. The evidence, then, was that the parties agreed upon a sum of $7.25 a case for all the 147 cases of fruit, which the respondent testified consisted of apples, peaches, cots, squash, blackberries, and various other fruits. It is in evidence, however, that the true cost price of some of these fruits ranged from $10 to $16 a dozen (two cases), which would make the cost price of such fruits from $5 to $8 a case. The court found that the value of the 147 cases was at the rate of $7.25 for two cases, and, as we have said, there was no evidence to support this finding.

The fourth specification of fraud relates to a misrepresentation as to the cost of equipping and installing the business, plus cost of fixtures, stock in trade, and baking material. Upon this issue the evidence took a wide range, and consisted mainly of the opinions of witnesses as to the value of the equipment, fixtures, and stock. The trial court found that the cost was less (how much less does not appear) than the sum which the appellants represented it to be. There was some evidence to support the finding, and, in view of the conflict which arose, this finding should not be disturbed. The findings on specifications 1, 2, and 4 are sufficient to support the judgment.

[2] The appellants insist that the judgment should be reversed as to all the appellants upon the ground that the alleged fraud was waived, and that it should be reversed as to the appellant Hogarty, as he was a partner who had no part in or knowledge of the alleged fraud. The claim of waiver is based upon the fact that, after respondent had made the first payment upon the purchase price, and had entered into possession of the premises, and while title still remained in the appellants, he discovered the facts upon which his allegations of fraud are based, but nevertheless completed the transaction by making the payment and accepting from the appellant Berdine his offer to repurchase the property if the representations regarding the income proved to be untrue. The weakness of the position of appellants is that there is no evidence to show that at the time the transaction was completed the respondent had any knowledge that the true cost of equipping and installing the business, plus cost of fixtures, stock in trade, and baking materials, was less than the sum represented by appellants. It does appear that prior to that time respondent knew or had the means of knowing that the representations relating to the profits and income of the business and to the quantity of flour were untrue. It is in evidence that respondent made complaint regarding these representations in a very few days after he took possession of the premises on January 15, 1920, and that it was because of his knowledge of those facts that he demanded and received from the appellant Berdine the offer to repurchase. This, however, cannot be taken as a waiver of all the fraudulent misrepresentations specified in the complaint. The offer to repurchase related solely to the matter of income from the business. It was given at a time of the year when the income from the bakery business was confessedly below the ordinary, and was simply an additional inducement to persuade the respondent to complete his contract during this period, and before he would have an opportunity to convince himself that at a later time in the year this income would increase. It was nothing more than an assurance in writing that the alleged misrepresentations regarding the income would prove true upon investigation and experience after the contract had become fully executed. It is insufficient in itself to constitute evidence of waiver of the alleged fraud or misrepresentations.

[3] As to the appellant Hogarty, it appears that he was a special partner having a limited interest of $500 in the partnership, and that upon the consummation of the sale that sum had been returned to him. There is no evidence, however, that he had complied with the provisions of the Civil Code (sections 2477 and 2501) relating to special partnerships and the limitation of their liability. It is in evidence that he took no part in the transactions leading to the sale, and had no knowledge of the alleged fraud or misrepresentations upon which the action is founded. However, a general partner's liability is the same as that of a principal for the fraud of his agent while acting within the scope of his authority, and this principle applies in cases involving fraud or misrepresentation by a partner in connection with the sale of the partnership property. 20 R. C. L. pp. 916, 917.

PEOPLE v. FOUTS. (Cr. 923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑532(1), 1158(4)—Court's duty in first instance to determine if confession was voluntary.

Where testimony on the question whether a confession was voluntary is in conflict, it is the duty of the trial judge in the first instance to determine whether the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the confession was free and voluntary, and, the judge having resolved the question, his action cannot be disturbed on appeal.

2. Burglary 🔑31—Exclusion of testimony of instructions to accused concerning care of an alleged accomplice, a drug addict, held not error.

In a prosecution for burglary alleged to have been committed by accused and another, both of whom were frequenters of a Salvation Army hall, the exclusion of testimony that accused had been instructed by the Salvation Army officer to watch his alleged accomplice, and stay with him, and keep him out of trouble, he being at the time under her care as an alleged narcotic addict, held not error.

3. Witnesses 🔑337(5)—Evidence of former conviction held admissible for purpose of impeachment.

Where accused has taken the witness stand and testified to matters occurring after his arrest, and affecting the question whether a confession by him had been free and voluntary, the admission of testimony by the state for the purpose of impeachment that accused had previously been convicted of several felonies held not error; such evidence being admissible as affecting his credibility.

4. Witnesses 🔑337(5)—Where previous convictions for felonies have been shown, naming of such felonies not error.

Where, for the purpose of impeachment, the people have been permitted to show that accused was previously convicted of felonies, it was not error to permit the naming of each of such felonies.

5. Criminal law 🔑1141(2)—Burden on appellant to show error.

It is always incumbent upon an appellant to show error.

6. Criminal law 🔑1178—Points not argued on appeal not considered.

Points made by appellant, but on which no argument is made, cannot be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

A. G. Fouts was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Carleton R. Bainbridge and S. S. Hahn, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of burglary, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] The first point made by appellant is that the trial court erred in receiving evidence of a confession of appellant, and this upon the ground that, as put in the brief, "the evidence clearly shows that such confession was involuntary." We have examined the testimony bearing upon this question, and there can be no doubt that there was a substantial conflict upon it. Under such circumstances it was the duty of the trial judge, in the first instance, to determine whether the evidence showed beyond a reasonable doubt that the confession was free and voluntary. People v. Zarate (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 955. The judge having resolved the question, we can no more disturb his action than we could the action of judge or jury on any disputed question of fact.

[2] The burglary in question was committed by appellant in company with one Avogadro. A part of the defense of appellant was that, although he was at or near the place of the burglary, he did not participate in the commission of the crime, but attempted to dissuade Avogadro from committing it. Appellant himself testified that he endeavor- to persuade Avogadro not to enter the store which was burglarized. Immediately preceding the burglary both appellant and Avogadro were inmates or frequenters of a place called Salvation Army Hall, an institution then in charge of an officer of the Salvation Army. This officer testified that Avogadro, an alleged narcotic addict, was "under her care" at the hall. The officer was then asked various questions by appellant's counsel for the purpose of eliciting from her a statement of certain "instructions" which it is claimed she gave to appellant when he and Avogadro left the hall together some hours before the burglary was committed. Objection was made to all these questions, and the trial court ruled that they were improper. These rulings are complained of as error. Appellant says in his brief that he expected to show by the Salvation Army officer that she had told him "to watch Avogadro and stay with him and keep him out of trouble." We shall assume that this was the purpose of the questions, but, even so, we must at once remark that we cannot perceive that they were proper. What the Salvation Army officer said to appellant can cast no light upon the truth or untruth of his story as to what he did at the scene of the burglary. That she did tell appellant to watch over Avogadro would have been no evidence whatever that he limited his operations at the scene of the burglary to acting as his brother's keeper, or that he ever watched over Avogadro at all. Such testimony of the Salvation Army officer would have been no evidence of the intent of appellant. This is all too palpable to require argument.

[3] Appellant took the witness stand, and testified to matters occurring after his arrest, and bearing upon the question whether the confession made by him was free and voluntary. Thereupon the people, over appellant's objection, and for the purpose of impeachment, showed that appellant had theretofore been convicted of several felonies. It is now contended that this evidence should not have been received. There is no merit in the point. When appellant testified upon the issue preliminary to the offer of his confession, the question of his credibility was at once before the judge, who was in the first instance to determine the admissibility of the confession, but it was as well before the jury, for that body is always to determine in the last analysis whether a confession is freely and voluntarily made. People v. Zarate, supra.

[4] As already observed, the people, for the purpose of impeaching appellant as a witness, showed that he had been convicted of various felonies. Not only so, but the people were permitted to show the name of each of those felonies. Appellant contends that the right to impeach in this manner goes no further than to inquire whether a defendant ever has been convicted of "a" felony. The authorities are directly opposed to this view. Not only may the number of felonies be shown, but they may be named to the jury. People v. Eldridge, 147 Cal. 782, 82 Pac. 442.

[5] The point is made, but sparingly argued, that the trial court erred in questioning appellant concerning a certain photograph of himself. In presenting such argument as is made upon the question appellant refers to but a single page of the reporter's transcript of the evidence, and the page shows nothing as to the point, which relates to a condition of the record. As appellant fails to point to any part of the transcript showing the condition of the record which he asserts to exist, and as it is always incumbent upon an appellant to show error, we must say that no error was committed.

At the close of the case of the people appellant moved to dismiss the action on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the charge against him. The motion was denied, and the ruling is assigned as error. In a case recently decided (People v. Clark, 214 Pac. 248), we passed upon the same point in language which fits the present action exactly:

> "The ruling was proper, as the motion did not come within the provisions of Penal Code, § 1382, fixing the grounds upon which such a motion may be made. If we view the motion as one asking the court to advise the jury to acquit, under Penal Code, § 1118, although we do not decide that it can be so regarded, it is enough to say that the evidence of the people was such that the court could not have given the jury that advice."

[6] Appellant states one other point, but makes no argument in support of it. Points so presented cannot be considered.

Judgment and order affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 7, 1923.)

Master and servant 🔑375(2)—Employee hurt while riding to dinner in fellow employee's automobile held not to have sustained injury in "course of and out of employment," within Compensation Act.

An employee of the Highway Commission injured during noon hour while riding in a defective automobile belonging to a fellow employee from the place of employment to a camp maintained by the employer about two miles distant, where he intended to purchase his dinner, held not to have sustained an "injury in the course of and arising out his employment," within the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act; nor would the employer's failure to furnish transportation be creative of any liability for risks connected with the means adopted, though it was a custom for the employees to ride employer's truck to and from camp.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Harry Maloney, opposed by the California Highway Commission of the Department of Public Works of the State of California. Application by the Highway Commission for a writ of review to annul an order of the Industrial Commission making an award for injuries. Award annulled.

Frank J. Creede and John J. Taheny, both of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, and Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter is before us upon a writ to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission against petitioner, allowing to Harry Maloney $248.70, accrued compensation and $18.52 weekly until termination of disability, together with reasonable medical expenses, the amount to be determined later by said Commission.

The one question presented is whether or not the finding of the Commission that applicant sustained his injuries "in the course of and arising out of his employment" is sustained by the evidence in the record.

The facts are practically undisputed and are, broadly, as follows: On January 29, 1922, which was Sunday, the applicant, Harry Maloney, was in the employ of the defendant as a rock-drill operator. He was engaged, with other employees of the petitioner, in working upon the highway between Jacumba and Mountain Springs, in the state of California, at a point on the road about 1½ or 2 miles from Mountain Springs. The applicant and some of the other employees lived at Mountain Springs, where the petitioner supplied them with tents, but not with bed nor blankets, and sold them their meals if they desired to purchase them. Applicant's contract of employment did not obligate him to live at the camp at Mountain Springs, but he had chosen to do so for his own convenience. Some of petitioner's employees lived at Jacumba, about 10 miles distant. Applicant might have done likewise and might have brought his lunch with him each day, but he found the Mountain Springs camp more convenient. While applicant was employed by the petitioner, he had always ridden back and forth from the camp to his place of work during his lunch hour in one of his employer's conveyances. Also, he had been transported by his employer to his work in the morning and to camp in the evening, except upon one or two occasions when he had walked from his place of work to the camp because there was no conveyance at hand at the close of the day's work. The road from the place of work to Mountain Springs is downhill all the way. There was no express agreement between applicant and his employer as to transportation to and from the camp, but the truck drivers employed by petitioner understood that it was permissible for the employees to get on any truck that happened to be going to camp and to ride down to camp for lunch. The employees were free from work during the hour between 12 and 1 o'clock so that they might eat their lunch. At 12 o'clock noon on the day of the accident, applicant was told by a fellow employee that the only truck on duty that day had departed for Jacumba at about 10 minutes to 12. Applicant was not informed that the truck would not return, but concluded that it could not do so in time to take him to his luncheon, and so he started to walk to Mountain Springs for his lunch. After walking a few hundred yards, an automobile belonging to a fellow employee, and driven by another fellow employee, who had asked permission of the owner to use the same, caught up with the applicant as he was walking along the road. The driver of the car invited the applicant to get in the automobile and go to camp and applicant and another employee of the petitioner, who was walking with him, stepped into the automobile, which continued toward Mountain Springs. Petitioner had nothing to do with this automobile which the applicant entered, and did not know that it was to be used as a conveyance for its employees and had no opportunity to inspect or right of inspection or control over the same.

Due to some defect in the steering mechanism, the automobile, in rounding a turn in the road, went over the embankment and applicant was very seriously injured.

We do not think that these facts bring the applicant within the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act of this state (St. 1917, p. 831). In the case of Ocean Accident, etc., Co., v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 313, 322, 159 Pac. 1041, 1044 (L. R. A. 1917B, 336), it was said:

> "In the very broadest sense, of course, it is true that an injury which happens to a man who is on his way to his place of employment is an injury 'growing out of and incidental to his employment,' since a necessary part of the employment is that the employee shall go to and return from his place of labor. But it is to be noted that the right to an award is not founded upon the fact that the injury grows out of and is incidental to his employment. It is founded upon the fact that the service he is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. Therefore, an employee going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when, as has been said, arriving at the place of his employment, he proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his tasks."

The case of Clapp's Parking Station v. Industrial Accident Commission, 51 Cal. App. 624, 197 Pac. 369, is also pertinent here, for while the court was unable to conclude from the facts before it that the deceased was on his way to his lunch at the time he was injured, the language of the decision clearly indicates that if such had been the case, no recovery could have been had as the injury would not have arisen out of and in the course of the employment.

In the case of Dominguez v. Pendola, 46 Cal. App. 220, 188 Pac. 1025, this court said:

> "The logical difference between a situation where the employee is proceeding to work in a conveyance or by a means used by the general public, and where he is proceeding to work by means of an instrumentality furnished to him as an employee, by his employer, is indicated in one of the English cases discussed in the Ocean Accident case, supra. Leach v. Oakley Street & Co., 4 B. W. C. C. 91. In the quotations from this English case which is inserted in the Ocean Accident decision, it is indicated that in order to recover under the Workmen's Compensation Act, it is necessary for the employee to have suffered his injury not because of a danger to which he was exposed as a member of the general public, but by reason of a danger to which he was exposed as an employee in his particular employment. And it seems to us that this is not only the logical dividing line, but it is the dividing line contemplated by the very purpose of the compensation laws in their effort to place upon an industry the burdens of injuries directly due to the hazard incidental to the industry. In the present case, if deceased had been riding upon a public conveyance, although he was on his way to his work, he would have been subject to the same dangers as any other member of the general public, and if he suffered an accident, it would be as a member of the general public and due to a risk which he, in common with other members of the public, ran. But when he enters a vehicle provided by his employer for the purpose of conducting him to the place of his employment, he enters that vehicle not as a member of the public, but as an employee of the defendant. In other words, the danger to which plaintiff's decedent was exposed in riding in this automobile, alleged to have been unprotected, and without guards or rails, and driven by a negligent driver, was a danger to which he was exposed, not as a member of the public, but because, and only because, he was an employee of the defendant."

The respondents herein admit that the present case does not fall within the rule of the last cited case, but maintain that the award in the present case was made "upon a logical and reasonable extension of the doctrine" of that case. We are of a different opinion. The logic and reason of charging an employer in a case where an employee is injured while riding on an instrumentality provided by said employer is that said employer has such instrumentality under his control. He may inspect and repair it; he must see that it is driven by competent and careful drivers. It is his business to look after such a conveyance, just as it is his business to look after the safety of the premises where his employees work. But when the employer does not own nor control the vehicle, does not even know that the employee will elect to use it, does not know whether it shall be driven by a reckless or a careful driver, or by a man who is intoxicated, or by one who is sober, how can it be either logical or just to hold him responsible for injuries ocurring to the employee while riding to and from his work in such a vehicle? Had applicant entered a conveyance provided by his employer to take employees to lunch, the risk attendant upon riding therein might be a risk incident to his status as an employee because only in that capacity would he enter the vehicle; but when he chose to accept an offer from a driver of a passing vehicle to take him to lunch—a matter of personal concern to himself—all possible connection with his employment was severed.

But respondent urges that because the employer failed to furnish transportation to take applicant to his lunch, the employer is responsible for all risks connected with the means of transportation which applicant adopted. Does the failure to furnish customary transportation to an employee enlarge the employer's liability to such an almost limitless extent? If, upon the neglect of the employer to furnish transportation, the employee may seize upon a passing automobile which has a defective steering apparatus for his means of transportation, and charge the employer with damages for the consequences, where is the line to be drawn? May he not also elect to ride with an intoxicated driver, no other being at hand, or, in the absence of any automobile, might he board an airship? If we answer these queries by saying he may adopt a "reasonable" means of transportation, we enter a maze of uncertainty in each instance, in attempting to define a word with so variable a meaning. Is it "reasonable" to enter a conveyance with a defective steering mechanism? Was such defect patent? What kind of an examination would have revealed it? What examination on the part of the employee is necessary before he adopts any means of conveyance in order to make his choice "reasonable"? These and the many questions that crowd upon one in adopting the rule contended for by respondents plainly demonstrate its impracticability, as well as its gross injustice to an employer who would be charged because of something of which he had no knowledge and over which he had no possible control. We think it is not a logical extension of the rules already announced in this state governing the liability of an employer, under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act, for injuries occuring to an employee while going to his work or returning therefrom. The general subject was carefully considered by our Supreme Court in the case of Ocean Accident, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra, and, recently, in the case of California Casualty Indemnity Exchange v. Industrial Accident Commission (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 257 (decided February 17, 1923), Justice Waste speaking for the court in the last-cited case, said:

"It was not intended by the Compensation Act that the employer who comes within its provisions shall be the insurer of his employee at all times during the period of his employment. The employer is liable for compensation only when an injury occurs to the employee while performing some act for the employer in the course of his employment, or incidental to it. Fairbank Co. v. Ind. Comm., 285 Ill. 11, 13, 120 N. E. 457. There must be some connection between the injury and the employment other than the mere fact that the employment brought the injured party to the place of injury. There must be some causal connection between the employment and the injury in the sense that, by reason of the employment, there was an unusual or additional exposure of the injured party to the kind or character of hazard and danger (in this case an ordinary street risk) which caused the injury. The injury must have its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and must have flowed from that source as a rational and natural course. In re Betts, 66 Ind. App. 484, 118 N. E. 551."

This court is ever zealous to give to the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act a broad and liberal meaning to effectuate its purposes, and we are not insensible to the very unfortunate situation of the applicant in the present case; but we feel that the facts do not show that his injury was sustained in the course of and arising out of his employment within the meaning of the statute, and we find no authority in any of the decisions which have been called to our attention in this or any other jurisdiction to warrant the award made herein.

The award of the Industrial Accident Commission is annulled.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by H. H. Newberry, opposed by the California Highway Commission of the Department of Public Works of the State of California. Application by the Highway Commission for a writ of review to annul an order of the Industrial Commission making an award for injuries. Award annulled.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, and Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes to us upon a writ of review, and we are asked to annul an award of the Industrial Accident Commission made to respondent H. H. Newberry because of injuries sustained by him and which said Commission has found were sustained "in the course of and arising out of his employment."

Applicant was injured in the accident out of which arose the case of California Highway Commission of the Department of Public Works of the State of California v. Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California and Harry Maloney (No. 4430 of the records of this court) 214 Pac. 658, in which a decision has been filed this day. It was stipulated that the law and the facts in that case and in this one were identical. It is unnecessary, therefore, to set out the facts herein, as they are discussed in the opinion filed in the parallel case. Upon the authority of that decision, and for the reasons stated therein, the award of the Industrial Accident Commission made herein is annulled.

McDEVITT v. JONES, Sheriff. (Civ. 4403.)

1. New trial 🔑151—For newly discovered evidence held not sufficiently shown by the affidavits.

In an action by a mortgagee of a cotton crop against a sheriff for conversion, a new trial for newly discovered evidence held properly denied on the affidavits and counter affidavits.

2. Chattel mortgages 🔑157(2)—Evidence held to show lessor acquired possession of cotton seed under crop mortgage.

In an action against a sheriff for conversion of cotton seed stored in a warehouse in S.'s name, and sold under execution by sheriff to satisfy a creditor's claim against S., who harvested the crop, under a lease from plaintiff to whom S. gave a crop mortgage, and subsequently defaulted, evidence held to show that plaintiff, after S.'s default, took possession of the cotton seed under the mortgage.

3. Chattel mortgages 🔑106—Evidence held to show that cotton crop mortgage was given for loan and additional advances.

In an action by a mortgagee of a cotton crop against a sheriff, for conversion of cotton seed stored in a warehouse in mortgagor's name, and sold by the sheriff under execution to satisfy a creditor's claim against mortgagor, evidence held to show that the crop mortgage was given to secure a loan of $22,500 and additional future advances.

4. Landlord and tenant 🔑79(4)—Assignee of leasehold of defaulting cotton grower could incur necessary expenses in protecting property, and was owner of collateral as against assignor or his creditors.

Where plaintiff was assignee of a leasehold interest of defaulting cotton grower, he had the right to incur such expenses at the charge of the property as were necessary to protect it from forfeiture or depreciation, and to the extent of his interest he was the owner of collateral as against the assignor and those claiming under him or against attaching creditors of the assignor.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑79(4)—Mortgagee's right to possession of crop and seed held not affected by statutes pertaining to crop mortgages where he was also owner by assignment of leasehold.

Where plaintiff mortgagee of a cotton crop was also the owner by assignment of a leasehold, there could be no termination of his right to possession of the crop and seed by reason of any statute pertaining to crop mortgages, even though he removed the crop from the land as provided in Civ. Code, § 2972.

6. Parties 🔑95(6)—Amendment of complaint against sheriff by inserting word "as" before word "sheriff" held proper.

Defendant sheriff was named in the original complaint as "W. F. J.," and then "sheriff of Fresno County," but the conjunction "as" was not interposed in the title; contention that action was not brought against sheriff, and hence stated no cause of action, held not tenable where, at the commencement of the trial, defendant objected to plaintiff's prayer to amend, on the ground that the amendment would state a new cause of action, and it appeared from defendant's answer that he fully understood the character of the action and all the issues raised; such amendment being proper to conform to the technical requirement.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. H. Cashin, Judge.

Action by T. W. McDevitt against W. F. Jones, as Sheriff of Fresno County. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. C. Schaefer, of San Pedro, and Everts, Ewing & Wild and J. R. Fitch, all of Fresno, for appellant.

Gallaher, Simpson & Hays, of Fresno, and C. H. Hartke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Appeal by the defendant, W. F. Jones, as sheriff of the county of Fresno, from a judgment rendered against him in the sum of $7,890.13, in an action for conversion as the result of a sale by the sheriff of certain cotton seed of which plaintiff claimed to be the owner.

On the 20th day of February, 1919, McDevitt Cotton Company, a corporation, leased to E. D. Skinner 931 acres of land in Fresno county for the purpose of raising cotton. Prior to August 14, 1919, plaintiff advanced in excess of $10,000 to Skinner to purchase seed for planting and pay labor and finance farming operations on the land. On August 14, 1919, Skinner informed plaintiff that through lack of funds he was unable to continue the farming operations, and offered to surrender the lease to plaintiff; whereupon an arrangement was made between the parties whereby plaintiff advanced to Skinner the sum of $22,500, and Skinner gave to plaintiff his promissory note, a crop mortgage, and an assignment of the lease as security for the note and all other moneys to be advanced by plaintiff to complete the work of producing and harvesting the cotton crop. On December 15, 1919, plaintiff assigned the crop mortgage to Geo. H. McFadden Bros.' Agency; the consideration named in the assignment was $10, but the evidence shows that the real consideration was the note of plaintiff for $22,500, which amount plaintiff had borrowed from the agency and loaned to Skinner. This mortgage, with Skinner as party of the first part and plaintiff as party of the second part, contained, among other provisions, the following:

"And the party of the first part does hereby covenant and agree to and with the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns that he will well and carefully tend, take care of and protect the said crop while growing, and until fit to harvest and then faithfully and without delay, harvest and gin the same, and deliver the same immediately into the possession of the said party of the second part, or his assigns, to be by him held and disposed of for the payment of the debt hereby secured; that in default of either of the above acts to be done by the said party of the first part, the said party of the second part, or his assigns, may enter upon the premises and take all necessary measures for the protection of said crop, and may retain possession thereof, harvest, gin the same, and all expenses so incurred and all that may become necessary, in the keeping and care of said crop, as well as the hauling, storing and delivery thereof, shall be secured by this mortgage, and shall be first payable in United States gold coin, out of the money realized from the sale of said crop; that said party of the second part, or his assigns, shall and may at all times enter into the premises to view the same, or to take measures necessary for the protection of said crop, or his interests therein, and that upon harvesting thereof, he shall be entitled to the immediate possession of the same, and may haul and store the same, at the expense of the said party of the first part; and said party of the first part does for the purposes aforesaid, make, constitute and appoint the said party of the second part, and his assigns, his true and lawful attorney irrevocable, with full power to enter upon said premises and take possession of said crop, and take care of, protect, harvest and gin the same, in case of any default on his part of the covenants herein contained; and he does further authorize said party of the second part or his assigns to take possession of said crop when harvested and ginned to haul and store the same, to sell and dispose of the same, or any part thereof, at such time and times, and for such sum or sums of money as he may deem proper, and for the best advantage of all concerned, and out of the proceeds of said sale, first, to retain the costs and charges thereof, and any and all expenses by the party of the second part incurred in the care and protection, harvesting, hauling or storing the same, and commission for selling the same; second, to apply the residue to the payment of said note, rendering the overplus, if any there be, to the said party of the first part or assigns."

Skinner defaulted. Plaintiff was forced to carry on, which he did, advancing the necessary money to pay all expenses, which reached a total sum in excess of $50,000. The crop was harvested and placed in the warehouse of the California Products Company at Fresno in Skinner's name, likewise the seed after the cotton had been ginned. At the trial it was stipulated:

> "That the California Products Company did business and handled the cotton seed and other products of the McDevitt Ranches and carried the products that were stored with it in the names of the various tenants of the McDevitt Cotton Company and T. W. McDevitt, for the purpose of the designation of the particular account to which they were to be charged."

After the cotton was ginned, plaintiff, on or about the 8th of January, 1920, entered upon negotiations for the sale of the seed. He had several conversations with Skinner, and it was arranged to sell the seed to Robert Hume, president of the California Products Company, for $77 per ton, the proceeds to be credited to Skinner's account, then in excess of $20,000, due to plaintiff. Hume was in New York at the time that the offer was accepted by him, but he confirmed the sale by wire on January 9th. On the 13th day of January, 1920, plaintiff deposited a demand draft on the California Products Company for the sum of $9,625 for 125 tons of seed sold to the Products Company at $77 per ton. The secretary of the Products Company returned the draft with the statement that no instructions had been received from Hume to pay for the seed, and stating that Hume was at that time on his way from New York to California. Upon Hume's arrival in California plaintiff's local manager and Skinner interviewed him, and he confirmed the purchase and instructed his cashier to make a check for the full amount of the seed in the name of Skinner. The manager of plaintiff requested the check to be made payable to plaintiff. Skinner objected to this, but stated that if plaintiff would let him have $5,000 he would consent to have Hume deliver the check to plaintiff immediately; otherwise he would go out and see what money he could get for the seed. Skinner's creditors were pressing him. The following day the seed was attached. Thereafter Hume refused to pay for the seed because of litigation. The seed remained in the warehouse of the California Products Company. On January 23, 1920, plaintiff repaid the McFadden Agency the sum of $22,500 which he had theretofore borrowed and loaned to Skinner, and on the following day the crop mortgage which he had hypothecated with the agency as security was reassigned to him.

On the 30th day of January, 1920, Philip M. Gaffey brought suit in the superior court of Los Angeles county against Skinner to recover on a promissory note, and at the same time an attachment was issued and levied upon all the seed stored in said warehouse in the name of Skinner. On the 19th day of February, 1920, plaintiff filed a third-party claim with the defendant as sheriff, alleging that he was the sole owner of the property under attachment, and that the same was sold to him on the 26th day of November, 1919. There is some evidence that on November 26, 1919, Skinner wrote the California Products Company, requesting it to forward "all original gin receipts, gin reports and cardoor receipts for cotton ginned in my name" to California Cotton and Factorage Company, Los Angeles, of which company plaintiff was president. The court found, however, that plaintiff took possession of the seed on the 8th day of January, 1920. Thereafter, on the 19th day of February, 1920, judgment by default was entered in the suit of Gaffey v. Skinner, and thereupon an execution was issued, and on the 12th day of April, 1920, the seed was sold by the sheriff for the sum of $4,000. The trial court gave judgment for plaintiff as above stated.

Defendant moved for a new trial upon the grounds of newly discovered evidence, insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision, and that the decision was against law. The motion was denied.

[1] In support of the motion defendant presented affidavits of H. A. Stanton, S. C. Schaefer, and E. D. Skinner. Plaintiff filed counter affidavits. All of the affidavits are before us for consideration. H. A. Stanton, the secretary of the California Products Company, was a witness called by defendant, and testified at the trial. Stanton's affidavit is a belated attempt to show ownership and right to possession of the seed in Skinner. Determinative of this question is the crop mortgage under the terms of which plaintiff harvested and took possession of the cotton and the seed after the default of Skinner. Further, it was stipulated at the trial that Skinner's name was connected with the seed by the California Products Company merely for convenience in bookkeeping.

The affidavit of Schaefer, one of the attorneys for the defendant, shows that C. H. Hartke, one of the attorneys for the plaintiff, prepared an affidavit which he requested Skinner to sign, and that Schaefer had come into possession of the unsigned affidavit within the week prior to the making of the affidavit by Schaefer. He states in his affidavit:

> "That said E. D. Skinner refused to acknowledge and execute the same for the reason that the statements contained therein relative to the alleged ownership and right of possession of the cotton seed was in T. W. McDevitt, were untrue."

In his affidavit Skinner only states in refutation of the proposed affidavit that he (Skinner) was the owner of the seed, and that he exercised control over it. Hartke's affidavit contains a denial of both of these statements.

We are of opinion that there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court in denying the motion for a new trial upon the ground of newly discovered evidence.

Defendant attacks what he is pleased to designate the "so-called sale of the property in question by Skinner to McDevitt [plaintiff herein] on the 8th day of January, 1920," as being fraudulent, and therefore void as against creditors.

[2] The court did not find that there had been a sale of the seed, but it did find, and we think its decision is fully supported by the evidence, that—

> "On or about the 8th day of January, 1920, the said E. D. Skinner, in consideration of said sum of $22,500, which the said plaintiff herein did advance to the said Skinner on said 14th day of August, 1919, and of said other sums of money advanced by plaintiff herein to said E. D. Skinner on account of said farming operations, instructed and authorized the plaintiff herein to sell and deliver all said cotton seed at whatever price the plaintiff could procure therefor, and to credit the amount received for said cotton seed upon said note secured by said crop mortgage, and said moneys owing from the said Skinner to the said plaintiff herein, and the said Skinner did then and there authorize the plaintiff herein to take possession of said cotton seed and to deliver possession thereof to the plaintiff herein, and the plaintiff herein accepted the possession thereof."

Plaintiff was in the possession of the seed pursuant to the terms of the mortgage. The undisputed evidence shows that plaintiff, after the default of Skinner, took possession of the cotton, harvested the crop, shipped it to the California Products Company warehouse, and stored it there (for convenience of bookkeeping) in the name of Skinner, paying all charges for ginning, insurance, taxes, and storage. Skinner never had possession of the cotton or the seed after he abandoned his contract.

[3, 4] The uncontradicted evidence further shows that the crop mortgage was given not only to secure the note for $22,500, but also for additional and future advances. Langerman v. Puritan Dining Room, 21 Cal. App. 637, 657, 132 Pac. 617. Plaintiff was also assignee of the leasehold interest of Skinner. As such he had the legal right to incur such expenses at the charge of the property as were necessary to protect it from forfeiture or depreciation. 5 C. J. 957, 958; Hill v. Eldred, 49 Cal. 398. To the extent of his interest he was the owner of the collateral as against the assignor and those claiming under him, or against attaching creditors of the assignor. 5 C. J. 957; In re Phillips, 71 Cal. 285, 12 Pac. 169; Frink v. LeRoy, 49 Cal. 314.

[5] Defendant contends that the mortgage lien of plaintiff terminated with the removal of the crop from the land, citing section 2972 of the Civil Code. Since plaintiff was also the owner by assignment of the leasehold, there could be no termination of his right to the possession of the crop and the seed by reason of any statute pertaining to crop mortgages. Summerville v. Kelliher, 144 Cal. 155, 77 Pac. 889; Crosby v. Fresno, 30 Cal. App. 308, 158 Pac. 1070.

[6] The final point urged by defendant is that the action was not brought against the sheriff of the county of Fresno, and upon that ground and for that reason no cause of action was stated. The defendant was named in the complaint "W. F. Jones," and then "Sheriff of Fresno County," the conjunction "as" not being interposed in the title. At the commencement of the trial plaintiff asked to be permitted to make an amendment so that there would be proper designation of the defendant as sheriff of Fresno county. Objection was made upon the ground that such an amendment would state a new cause of action. The record shows that before the trial defendant filed his answer in which he alleged that he at all of the times mentioned in the complaint was the duly elected, qualified and acting sheriff of the county of Fresno, and that he served the writ of attachment as such sheriff, and as such officer levied the writ upon the cotton seed in suit. It therefore appears that defendant fully understood the character of the action, the effect of his possession and disposal of the seed, and all of the issues sought to be raised by the pleadings. The complaint was amended to conform to the technical rule requiring it, the substantial rights of the defendant were in no way affected, and we think that the amendment was properly allowed by the court.

KESSLER et al. v. YOUNG. (Civ. 3780.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 19, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑1170(10)—No reversal for miscarriage of justice merely because decision was contrary to preponderance of evidence.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, prevents reversal, unless, on examination of the entire case, including the evidence, a miscarriage of justice has resulted because of some error complained of, and does not require reversal, regardless of alleged errors, because the cause was decided contrary to the preponderance of the evidence.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1170(10)—Failure to find reasonable value of services not cause for reversal of judgment for plaintiff on express contract.

Where the court found on all the issues necessary to sustain a judgment for plaintiff on an express contract to pay for services rendered, failure to find on an issue as to the reasonable value thereof, as presented by a quantum meruit count, was not cause for reversal in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

3. Witnesses 🔑275(7)—Objection to question whether there was written memorandum of oral agreement sued on properly sustained.

Where no written agreement to pay for services rendered by plaintiff was alleged or claimed and a written memorandum was not essential to the validity of the oral contract proved, an objection to a question asked plaintiff on cross-examination as to whether there was a written memorandum of such agreement was properly sustained.

4. Trial 🔑397(5)—Finding on subject of community property unnecessary in wife's action for services rendered and money due on claims assigned by husband, a party plaintiff.

In an action for money due for services rendered, money advanced, and sums due on assigned claims for services rendered by plaintiff's husband, who was joined as a plaintiff as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 370, and another, no finding on the subject of separate or community property was necessary.

5. Parties 🔑88(3) — Misjoinder cannot be urged on appeal in absence of demurrer.

In the absence of a demurrer to the original or amended complaint, defendant, on appeal, cannot urge misjoinder of parties plaintiff in the amended complaint. Code Civ. Proc. § 434.

6. Contracts 🔑228—Assignee of claim for services as surety on claim and delivery bond may recover from principal, though bond was not approved by sheriff.

Assignee of a claim on a contract for services as surety on a claim and delivery bond may recover from the principal, though the bond was not approved by the sheriff, in the absence of any question as to the form or sufficiency thereof; the surety's liability having passed beyond her control on delivery of the bond.

7. Work and labor 🔑27(1)—Objections to questions whether plaintiff had gone to business college or been admitted to practice law properly sustained.

In an action for money due for services rendered in managing defendant's property and preparing certain lawsuits for trial, where it was shown that defendant was represented by an attorney throughout such litigation, and that plaintiff's services were not such as to require a license to practice law, objections to questions asked plaintiff as to whether she had been admitted to practice law, as well as to questions whether she had gone to business college, were properly sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Mae H. Kessler and husband against Marie J. Young. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Lantz, Winslow P. Hyatt, and Samuel M. Garroway, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

S. R. Blake, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHENK, Justice pro tem. The plaintiff Mae H. Kessler brought this action alleging in the first count a balance due of $450 on an express contract for services rendered and $93 for money advanced; in the second count, a balance of $70 due on an assigned claim for services rendered by the plaintiff Frank P. Kessler, her husband; and in the third count a claim for $50 assigned to her by one Edith J. Thom, on a contract for services by the latter as surety on an undertaking in claim and delivery.

At the beginning of the trial, Mrs. Kessler was granted leave to amend by joining her husband as a party plaintiff, to satisfy the requirements of section 370 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by adding an item of $15 to the first cause of action on account of money loaned. Plaintiffs were then granted additional leave to amend by setting up by way of a common count in quantum meruit the sum claimed to be due on the express contract alleged in the first cause of action. The defendant answered denying generally and specifically the allegations of the original complaint, and objected to the filing of the amendments. It was stipulated that the allegations of the amendments might be deemed denied. Judgment went for plaintiffs in the full amount prayed for, and defendant appeals, basing her appeal on certain alleged errors occurring during the course of the trial, but especially on the contention that—

> "On the examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, a miscarriage of justice has resulted from the judgment herein"—citing section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

As to the principal contention, the argument of counsel for appellant seems to be that regardless of any of the alleged errors a miscarriage of justice has taken place in that the trial court decided the cause contrary to the preponderance of the evidence. To use counsel's language:

> "If there ever was a case in which the doctrine of the preponderance of evidence should prevail it is the case at bar."

The plaintiff Mrs. Kessler testified that the defendant engaged her to assist in the management of her property and in the preparation for trial of certain lawsuits then pending and in which the defendant was an interested party, and that defendant had agreed to pay her for such services the sum of $500; that she had performed the services required by her contract; and that $50 and no more of the contract price had been paid. Mrs. Kessler also testified as to the money advanced for the use and benefit of defendant, and at her request, and which had not been repaid. The assignors of Mrs. Kessler also testified positively as to their claims and the amounts due thereon. The defendant in her testimony denied the alleged or any contract for services. She testified that whatever moneys had been advanced had been repaid by her; that no agreements were ever made with the assignors of Mrs. Kessler; and that they were entitled to nothing. The evidence on behalf of the contending parties was positive and substantial but irreconcilably conflicting, and on such conflict the court found in favor of the plaintiffs.

[1] The constitutional provision referred to has no application to the contention of appellant, but on the contrary operates to prevent a reversal unless, because of some error complained of, a miscarriage of justice has resulted, and then only when the court on appeal shall so determine after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence. The errors complained of will therefore be examined with this application of the constitutional provision in mind.

Although objection was made at the trial to the amendments to the complaint, no argument attacking the ruling is made in appellant's brief, and from a consideration of the record the correctness of the ruling of the court is beyond question.

[2] It is claimed that the court failed to find on the issue of the reasonable value of the services rendered by Mrs. Kessler as raised by the second amendment to the complaint. This was on the common count and related to the same matters alleged in the first cause of action on the express contract. The court found in plaintiff's favor on the issue of the express contract. The finding on this issue rendered the issue as to their reasonable value immaterial, and if found upon would not have affected the judgment actually rendered. Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738. All of the issues necessary to sustain the judgment were found upon, and therefore the failure to find on the issue as to the reasonable value of the services, presented by the quantum meruit count, is not cause for reversal. Hooker v. Thomas, 86 Cal. 176-178, 24 Pac. 941.

[3] In the cross-examination of Mrs. Kessler defendant's counsel endeavored to elicit from her a reason why the contract alleged in the first cause of action was not reduced to writing, and when a reason apparently unsatisfactory to counsel was given he inquired: "Well, you claim to be a good business woman, don't you?" This question was objected to on the ground that it was not proper cross-examination, and the objection was sustained. Counsel then asked: "Well, there was no memorandum in writing of any agreement that took place then in your house?" An objection to this question on the same ground was made and was sustained by the court in the following language: "Objection sustained. It is not claimed that there was any. You haven't that to meet." Inasmuch as a written agreement was not alleged or claimed by any of the parties, and a memorandum in writing was not essential to the validity of the contract proved, the objection was properly sustained.

[4, 5] There is no allegation in the complaint that the action concerned the separate property of the plaintiff Mrs. Kessler, and error is asserted because there is no finding on the subject of separate or community property. This was unnecessary. Mrs. Kessler was a proper party plaintiff as assignee under the second and third causes of action, and if the first cause of action concerned community property her husband, the coplaintiff, was brought in and joined with her. No demurrer was interposed to the original complaint nor to the complaint as amended, and defendant cannot now urge misjoinder. Sec. 434, Code Civ. Proc.; Schwarze v. Mahoney, 97 Cal. 131, 31 Pac. 908.

[6] As to the third cause of action, it was alleged and proved that the defendant agreed to pay Mrs. Thom the sum of $50 if she would act as a surety on an undertaking in one of the actions in which defendant was interested; that Mrs. Thom signed and qualified as a surety on the bond; that the same was delivered to the defendant or to her counsel for the purpose for which it was intended, and that it was filed. Exception is taken to the finding in favor of the plaintiff on this cause of action on the ground that the court sustained objections to questions interposed on behalf of the defendant tending to prove that the bond had not been approved by the sheriff, and that therefore the finding is not supported by the evidence. When she signed, qualified on, and delivered the bond Mrs. Thom did all that was required of her under the contract. Her liability thereon then passed beyond her control, and she could not thereafter urge as a defense in an action on the bond that the sheriff had not approved the same. 9 C. J. 25; Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 61 Pac. 369; Mendocino County v. Morris, 32 Cal. 145; People v. Evans, 29 Cal. 432; People v. Shirley, 18 Cal. 121; Cobbey on Replevin, 2d Ed., par. 689. No question is raised by appellant as to the form or sufficiency of the bond, and under the circumstances we think the consideration for the execution thereof passed.

[7] The court sustained objections to questions propounded by defendant to the plaintiff Mrs. Kessler as to whether or not she had gone to business college or had been admitted to practice law, and the appellant predicates error on this ruling. An examination of the record discloses that the defendant was at all times represented by an attorney in the litigation referred to, and that the services rendered by Mrs. Kessler were not such as to require a license to practice law as a prerequisite to the performance thereof, and it is difficult to perceive why a business-college education was necessary. The materiality of these questions is not apparent, and the objections were properly sustained.

No other alleged errors merit discussion. The judgment is affirmed.

1. Insurance 🔑426½—Guaranty as to title of realty held a "contract" enforceable on discovery of damage.

A certificate by a title insurance and trust company, stating that after examination of the records in relation to the title to certain real property the company "hereby guarantees" that the title to such property as it appeared from the records was vested in a certain party, held to constitute a contract upon which liability would accrue on discovery of loss incurred if the title was not as represented in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 339, as amended by St. 1917, p. 299, declaring that the cause of action upon a contract, obligation, or liability evidenced by a certificate, or abstract, or guaranty of title of real property, does not accrue until discovery of the loss or damage.

2. Licenses 🔑11(1)—Certificate as to title of realty held contract of indemnity and insurance exempting title insurance company from city license tax.

A certificate by a title insurance and trust company guaranteeing that title to certain property was in a person named, running against future loss that might be incurred if the record title should prove to be different from that certified, held a contract of indemnity and of insurance, and hence the title insurance company paying a tax to the state under Const. art. 13, § 14, as an insurance company, was not liable for a city license tax imposed upon title and abstract companies not insuring title.

3. Insurance 🔑126—Statutory provision as to constructive notice held not to make record title uninsurable.

Civ. Code, § 1213, providing that every conveyance of real property acknowledged or proved and certified and recorded as prescribed by law from the time it is filed with the recorder is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees, does not prevent the record title to realty from being the subject of insurance, but, on the other hand, constitutes a reason for insurance in favor of one who is affected by such constructive notice and who relies upon a title insurance company and its certificate as protection against the legal consequences of such notice.

4. Insurance 🔑2—Title guaranty certificate held insurance contract, although not specifying all facts required by statutory provision as to insurance generally.

A guaranty certificate issued by a title insurance company is not deprived of its character as an insurance contract merely because it does not specify all the facts set forth in Civ. Code, § 2587, providing that a policy of insurance must specify the parties between whom the contract is made, the rate of premium, the property or life insured, the interest of the insured in property insured if he is not the absolute owner thereof, the risks insured against, and the period during which the insurance is to continue.

5. Insurance 🔑4—New form of insurance business held within constitutional provisions relating to insurance.

A business having the characteristics of insurance business coming into existence after the enactment of Const. art. 13, § 14, relating to insurance, is nevertheless subject to such provision.

Appeals from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walton J. Wood, Judge.

Separate actions by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against the City of Los Angeles and others to recover license fees paid under protest. Judgment for plaintiff in each case, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., and Wm. P. Mealey, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. These are two actions in each of which the plaintiff seeks to recover an amount paid by it as a license fee demanded under the provisions of Ordinance No. 39600 (N. S.) of the city of Los Angeles. The payments were made under protest. Judgment has been entered in each case in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant city appeals therefrom. The cases have been submitted jointly, for the reason that the questions involved in them are identical.

Section 12 of said ordinance provides for a license tax to be paid by "every person, firm or corporation conducting, managing or carrying on the business of examining, searching or investigating titles to real estate and issuing abstracts, statements or certificates, showing or purporting to show or certify to the condition or state of the title to any particular property or properties as disclosed by an examination of the public records, but which abstract, statement or certificate does not insure or purport to insure the title to real property or any interest therein."

Section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution of the state of California was adopted on the 8th day of November, 1910. It provides for taxes to be levied against certain classes of corporations therein named. Subdivision (b) of that section declares that—

> "Every insurance company or association doing business in this state shall annually pay to the state a tax of one and one-half per cent. upon the amount of the gross premiums received upon its business done in this state, less return premiums and reinsurance in companies or associations authorized to do business in this state; provided, that there shall be deducted from said one and one-half per cent. upon the gross premiums the amount of any county and municipal taxes paid by such companies on real estate owned by them in this state. This tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property of such companies, except county and municipal taxes on real estate, and except as otherwise in this section provided. * * *"

It is not claimed that any question arises in these cases concerning any exception provided in said section of the Constitution.

Respondents contend that their business is solely an insurance business, and that it is not subject to the obligation to pay any tax or license fee on account of such business, other than their tax to the state. Appellant, on the other hand, contends that a part of the business of respondents is not insurance business, and that the city has the right to impose a license tax based upon and growing out of the right to conduct that business. It will be noted that the ordinance itself excepts from its operation any business in which the contract insures, or purports to insure, the title to real property or any interest therein. The question at issue here is not a question concerning the validity of the ordinance, but rather is a question of fact concerning the nature of the business transacted by respondents.

It is conceded that respondents do transact an insurance business. In the course of that business they issue a form of certificate whereby the insurer purports to guarantee and insure the insured person or persons against loss or damage not exceeding a stated sum, for a stated term of years, "which the said insured shall sustain during the life of this policy, by reason of any loss suffered affecting the title of the insured to the lot or tract of real estate hereinafter described: whether said loss is caused by failure of title, or by reason of any defects in, or liens or incumbrances on said real property." There follow, however, in this policy, certain exceptions relating to outstanding rights of persons in possession, or interests existing by virtue of instruments not recorded. But a considerable part of the business of respondents consists in the issuance of certificates of title directly limited to the condition of the record title, and wherein the certificate states that—

> "After a careful examination of the official records of the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and of the records of the federal offices located at Los Angeles, in relation to the title of that certain real property hereinafter described, the ——— Company, a corporation, having its principal place of business in the city and county of Los Angeles, state of California, hereby guarantees that the title to said property as it appears from said records, is vested in ———."

Counsel for the respective parties have argued these cases upon the theory, which we approve, that the decision depends upon the construction to be given to the certificate last above mentioned. If the business of issuing certificates of that kind is insurance business, then the license taxes in question have been wrongfully imposed, and respondents are entitled to recover the same.

Title insurance had become a recognized form of insurance in California and elsewhere prior to the year 1910, although it is more modern in its origin than are many other branches of insurance business. It has been defined as an agreement whereby the insurer, for a valuable consideration, agrees to indemnify the insured in a specific amount against loss through defects of title to real estate, wherein the latter has an interest, either as purchaser or otherwise. 38 Cyc. 344. Generally, in other kinds of insurance, the policy protects the assured against matters that may arise during, and only during, a stated period after the issuance of the policy; but the risks of title insurance, although they may be referable to the contingency of future loss, are only designed to save the assured harmless from loss through defects, liens, and incumbrances that may affect or burden the title at the time when the certificate or policy is issued.

There is no implied agreement to go beyond the conditions existing at the time the policy is issued and to assume a general liability to indemnify against future incumbrances. 38 Cyc. 349, 350. But the distinction thus existing does not deprive title insurance of any of the essential elements which characterize the contract of insurance.

"Insurance is a contract whereby one undertakes to indemnify another against loss, damage, or liability, arising from an unknown or contingent event." Civ. Code, § 2527. "Any contingent or unknown event, whether past or future, which may damnify a person having an insurable interest, or create a liability against him, may be insured against, subject to the provisions of this chapter." Civ. Code, § 2531. Counsel for appellant, in support of their contention that the certificate here in question is not a contract of insurance, go further and assert that it is not a contract at all. They rely upon the decision of Lattin v. Gillette, 95 Cal. 317, 30 Pac. 545, 29 Am. St. Rep. 115, which they say presented "an exactly similar question." In that action it appeared that, under employment for that purpose, the defendants furnished to the plaintiff a certificate which stated that from a careful examination of the records concerning the title to the described property "we find the same vested in Jacob Birnbaum free from all incumbrances." It was held that the certificate did not contain any obligation or contract, but was merely the evidence of an act done in purported satisfaction of the obligation assumed in accepting the employment.

[1] But we think that the certificate now under consideration is itself a contract. The words "hereby guarantees" are words of contract, whereas the words "we find," in the certificate in the Lattin Case, were only a statement of fact covering the contents of the record and the opinion of the parties issuing the certificate regarding the effect thereof. There was not, as there is in the present case, a contract guaranteeing that the record and its legal effect were as stated in the certificate. In the Lattin Case there was merely the contract implied in the acceptance of the employment, that the records would be carefully examined, and that the defendants would in good faith state their opinion concerning the effect of the records. They would be liable for negligent or other failure to perform that contract. The right of action would accrue at once upon issuance of the certificate, and it would be an action to recover damages for breach of contract. But in the case of a certificate like that now before us, the party entitled to the benefit of the guaranty has a right of action to recover upon the contract contained in the certificate itself, and the liability is one that does not accrue until discovery of the loss that may be incurred if the title is not represented in the certificate. Section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in the year 1913, and by the same words as repeated in the further amendment of that section in the year 1917 (St. 1917, p. 299), declares that—

> "The cause of action upon a contract, obligation or liability evidenced by a certificate, or abstract or guarantee of title of real property or policy of insurance shall not be deemed to have accrued until the discovery of the loss or damages suffered by the aggrieved party thereunder."

[2] Appellant contends that the guaranty certificate of the plaintiffs is not an insurance contract, because it does not contain the element of indemnity and because it does not comply with certain sections of the Civil Code and especially does not comply with section 2587. That section states that a policy of insurance must specify the parties between whom the contract is made; the rate of premium; the property or life insured; the interest of the insured in property insured if he is not the absolute owner thereof; the risks insured against, and the period during which the insurance is to continue.

A contract in writing implies a consideration. Since the guaranty, as we have indicated, runs against future loss that may be incurred if the record title shall prove to be different from that certified, it is a contract of indemnity.

[3] Appellant contends that in the record title to property there is no such thing as an unknown or contingent event and that therefore record title is not the subject of an insurance contract. In support of this proposition, reliance is placed upon section 1213 of the Civil Code. "Every conveyance of real property acknowledged or proved and certified and recorded as prescribed by law from the time it is filed with the recorder for record is constructive notice of the contents thereof to subsequent purchasers and mortgagees. * * *" That section exists for the protection of those who acquire interests in real property by virtue of duly recorded written instruments. This is far from preventing the record title from being the subject of insurance. On the contrary, it is the reason for insurance in favor of one who is affected by such constructive notice and who relies upon a title insurance company and its certificate as protection against the legal consequences of such notice. This was recognized by the Supreme Court in the case of Bothin v. Cal. Title Ins. & Tr. Co., 153 Cal. 718, 722, 96 Pac. 500, 502 (Ann. Cas. 1914D, 634), where the court said:

> "Necessarily the record title is all that a title insurance company can safely or judiciously insure. While the title to real property may be disclosed by the record to be in one person, it may, in fact, be in another through adverse possession or in one in occupation of the property under an unrecorded conveyance. It is the possibility of the existence of these conditions as to the title which an insurance company provides against by insuring the record title, and none other."

[5] Anticipating that respondents might rely upon the provisions of section 453v of the Civil Code, defining title insurance policies, and which was added to that Code in the year 1913, appellant contends that the section may not be construed as applicable to the questions of taxation presented in this case, because the section of the Constitution to which we have referred is in its application limited to such insurance business as was known to the law in the year 1910, when section 14 of article 13 was adopted. But if, in accordance with the opinion which we have expressed, the issuance of these certificates of guaranty does constitute insurance business without the aid of said section 453v, then the point stated is of no importance in this case. It is worthy of note, however, that subdivision (b) of said section 14, which we have quoted, refers to "every insurance company or association doing business in this state," and not to any selected or particular kinds of insurance business. It readily may be conceded that the Legislature could not by its mere enactment of a statute effectually transform into insurance business a business lacking in the elements of insurance. But we think that if a business having the characteristics of insurance business should for the first time come into existence within this state after the year 1910, it would nevertheless be subject to the provisions of said section of the Constitution.

The judgments are affirmed.

COLLINS et al. v. EKSOOZIAN. (Civ. 2564.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 28, 1923.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑95(1) — Vendor estopped from rescinding land sale contract because of purchaser's nonpayment of taxes.

Where one of the grounds for rescinding a land sale contract, of which time was the essence, was that purchaser had failed to pay taxes due, and the evidence showed that purchaser was a foreigner, unfamiliar with the English language, and that it was arranged that tax bill would be sent to purchaser in vendor's care, withholding of the tax bill by vendor was such fraud as estopped him from asserting his right to have the contract rescinded for nonpayment of the taxes.

2. Estoppel 🔑72—General principle of equitable estoppel stated.

The doctrine of equitable estoppel rests on the general principle that when one of two innocent persons—that is, persons each guiltless of an intentional, moral wrong—must suffer a loss, it must be borne by that one of them who by his conduct, acts, or omissions has rendered the injury possible.

3. Contracts 🔑318—Forfeitures not favored.

Forfeitures are not favored in law, and one should not be divested of valuable rights by way of forfeiture for default in complying with a contract by which those rights have been acquired, unless it clearly appears that the other party has suffered or will suffer serious detriment or damage by reason of the default, or unless the default was intentional or willful.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑104—Purchaser's evidence that vendor did not tell him that taxes were due held competent.

In suit for rescission of a land sale contract, of which time was the essence, for purchaser's failure to pay the taxes, where there was an agreement that the tax bill should be sent in vendor's care, purchaser's evidence that vendor did not tell him when the taxes were payable was competent.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑104—Evidence of tax collector that taxes were paid by vendee in accordance with contract held competent.

In suit to rescind a land sale contract for purchaser's failure to pay taxes, wherein purchaser alleged that, after he had ascertained that taxes were payable, he paid them together with the penalties incurred, evidence of the tax collector that the taxes had finally been paid after they had become delinquent was competent.

6. Evidence 🔑427—Evidence as to purchaser's nonpayment of taxes held not to modify contract but to excuse delay in payment.

In suit to rescind a land sale contract, of which time was the essence, for purchaser's failure to pay taxes when due, where the effect of purchaser's testimony regarding the payment of taxes and penalties incurred was not to change or modify the terms of the contract, but was intended only to show an excuse for his failure to comply within the time required by the agreement as would or might be sufficient to entitle him in equity to be relieved of the consequences thereof, a contention that such evidence tended to vary the terms of the contract was without merit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by W. D. Collins and another against Manoog H. Eksoozian. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Karl A. Machetanz, of Exeter, for appellants.

Earl A. Bagby, of Visalia, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiffs instituted this action for the purpose of securing a decree foreclosing, or declaring forfeited, all rights acquired by the defendant under a written contract whereby the former agreed to sell and convey to the defendant, and the latter agreed to purchase from said plaintiffs, a certain tract of land situated in Tulare county.

The defendant was given judgment, from which the plaintiffs appeal on a bill of exceptions.

The agreement was entered into on the 22d day of September, 1919, and contains, among others, the following provisions and terms: That the purchase price of the land, to wit, the sum of $10,700, is to be paid on or before five years from the date of the agreement, the interest thereon (7 per cent. per annum) payable annually; that, upon the payment by the defendant of the principal and interest, as so provided, the plaintiffs are to execute and deliver to the defendant a deed conveying to him a good and complete title to the said real property, free and clear of all incumbrances; that the plaintiffs were to "dig a sufficient pit where the present well is on said land to present water level, and will install the 4-inch centrifugal pump which he now has, together with a 7½ power motor, at his own cost and expense," all of which work was to be done and finished before the 1st day of March, 1920; that said plaintiffs were to lay 1,200 feet of 10-inch cement pipe from the said pit "up the east side line of said land to the north line thereof"; that said pipe line "is to be completed and capable of running water through the same from the said pit to the said north line of said land on or before the 1st day of March, 1920," all said work to be done at the expense of said plaintiffs. It is further agreed that, on or before the 1st day of February, 1921, the defendant should level and prepare the north 20 acres of said land for the planting of Thompson seedless grapes, said leveling to be such that water "will run from the north to the south lines of said land," and that he should plant such grape vines "on said land on or before the 1st day of April, 1921, and after said grapevines are planted, he will take care of, irrigate, and cultivate said grapevines at the seasonable times during the year in a careful and husbandlike manner," etc. It is further provided that the defendant, for a like purpose, should, on or before the 1st day of February, 1920, likewise level and put in shape the south 20 acres of said land, plant the same to like grapevines, and take care of the same as above indicated. The defendant was to have immediate possession of said real property and was to pay all state, county, school district and other taxes levied or imposed on said property, and "said second party agrees not to allow the same or any part thereof to become delinquent." The plaintiffs agreed to pay the taxes for the years 1919 and 1920.

The agreement further provided that failure by the defendant to comply with the foregoing terms and provisions thereof or default by him in the payment of the agreed principal of the purchase price of the premises and the interest on said principal as prescribed in the agreement was to have the effect of releasing the parties of the first part (plaintiffs) from "all obligations in law or in equity to convey said real property," or any part thereof, to the defendant; that any rights acquired by the defendant under and by virtue of the agreement should thereupon cease, and the first party invested with the right to re-enter said property and remove all persons therefrom and take possession of the same. It is also provided that "time is of the essence of this agreement, and of each covenant thereof."

The complaint, inter alia, charges that the defendant defaulted in the payment of the taxes assessed against the property in question for the years 1920–21; that the same became delinquent "and are still unpaid," and that thus he violated a vital covenant of the agreement, for which he forfeited any rights he might have had thereunder. This is the gravamen of the complaint. It is further alleged that the "plaintiffs have kept and performed all the covenants and agreements in said contract to be kept and performed."

The execution of the contract, and the fact that defendant entered into the possession of the land described in the agreement and has ever since the making thereof been, and at the time the answer was filed was still in the possession of the premises, are admitted by the answer. As to the alleged failure of the defendant to pay the taxes on the premises for the years 1920–21 and allowing the same to become delinquent, the answer alleges, in substance, as follows: That the plaintiff W. D. Collins, upon the making of the contract, directed the county assessor to assess the property in the name of the defendant, but directed and requested the assessor to send the tax statement or tax bill to said defendant in his (said plaintiff's) care "box 413, Exeter"; that said plaintiff informed the defendant that he had directed all tax statements affecting the property in dispute sent in his (said plaintiff's) care, and that he assured the defendant that whenever the tax bills against the property were sent to him (defendant) in his (said plaintiff's) care he (said plaintiff) would notify defendant of that fact and at the same time inform him of the amount of the taxes and when the same would become payable; that the said plaintiff did receive from the tax collector a statement of the amount of the taxes assessed against the premises for the years 1920 and 1921, but that he willfully and deliberately withheld the same from defendant and likewise failed to notify the latter of the amount of said taxes and when they were due and payable, and that this conduct on the part of said plaintiff was with the wrongful and fraudulent purpose and intent to cause defendant to default in the payment of the taxes assessed against the premises for those years and thereby cause defendant to forfeit all rights acquired by him under and by virtue of the provisions of said contract. It is further alleged, in this connection, that the defendant is a foreigner; that he does not understand the English language; that he is not and never has been familiar with the laws of this state regarding the time for the payment of taxes, and that he relied solely upon the promise of said plaintiff to furnish him with information as to the amount of taxes he would be required to pay and of the time when the same should be paid in order to prevent them from becoming delinquent; that immediately upon learning that said taxes were delinquent the defendant paid the same, together with all interest, penalties, etc. These facts are alleged in characteristic or appropriate legal nomenclature and given in more minute detail than we have stated them here, but our statement is sufficient to disclose the defense to the real ground upon which a forfeiture is sought.

The answer also denies that the plaintiffs have complied in all respects with the terms of the contract and then proceeds to allege wherein the plaintiffs failed in that particular. These matters are set up as special defenses and particularly as grounds upon which to predicate the proposition advanced by the defendant that the plaintiffs had waived the provision of the contract that time is an essential or of the essence thereof. The findings, which are, in all respects, in accord with the allegations of the answer, contain a statement of the matters to which we are now referring, and we will take the same from the findings instead of reproducing the allegations of the answer with respect thereto. There is, however, one matter set up as a special defense to which we may here refer, to wit, that subsequent to the execution of the contract the same was changed by an oral agreement thereafter executed in the following particular: "That, although the contract provided that the defendant should plant the north 20 acres of said land to grapevines, it was orally agreed between the parties that he need not comply with said provision, but would be required to plant 15 only of the said 20 acres to grapevines and plant the remaining 5 acres to alfalfa and that, relying upon said oral agreement, the defendant did plant 15 acres only of said 20 acres to grapevines and the remaining 5 acres to alfalfa.

The findings may, in substance, be stated as follows: That the defendant is of a nationality foreign to the United States; that he neither speaks nor understands clearly the English language, and that he is not familiar with business methods and is entirely unfamiliar with the tax laws of the state of California and their requirements; that plaintiff W. D. Collins directed the property in question to be assessed in the name of the defendant, but at the same time instructed the assessor to send the tax statements as to said property in the name of defendant in his (said plaintiff's) care, at his postoffice address, and that said plaintiff informed defendant of the instruction he had so given the county assessor, and that he (said plaintiff) would notify defendant of his receipt of said statement when he received the same and of the amount of the taxes and the time of payment thereof; that defendant relied upon this statement by said plaintiff, and that the latter well knew that defendant solely relied upon him to furnish him (defendant) with such information; that the tax collector sent by mail the tax bills on said property to defendant in care of said Collins; that the latter received said tax bills and—

> "did willfully withhold the same from the defendant; that the defendant, prior to said taxes becoming delinquent, did ask plaintiff W. D. Collins for said tax bill, but that the said W. D. Collins did not deliver the same to the defendant nor inform him as to the amount thereof nor as to the time when the same should be paid, all for the express purpose of permitting and allowing the defendant to become in default as to the provisions of said contract providing for the payment of taxes; that the defendant was at all times after said taxes became due, ready, willing, and able to pay said taxes, and desired to pay the same, and did actually pay said taxes to the tax collector of Tulare county immediately upon receiving notice of this action; that plaintiffs or either of them did not pay said taxes or any portion thereof, and that neither of said plaintiffs has been damaged in any amount whatsoever or at all by reason of the failure of the defendant to pay said taxes prior to the delinquency thereof; that, in addition to paying said taxes, the defendant paid all fines and penalties in relation thereto and that the lien of said taxes was by the defendant wholly discharged; that other than the nonpayment of said taxes * * * the defendant has fully complied with each and every term, covenant and condition of said contract to be by the second party (defendant) therein complied with and is not in any manner in default on account of said contract."

The court further found that the plaintiffs have not kept and performed the covenants and agreements in said contract to be by them kept and performed; that the plaintiffs failed to dig a sufficient pit on said land and install a 4-inch centrifugal pump, together with a 7½ power motor at their own expense, and that they failed to build and lay the 1,200 feet of 10-inch cement pipe from the said pit up the east line of the land described in said contract to the north line of said land within the time prescribed by the contract, to wit, the 1st day of March, 1920, but that the work thus referred to was not done until a long time after said date; that by reason of the failure of the plaintiffs to dig a sufficient ditch and install the pumping plant and lay the cement pipe referred to as specified by the contract they waived, prior to the time at which said taxes became delinquent, the operative effect of the provision of the contract that time was to be considered of the essence thereof.

As to the oral agreement whereby the defendant was allowed by the plaintiffs to plant to grapevines 15 acres only of the north 20 acres above mentioned and the remaining 5 acres to alfalfa, the finding is in harmony with the allegations of the answer, as is also the finding with reference to the failure of the plaintiffs to install the motor pumping plant and to lay the cement pipe within the time expressly limited by the contract, all these matters having been set up in the answer and for the purposes above indicated.

In addition to these special findings, the court made a general finding that "all of the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint, except as hereinbefore expressly found, are untrue, in that all of the allegations of the answer are true." Among the conclusions of law drawn from the findings of fact are the following: "That the defendant ought to be relieved and excused from his failure to pay the taxes on the property described in said contract and in plaintiffs' complaint," and that "the said contract should not be canceled and should not be null or void and should not be determined to be of no force and effect"; that the defendant is entitled to judgment, etc.

As above suggested, the failure of the defendant to pay the taxes within the time fixed by law for their payment and so allowing them to become delinquent involves the only breach of the agreement which the plaintiffs in their pleading complain about and upon which thus they solely rely, although the evidence, responding to certain purported special defenses set up by the answer and referred to above, took a wider range and disclosed other matters as to one of which, to wit, the act of the defendant in not planting the north 20 acres entirely to grapevines, might have been counted upon by the plaintiffs. As to these matters of special defense, it is the theory of the defendant that the plaintiffs, having themselves failed to pursue strictly the terms of the contract, waived the provision of the contract that time was an essential of the agreement or had by their conduct themselves not treated the agreement as one whose terms and provisions were to be strictly pursued by either of the parties thereto. While the evidence as to said matters is in positive conflict and the findings thereon are, therefore, put beyond the power of an appellate court to disturb, we do not regard them as important in the determination of this controversy. The real point at issue in the court below was whether the defendant, having breached that provision of the contract requiring him to pay the taxes assessed against the premises for the years 1920 and 1921 within the time prescribed by law, made such a showing by way of excuse for his default in that particular as to entitle him to be relieved therefrom by a court of equity, the action by the plaintiffs and the defense set up by the defendant being of equitable cognizance; and the questions for us to determine are: (1) Whether the findings as to the showing made by the defendant are sufficiently supported; (2) if so, whether the showing is sufficient as a matter of law to entitle the defendant to the relief granted him by the court below.

The land in dispute was originally the subject of a contract of sale between the plaintiffs and one Paul Ohannesian, who, after entering into said contract, transferred his interest therein to the defendant.

Upon the transfer of the contract to the defendant, the plaintiff W. D. Collins had the property described in the instrument assessed in the name of the defendant. It was stipulated at the trial that "in the Assessment Book for 1920, vol. N, p. 146, the entry of the assessment of the property is 'Eksoozian, M. H., care of W. D. Collins, Box 413, Exeter.'"

The defendant, according to his testimony, was a native of some foreign country, and, at the time the transaction here involved took place, had been in the United States about 10 years, for 6 years of which he had resided in the state of California. He had never attended school in this country and was unfamiliar with our language and system of tax laws. In fact, at the trial of this case, it seems it was necessary to take his testimony through an interpreter.

The defendant testified that said plaintiff told him of his intention of having the property assessed in his (defendant's) name and further told him that he (plaintiff) would instruct the assessor or the tax collector to mail the statement of the amount of the taxes assessed against the property in the name of the defendant, in care of said plaintiff; that the latter assured defendant that, upon receiving the statement, he would forward or deliver the same to him; that he and the plaintiff had a distinct understanding that the latter would, upon receiving the tax statement either pay the taxes himself and thereupon present the tax receipt to defendant, who was to reimburse him, or deliver the statement to defendant so that the latter could pay the taxes himself; that on one occasion he met the plaintiff on a public road near Exeter and then and there asked him about the taxes and inquired whether he (plaintiff) had received the statement as to the property, and that plaintiff declared that he had received no such statement; that thereafter he met the plaintiff in Exeter and again inquired about the taxes and whether the latter had received the tax statement, to which plaintiff replied in the negative; that he had never during his lifetime paid taxes; that he did not know when taxes became due in California, and that the plaintiff at no time informed him that they were due or when they would become delinquent, if not paid; that he had no knowledge that the taxes on the property had become delinquent until he received notice by summons of the filing of the complaint in this action, which was on the 25th day of May, 1921; that, after being served with summons herein, he, accompanied by his attorney, went to the county tax collector's office and paid the taxes, together with all the fines and penalties, etc., thereby releasing the property of the incumbrance subsisting upon it by reason of said delinquency. The defendant further testified regarding the oral agreement and as to the default of the plaintiffs in installing the pumping plant and laying the cement pipe above referred to within the time prescribed by the contract. These matters, as before stated, we regard as inconsequential in the decision of this case, and we may therefore waive further consideration of the facts in regard thereto.

Paul Ohannesian, the original conditional vendee of the real estate in question, and who, as stated, transferred to defendant his interest in the contract with the plaintiffs for the purchase of said property, testified that when the transfer was made, he said that W. D. Collins, the defendant, and the attorney for the plaintiffs were present; that a Mr. Tashjian on that occasion acted as interpreter for the defendant; that, after the present contract was signed, there was something said about recording it, and he (the witness) remarked to Collins and the latter's attorney that—

> "If this contract is not going to be recorded, the tax collector has got to assess the property in Mr. Collins' name. Mr. Collins gets the statement of the taxes and he ought to pay the taxes or turn it over to Mr. Eksoozian to pay the taxes. * * * I said this right in front of Mr. Machetanz (attorney for the plaintiffs) and Mr. Collins both. * * * I had this land under contract before Eksoozian. * * * I explained the contract to Eksoozian and so did other parties. I told him in that explanation that he had to pay the taxes."

The tax collector of Tulare county testified that she had occasion to investigate the matter of taxes assessed against the premises for the years 1920 and 1921; that the property was assessed to the defendant; that there was a notation on the assessment roll to the effect that the tax bill was to be mailed to Eksoozian, "in care of W. D. Collins, at Exeter." She further testified:

> "I do not know when it (the notation) was made in the book. * * * Where an address in care of some person is put on the assessment roll the bill is always sent in care of the person whose name appears on the assessment roll."

She stated that she did not personally know whether a tax statement as to the property in controversy was sent to W. D. Collins, "and I don't know whether he received any tax statement in regard to it."

The plaintiff testified that he did not instruct either the assessor or tax collector to send the tax statement as to the property to defendant in his (plaintiff's) care; that he never received any tax statement as to the property; that he met the defendant several times after the taxes fell due—once on January 20, 1920—and spoke to him about them and the necessity for paying them, but that defendant invariably declared to him that he (defendant) would not pay the taxes, and that the plaintiff would have to do so. Plaintiff stated that he paid the taxes on all the property belonging to him or assessed in his name. His testimony as to the oral agreement was positively contradictory to that of the defendant, and the excuse he offered for not installing the pumping plant and laying the cement pipe within the time called for by the contract was that, having attempted to do all this work in the month of February, 1920, the weather conditions were such that it could not be successfully done—that is to say, the cement pipe could not be laid because the ditch was full of water, and, while he dug the pit and installed the pump, the defendant would not permit him to set up the motor for the reason that he (defendant) had no facilities for housing it.

The foregoing comprises a fair statement, in substance, of the testimony received in the case, and there can be no doubt that therein there is to be found sufficient support to the findings. It is not necessary to point in detail to the circumstances developed by the evidence apparently justifying the court in concluding that W. D. Collins instructed the assessor to have the tax statement of the property mailed to him, and that he received said statement before the taxes became delinquent and for some reason failed or omitted to deliver the same to the defendant or to inform the latter of the fact that the taxes were due and payable, and when they would become delinquent if not paid. These inferences were fairly and reasonably within the evidence as produced, and we must assume, in support of the judgment, that the court did draw those inferences from the circumstances brought out by the evidence. Taylor v. Avila, 175 Cal. 203, 205, 206, 165 Pac. 533, and cases therein cited.

These significant observations may, however, be offered: That there is not shown any reason why the defendant should have willfully or purposely allowed the taxes to become delinquent. After taking possession of the property, he had improved it, and no doubt thus in some measure enhanced its value over that of the purchase price, assuming, as we may, that such price represented a reasonably fair value of the premises. In the absence of a clear showing to the contrary, it is reasonable to assume that he would not have sacrificed his interests in the premises or in the contract by purposely or negligently failing to pay the taxes. He knew that burden was upon him, because it was not only so written in the contract, but the instrument was so explained to him by the witness Ohannesian, his predecessor in interest in the contract. It may further be suggested that, if the plaintiff W. D. Collins intended good faith in his attitude towards the contract, it is most probable he would, whether he received this statement or not, have, in time to prevent their delinquency, voluntarily called the attention of the defendant to the fact that the taxes were due and payable. He knew when the taxes were to be paid. He had paid his own or those assessed against the property belonging to him and standing of record in his name, and at the same time was vitally interested in the contract by which he had agreed to sell the property herein involved to the defendant, and he knew that it was the duty of the defendant under the contract to pay the taxes thereon. The promise which the court found that W. D. Collins made to the defendant to notify him of the time for the payment of the taxes and the amount thereof was probably the outgrowth of his (plaintiff's) knowledge of defendant's want of an understanding and the use of the English language and his gross ignorance of the tax laws of the state. At any rate, the court could justly have so inferred. But it may be replied that the defendant is subject to the conclusive presumption that all persons know the law, and therefore are charged with knowledge of the time when taxes are required to be paid to prevent their becoming delinquent, and consequently there was no excuse for his failure to pay the taxes within the time prescribed, even though he had not been informed of the amount and the time of payment thereof by W. D. Collins. Of course, by going to the tax collector's office, the defendant could have learned the facts essential to prevent the delinquency of the taxes, and, under ordinary circumstances, every owner of property subject to the payment of taxes is charged with that duty, or, at any rate, with the duty of seeing that the taxes assessed against his property are seasonably paid. His failure to pay because of ignorance of the amount or the time of payment or both would not be sufficient to relieve him from the consequences of his default. But, although the time for the payment of taxes is fixed by law, still a taxpayer may, as may any person as to any legitimate transaction, commit to an agent the duty of looking after the payment of his taxes, and it was this very duty which W. D. Collins, undoubtedly prompted by his interest in the land, voluntarily took upon his own shoulders and likewise assured the defendant that he would personally attend to the payment of the taxes.

The appellant, however, stands upon the proposition that this case, as made by the findings, comes within the general rule that where a contract for the sale of real estate, in which time is made of the essence thereof, has been breached by the vendee by the nonpayment of the taxes, the latter can secure relief neither in law nor in equity from the consequences of his default. The rule is stated in 1 Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) § 455, as follows:

> "It is well settled that where the parties have so stipulated as to make the time of payment of the essence of the contract, within the view of equity as well as of the law, a court of equity cannot relieve a vendee who has made default."

From sections 1492 and 3275 of the Civil Code, construed, as they must be, by the light of each other, the same rule is deducible.

The doctrine has been stated and applied by our Supreme Court in several cases, notable among which is that of Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 19, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, the opinion having been prepared by Mr. Justice Henshaw. See, also, Gray v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359; Martin v. Morgan, 87 Cal. 203, 25 Pac. 350, 22 Am. St. Rep. 240; Woodruff v. Semi-Tropic, etc., Co., 87 Cal. 275, 25 Pac. 354; Vorwerk v. Nolte, 87 Cal. 236, 25 Pac. 412; Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. 429; Bennett v. Hyde, 92 Cal. 131, 28 Pac. 104.

[1, 2] There is some language used in the above cases, however, which implies that, even where such a contract expressly or by reasonable inference from its language provides that time is of the essence thereof, relief may be granted from the consequences of the default by the vendee in the payment of the purchase price or any installment thereof, if a showing such as would appeal to equity be made. What is such a showing as would justify equity to interpose its remedial power in favor of the defaulting vendee in such a case none of the cases—at least, none coming under our immediate observation—has pointed out. But, however this all may be, we do not think that the present case falls within the doctrine of the rule above adverted to. The determination of this case, upon the findings as made, rests rather upon the doctrine of estoppel than upon the rule stated by Mr. Pomeroy and applied in the cases above named. Even if it be true that the plaintiff, having received the statement of the taxes assessed against the property for the years 1920 and 1921, and having promised defendant that he would, on receiving the statement, deliver the same to him or let him know the amount of the taxes and when the same were to be paid, did not willfully and fraudulently refuse and fail to deliver to the defendant said statement or inform him of the amount of the taxes against the property and when they were due and payable, as the court found was the fact, still he (the plaintiff) should, under the circumstances as disclosed by the findings, be estopped from asserting his claimed right to have the contract forfeited because of the nonpayment by the defendant of said taxes. This follows from the doctrine of equitable estoppel. This doctrine rests upon the general principle that "when one of two innocent persons—that is, persons each guiltless of an intentional, moral wrong—must suffer a loss, it must be borne by that one of them who by his conduct, acts or omissions, has rendered the injury possible." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 803. We must, however, accept as verity the findings of the court as to the facts of the matter and, so viewing them, it must be accepted as the fact that the conduct of the plaintiff with respect to the nonpayment of the taxes by the defendant was characterized by fraud—that is to say, that he, having received said statement, designedly and with the intent of causing the defendant to become in default in the matter of compliance with a vital provision of the contract, withheld said statement from the latter so that he would forfeit whatever rights he had acquired by reason of the convention.

[3] The law does not favor forfeitures, and a party should not be divested of valuable rights by way of forfeiture for default in complying with the provision of a contract by which those rights have been acquired, unless it is clearly made to appear that the other party to the contract has suffered or will suffer serious detriment or damage by reason of such default, or unless it is made to appear that the default was intentional or willful.

While we are not to be understood as holding to the view that, under certain circumstances, the rule invoked and applied in the above-named cases may not be invoked and applied as to a default by a conditional vendee in failing to pay the taxes assessed against the property which is the subject of a contract of sale of real property and as to the terms and conditions of which time is made an essential, it is, nevertheless, a fact of some significance that the default from the effect of which the defendant here seeks to be relieved is not, like that in the cases above mentioned, in his failure to pay the purchase price of the property within the prescribed time. The taxes, penalties, etc., having finally been paid by the defendant, the plaintiffs have not, as might be true were the default of the defendant in the failure to pay the purchase price, or the interest thereon, within or at the time specified, suffered any injury or damage by reason of the fact that the payment of the taxes was delayed to a time at which they had become delinquent. The only sufferer from the default was the defendant himself, he having, in addition to the taxes, been compelled to pay the fines, penalties, etc., accruing against the property because of the failure to pay the taxes within due and proper time. Nor is there any showing here that the default of the defendant in the payment of the taxes was willful or intentional or the result of gross or any negligence on his part. It has been shown why the taxes were not paid when due and payable, and the defendant testified and the court found that he was at all times willing, ready, and able to pay them and would have done so had he known when to have paid them to prevent their becoming delinquent. In view of all these considerations and of the evidence, of which there has been presented herein a synoptical review, we think the application here of the equitable doctrine of estoppel is peculiarly appropriate. Indeed, to our minds it is manifest that to sanction the forfeiture sought in this case would be to approve a palpable injustice; and it may well be remarked that, since the plaintiffs themselves were the first to breach the provision of the contract making time an essential by failing to install the pumping plant and lay the cement pipe, within the time expressly limited by the contract, they having had from September, 1919, to March, 1, 1920, within which to do so, the equities of the case are certainly with the defendant.

[4, 5] The court permitted the defendant to testify, on direct examination, over objection by counsel for the plaintiffs, that W. D. Collins did not tell him (defendant) when the taxes were payable. The court also allowed the tax collector to state, on cross-examination, over objection by counsel for the plaintiffs, that the taxes had finally been paid, although after they had become delinquent. It is here urged that these rulings were erroneous and prejudicial. We think, as must be implied from the above discussion, that the testimony was competent and pertinent to the issues of the case.

[6] It is contended generally that the oral testimony regarding the matter of the nonpayment of the taxes by the defendant within the time prescribed by law tended to vary the terms of the written contract. This contention is not tenable. The effect of the testimony regarding that matter was not to change or modify the terms of the agreement in any respect. The testimony was intended only to show such an excuse for the defendant's failure to comply within the time required with a vital provision of the agreement as would or might be sufficient to entitle him in equity to be relieved of the consequences thereof.

For the reasons hereinabove stated, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

Ex parte HIXSON. (Cr. 905.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 28, 1923.)

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑10(2)—Municipal ordinance limiting sale of alcoholic liquor as medicine to very small amount not invalid.

A municipal corporation, in the exercise of its police power, may absolutely prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquor as a medicine, and hence an ordinance limiting the amount to be sold to a very small amount cannot be deemed invalid as unreasonable.

2. Constitutional law 🔑81—That article is useful for some purpose does not prevent prohibiting its sale.

Though an article is useful for some purpose, its harmfulness to the public from its general use may be such that legislation of absolute prohibition is warranted.

3. Constitutional law 🔑211—Provision in liquor ordinance as to medical prescriptions not discrimination against alcoholic liquors in favor of drugs.

An ordinance dealing solely with alcoholic liquors, and providing for filling liquor prescriptions, is not objectionable as discriminating between the filling of prescriptions for alcoholic liquors and for drugs and other curative agencies, as one violating an ordinance cannot complain that evils of a different character, but equally pernicious, have not been similarly regulated or prohibited.

4. Intoxicating liquors 🔑6, 13; 🔑2½, New, vol. 8A Key-No. Series—Both state and nation may prohibit use, but cannot nullify Eighteenth Amendment.

The state, or a political subdivision thereof, in the exercise of the police power which is inherent in the state and preserved to it by the tenth amendment to the federal Constitution, and the federal government, in the exercise of the delegated power which it derives from the eighteenth amendment, may each enact laws to secure prohibition, with the one limitation that no legislation can give validity to acts prohibited by the eighteenth amendment, and each may exercise an independent judgment in selecting and shaping measures to enforce prohibition.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑111(4)—Statutes 🔑64(1)—If statute or ordinance valid when enacted, change of conditions invalidating part of enactment does not raise question of partial invalidity.

Where a statute or ordinance is valid when originally enacted, subsequent change of conditions rendering a part invalid does not raise the question of partial or total invalidity, that is, whether the void part carries down the remainder.

6. Intoxicating liquors 🔑132—Volstead Act does not confer rights, but limits and regulates them.

The Volstead Act, enacted pursuant to Const. U. S. Amend. 18, is a prohibition statute solely, and limits and regulates existing rights or privileges, and does not confer any rights.

Application of M. W. Hixson for writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Los Angeles to secure the release of petitioner from custody after conviction of filling a prescription for alcoholic liquor in violation of the Gandier ordinance. Writ denied.

Ray E. Nimmo and Lloyd W. Moultrie, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. D. McConnell, City Prosecutor, J. Friedlander, Asst. City Prosecutor, J. D. Taggart, Deputy City Prosecutor, and S. W. Odell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Petitioner, a licensed pharmacist, doing business in the city of Los Angeles, asks a discharge on habeas corpus from imprisonment under a sentence convicting him of filling a prescription for alcoholic liquor in violation of an initiative measure adopted by the electors of the city and commonly known as the Gandier ordinance. The ordinance was adopted prior to the ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment and the passage of the National Prohibition Law (41 Stat. 305). A complaint was filed in the police court, charging petitioner with filling a physician's prescription calling for more than eight ounces of alcoholic liquor, in violation of the city ordinance. He was convicted in that court, and on his appeal to the superior court the judgment of conviction was affirmed on June 5, 1922—all of which antedated the state law commonly known as the Wright Act. The single question presented for decision is whether the ordinance in so far as it relates to the filling of prescriptions by licensed pharmacists, is valid and enforceable since the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment and the enactment of the National Prohibition Law, commonly known as the Volstead Act.

The Gandier ordinance, so far as its provisions are germane to the question provides:

"Sec. 2. It shall be unlawful to sell, serve, or give away any alcoholic liquor within the city of Los Angeles, except as hereinafter provided. * * * Sec. 5. Nothing in the preceding sections of this ordinance shall be construed as rendering unlawful * * * (c) the filling only, at pharmacies, on the date of issuance, but not the refilling of prescriptions calling for not to exceed eight ounces of alcoholic liquor each. Every such prescription shall be * * * signed * * * by a duly licensed physician, and shall have endorsed upon it by such physician * * * the statement that in his opinion the liquor prescribed is required by such person as a medicine."

The Volstead Act, in section 7, tit. 2, contains this provision:

> "No one but a physician holding a permit to prescribe liquor shall issue any prescription for liquor. * * * Not more than a pint of spirituous liquor to be taken internally shall be prescribed for use by the same person within any period of ten days, and no prescription shall be filled more than once."

It will be noticed that, while the city ordinance limits to eight ounces (half a pint) the amount which may be prescribed and sold at any one time for medicinal use, it places no limitation upon the number of prescriptions which may be made and filled for the same person within any fixed period of time. So that, at the time of the adoption of the ordinance, a physician, if in good faith he deemed it necessary, could every day, and perhaps more than once on every day, issue for any patient a prescription for alcoholic liquor, provided each prescription called for not more than eight ounces. This he could continue to do until such time as his patient no longer needed the stimulant. And it was not unlawful for a licensed pharmacist to fill such daily prescriptions, provided no one of them called for more than eight ounces. It further will be noticed that, though the Volstead Act permits a pint (sixteen ounces) of spirituous liquor to be prescribed by a physician for the use of a patient, not more than that amount may be prescribed for the same person within any period of ten days, and no prescription shall be filled more than once.

We have not deemed it necessary to set forth all of the provisions of the Volstead Act which relate, directly or indirectly, to liquor prescriptions. When all of its provisions are considered, there may be some question as to whether the act permits a physician to issue any number of prescriptions to the same person in any period of ten days, if the aggregate of the amounts so prescribed does not exceed one pint. Petitioner claims that when all the provisions of the National Prohibition Act are read together, that law must be construed as meaning that but one prescription may be issued to the same person within the ten-day period, regardless of whether such prescription calls for a pint or for less than a pint. For the purpose of this decision, but for the purpose of this decision only, we shall assume that in this respect petitioner's construction of the Volstead Act is correct.

At a hearing had before this court on the return made to our writ of habeas corpus, six physicians were examined as expert witnesses for the purpose of aiding us in determining the medicinal value of alcoholic liquors. All of them agreed that such liquors do possess some medicinal value. Some of the physicians testified that there are certain substitutes for alcoholic liquors which make the use of such liquors unnecessary and even undesirable. Others testified that in their opinion there is no substitute which can effectually take the place of alcoholic stimulants in certain cases, as in pneumonia, for example. Of these latter witnesses two or three testified that not even a pint of whisky in ten days (the maximum amount permitted by the Volstead Act) would be sufficient in some cases.

[1] Petitioner's principal contention is that while a state or a political subdivision thereof, in the exercise of its police power, may regulate the sale of alcoholic liquors for medicinal uses, it cannot prohibit their sale for such uses. This proposition constitutes the major premise of petitioner's argument on his first point. He argues that the restrictions in the Gandier ordinance, when taken in conjunction with those in the Volstead Act, so limit the amount of alcoholic liquor which pharmacists in the city of Los Angeles may now sell in filling prescriptions that the combined effect of the operation of the ordinance and the national act has been to prohibit the sale in Los Angeles of an amount of alcoholic liquor sufficient to serve the purposes of a medicine. That is to say, though the Gandier ordinance does not forbid the issuance of more than one prescription to the same person in any period of ten days, it does make it an offense for a pharmacist to fill any single prescription calling for more than eight ounces; and under petitioner's construction of the Volstead Act no physician is allowed to issue more than one prescription for the same person in any ten-day period. Therefore it is claimed that the practical effect of the combined operation of the national act and the city ordinance is to make it unlawful for a licensed pharmacist in the city of Los Angeles to sell to any one person, on a physician's prescription, more than eight ounces of alcoholic liquor in any period of ten days, which amount, it is claimed, is so small as to be valueless for medicinal purposes. Assuming, without conceding, that such is the result of the operation of the city ordinance and the national law, we still do not think that the ordinance has been rendered unreasonable. For reasons presently to be stated, we think that the ordinance would not have been unreasonable and void if it had entirely prohibited the sale of alcoholic liquor as a medicine. And if the city possessed the power entirely to prohibit its sale as a medicine, then, a fortiori, the limitation to eight ounces in ten days, would not have been an unreasonable restriction.

It may be said in limine that if the argument whereby petitioner would strike down the city ordinance be tenable, then his argument would seem to be equally fatal to the national enactment, in so far as the prescription of alcoholic liquor for medicinal use is concerned. For, according to the testimony of petitioner's medical experts, the maximum amount which it is assumed the Volstead Act permits to be prescribed—one pint, or sixteen ounces, in ten days—has but little, if any, more medicinal value than would be possessed by eight ounces administered in the same period of time; and neither amount, according to those witnesses, is sufficient to meet the exigencies of certain cases, as, for example, where the patient has been stricken with pneumonia. But waiving this consideration, and assuming that the restriction which the Volstead Act imposes on the prescription and sale of spirituous liquors for medicinal use is within the authorized powers of Congress under the Eighteenth Amendment—and we are fully convinced that it is—and assuming also that petitioner's construction of the National Prohibition Law is correct, still we do not agree with his premise that a municipal corporation, in the exercise of its police power, may not absolutely prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquor as a medicine.

That the state, or any political subdivision thereof vested with local police power, may prohibit all traffic in intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes is no longer a debatable proposition. It is possible that such drastic prohibitory legislation, however well-intentioned, may prove to be a Pandora's box from which may escape new and unforeseen social ills to afflict humanity. But that is a consideration to be addressed solely to the lawmaking branch of the government. With it the courts have no concern.

Not only may the sale of intoxicants as beverages be prohibited, but it also is well established that a state, or any of its political subdivisions invested with local police power, may adopt such measures having a real or substantial relation to the suppression of traffic in intoxicating beverages as it may deem necessary for that purpose in order to make its action effective. And though alcoholic liquor when used for certain purposes may be beneficial and useful, still its sale even for such beneficial and useful purposes may be prohibited if it can be seen that prohibitory measures of that nature have a real and substantial relation to the suppression of all traffic in intoxicants for beverage purposes. In Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch, 226 U. S. 192, 33 Sup. Ct. 44, 57 L. Ed. 184, the United States Supreme Court stated the principle as follows:

> "That the state in the exercise of its police power may prohibit the selling of intoxicating liquors is undoubted. [Citing authorities.] It is also well established that, when a state, exerting its recognized authority undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction, separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the government. [Citing authorities.] With the wisdom of the exercise of that judgment the court has no concern; and unless it clearly appears that the enactment has no substantial relation to a proper purpose, it cannot be said that the limit of legislative power has been transcended."

See, also, People v. Velarde, 45 Cal. App. 520, 188 Pac. 59.

If wine, whisky, brandy, and the like are useful for medicinal and other nonbeverage purposes, still the evils which flow from their use as a beverage so greatly menace the health, peace, morals, and safety of society that the lawmaking branch of the government may with reason regard those evils as overwhelmingly outweighing the good services which such liquors may perform as medicines. If experience shows that the sale of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes opens the door to that train of evils which admittedly follows upon their general use as beverages, then why may not their use as medicines be absolutely prohibited? That the sale of such liquors for medicinal purposes does greatly facilitate the evasion of the whole scheme of prohibitory legislation is a matter of common notoriety. A city's entire scheme of prohibition might fail if pharmacists were to be permitted to sell alcoholic liquors for medicinal use. And because this is so, the city of Los Angeles, had it deemed it wise and expedient, could have forbidden the sale of such liquors as medicines, even though such sales, regarded as separate transactions, might be entirely innocuous.

[2] The fallacy of petitioner's position lies in the assumption that if an article is useful for any purpose its sale cannot be wholly forbidden. But notwithstanding an article may be useful for some purposes, its harmfulness to the public from its general use may be so great and widespread and its secret disposition may be so difficult to prevent that the Legislature, to protect the public, may absolutely forbid its manufacture or sale, or both, so as effectually to root out its evil effects altogether.

Though no case directly in point has been called to our attention, the principles announced in the following decisions of the United States Supreme Court are determinative: Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. Ed. 929; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. Ed. 989; Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 205, 5 Sup. Ct. 8, 97, 28 L. Ed. 696; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 8 Sup. Ct. 273, 31 L. Ed. 205; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 9 Sup. Ct. 6, 32 L. Ed. 346; Powell v. Pennsylvania, 127 U. S. 678, 8 Sup. Ct. 992, 1257, 32 L. Ed. 253; Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S. 425, 22 Sup. Ct. 425, 46 L. Ed. 623; Otis v. Parker, 187 U. S. 606, 23 Sup. Ct. 168, 47 L. Ed. 323, and Ah Sin v. Wittman, 198 U. S. 500, 25 Sup. Ct. 756, 49 L. Ed. 1142.

In Mugler v. Kansas the court went so far as to say that a state might prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors by a person for his own use, if, in the judgment of the Legislature, such a measure is necessary. In Kidd v. Pearson the doctrines laid down in Mugler v. Kansas were approved and reaffirmed. Powell v. Pennsylvania directly presented the question of absolute prohibition, and the decision was in favor of the measure. That the substance in question in that case was oleomargarine cannot alter the principle, because it is conceded that the article was in itself useful, and not at all harmful. The reason of the prohibition was the great danger of fraud in its being mistaken for real butter. But there is nothing which is the subject of so much fraud as the sale of intoxicating liquors. Even physicians have been prosecuted for giving fraudulent prescriptions in order to assist their "patients" in obtaining intoxicating liquors unlawfully; and as to the frauds of druggists in handling liquors, it is said, in the Druggist Cases, 85 Tenn. 458, 3 S. W. 490, that the evasions of the law are frequent and notorious.

In Booth v. Illinois the court, having under examination the Illinois statute prohibiting options to buy or sell grain or other commodities at a future time, said:

> "The argument then is, that the statute directly forbids the citizen from pursuing a calling which, in itself, involves no element of immorality, and therefore by such prohibition it invades his liberty as guaranteed by the supreme law of the land. Does this conclusion follow from the premise stated? Is it true that the Legislature is without power to forbid or suppress a particular kind of business, where such business, properly and honestly conducted, may not, in itself, be immoral? We think not. A calling may not in itself be immoral, and yet the tendency of what is generally or ordinarily or often done in pursuing that calling may be towards that which is admittedly immoral or pernicious. If, looking at all the circumstances that attend, or which may ordinarily attend, the pursuit of a particular calling, the state thinks that certain admitted evils cannot be successfully reached unless that calling be actually prohibited, the courts cannot interfere, unless, looking through mere forms and at the substance of the matter, they can say that the statute enacted professedly to protect the public morals has no real or substantial relation to that object, but is a clear, unmistakable infringement of rights secured by the fundamental law."

As having further bearing upon the right which the city would have had to prohibit absolutely the sale of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes, reference may be made to the following cases: State v. Fabbri, 98 Wash. 207, 167 Pac. 133, L. R. A. 1918A, 416; Re Crane, 27 Idaho, 671, 151 Pac. 1006, L. R. A. 1918A, 942 (affirmed in 245 U. S. 304, 38 Sup. Ct. 98, 62 L. Ed. 304); Schmitt v. Cook Brewing Co., 187 Ind. 623, 120 N. E. 19, 3 A. L. R. 270; Cureton v. State, 135 Ga. 660, 70 S. E. 332, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 182; Delaney v. Plunkett, 146 Ga. 547, 91 S. E. 561, L. R. A. 1917D, 926, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 685; Woods v. City of Seattle (D. C.) 270 Fed. 315; Page v. United States (C. C. A.) 278 Fed. 41; Piel Bros. v. Day (D. C.) 278 Fed. 223; Falstaff Corp. v. Allen (D. C.) 278 Fed. 643, and Massey v. United States (C. C. A.) 281 Fed. 293. Though none of these decisions is directly in point, their reasoning is persuasive and tends to uphold our conclusion.

Of all the cases to which our attention has been called, none is so nearly in point as State v. Durein, 70 Kan. 1, 78 Pac. 152, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 908 (affirmed in 208 U. S. 613, 28 Sup. Ct. 567, 52 L. Ed. 645), and Motlow v. State, 125 Tenn. 547, 145 S. W. 177, L. R. A. 1916F, 177. True, much that is said in these cases respecting the right to prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquors as medicines is dictum. But the reasoning of the Kansas and Tennessee courts in these cases, even though much of it be dictum, is so cogent and logical as to form a solid foundation for the proposition that a city possessing local police power may entirely prohibit the sale of alcoholic liquor for a medicinal use.

In State v. Durein the Kansas court, from whose opinion we shall quote in extenso, states in the following forceful language the law which is determinative here:

> "The commodity in controversy is intoxicating liquor. It is not corn, or rye, or hops, or grapes, or any other product, the cultivation and use of which minister to the normal and necessary wants of mankind. * * * But the article is one whose use, even moderately, is taken into account by actuaries of insurance companies, and which bars employment in classes of service involving prudent and careful conduct; an article conceded to be fraught with such contagious peril to society that it occupies a different status before the courts and the Legislatures from other kinds of property, and places traffic in it upon a different plane from other kinds of business. There is, therefore, no question in this case of the power of the Legislature to say generally what beverages men shall drink, or what they shall eat or wear, or when they shall rise or retire. The discussion must deal solely with a distinct article of trade, which already has earned a certain measure of reproach among civilized peoples. * * * It is true that intoxicating liquors may be devoted to sacramental, medical, scientific and mechanical uses, all conducive to the welfare of society. But this fact does not remove the stigma which has been fixed upon them. Intoxicating liquor is intoxicating liquor still, whether it be employed before the altar, at the bedside, in the laboratory, in the manufactory, or in the saloon. It is still the prolific source, of disease, misery, pauperism, vice, and crime. Its power to weaken, corrupt, debauch and slay human character and human life is not destroyed or impaired because it may be susceptible of some innocent uses, or may be used with propriety on some occasions. The health, morals, peace and safety of the community at large are still threatened, and under the form of government established for this state, and for the union of states of which it is a member, those are special subjects of local legislative cognizance. * * * The manufacture and sale of property in itself wholesome and harmless may be entirely prohibited merely to prevent deception and fraud. * * * In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, * * * the private right to manufacture liquor for the producer's own individual use was contended for, a right of equal rank with that of manufacturing or selling for medical, scientific or mechanical purposes. But the court said: 'It will be observed that the proposition, and the argument made in support of it, equally conceded that the right to manufacture drink for one's own personal use is subject to the condition that such manufacture does not endanger or affect the rights of others. If such manufacture does prejudicially affect the rights and interests of the community, it follows, from the very premises stated, that society has the power to protect itself, by legislation, against the injurious consequences of that business.' * * * It is said, however, that in no case has it been decided that the sale of intoxicating liquors for medical, scientific and mechanical purposes may be entirely prohibited, when that was the question under discussion. But the principles announced are determinative of that question. Power to legislate for the health, morals, peace and good order of society being conceded to the Legislature, that body must determine the limits of its exercise, subject only to the condition that the measures adopted be reasonably appropriate to effect its purposes, and upon this question the court will rarely substitute its judgment for that of the Legislature. * * * No body of men can be so well informed regarding the composition, character and distribution of the state's citizenship, the origin, habits, customs, culture and ideals of the people, the modifying influences of their environment, the scope and possibilities of their industries, and all other facts relating to their welfare as a distinct political entity, as representatives of those people chosen from the various localities of the territory concerned. They understand better than any court possibly can the evils chargeable to the presence of intoxicating liquors among their own constituents; they know the extent to which intoxicating liquors are used and may be used by their own people, as medicine and in lawful business pursuits; they are able to judge what are and what are not desirable means to desirable ends; and if in their judgment, high license, low license, local option, state monopoly and all other methods of regulation and restraint are fruitless measures for the protection of the health, morals, peace and safety of the state against the use of intoxicating liquors; if under the best possible regulations drug stores or other dispensaries become in fact saloons; if such records of sales as are made at those places reek with rottenness; if by such expedients the door is merely opened to deception and fraud and perjury; if unpreventable infractions of the best liquor law devisable lead to a general disregard of law and contempt for its enforcement and administration; and if drunkenness still remains common—the Legislature may banish the traffic altogether. Whether as a matter of policy, the Legislature ought to go to any such length, the courts have no right to say. That it has the power, under the law, to do so, the courts cannot, under the law, do otherwise than declare."

In Motlow v. State, supra, the Tennessee court, after an exhaustive review of the authorities, state and federal, said that the weight of authority is in favor of total prohibition—a "Bone Dry" law—and against the proposition advanced by Freund and some other text writers to the effect that the Legislature does not possess the power to prohibit the prescription and sale of alcoholic liquors for medical use. There the court said:

"The fallacy of the whole argument [the argument that the thing prohibited must be in itself harmful and incapable of a harmless use] is in the assumption that, if an article is useful for any purpose, it cannot be wholly forbidden, no matter how greatly its evil capabilities and actual uses overbalance the good purposes it serves. The Legislature is the judge of the times and occasions when public danger threatens, and it is for the courts to apply the test of the constitutional limitations and restrictions, and these must be applied with a careful and discriminating judgment. * * * We are referred to section 223 of Freund's Police Power for the statement that the power of the Legislature to prohibit the prescription and sale of liquor to be used as a medicine does not exist, and that the exercise of this power would be purely arbitrary, based upon Sarrls v. Com., 83 Ky. 327. The legislation in question does not contain that prohibition, because the proviso permits the sale of alcohol which may be used for medicinal purposes. However, the weight of authority is against even this proposition, and in favor of total prohibition, as we shall presently show. Other text writers declare the right of absolute prohibition."

From the principles underlying the foregoing cases, it is apparent that though the sale of alcoholic liquors for medicinal purposes may not be in itself noxious, nevertheless the city of Los Angeles could have prohibited such sales because of the great opportunity afforded thereby for aiding those whose purpose and desire is to violate those provisions of the ordinance which prohibit the sale of intoxicants as beverages. Legislation prohibiting the sale of alcoholic liquor for medicinal use might be repugnant to our sense of justice, or it might even be regarded as unnecessarily oppressive to those desiring to use alcoholic liquor for that purpose; but if that is all which may be said against it, the appeal must be to the Legislature or to the ballot box, not to the judiciary. "This court," says the Supreme Court of Indiana in Schmitt v. Cook Brewing Co., supra, "has nothing to do with the wisdom or unwisdom of the legislative act. A law may be repugnant to general principles of justice, liberty and rights not expressed in the constitution, and yet the courts have no power to strike it down."

In support of his contention that the city does not possess the power to prohibit the prescription and sale of intoxicating liquor to be used as a medicine, petitioner cites us to Freund on Police Power (sections 222 and 223); Tiedeman on State and Federal Control of Persons and Property (page 512 of 1900 Ed.); Town of Selma v. Brewer, 9 Cal. App. 70, 98 Pac. 61; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 96 Ky. 166, 28 S. W. 786, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 360, 33 L. R. A. 839; McNulty v. Toof, 116 Ky. 202, 75 S. W. 258, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 430; Sarrls v. Commonwealth, 83 Ky. 327; and Ex. parte Cowert, 92 Ala. 94, 9 South. 225.

That the opinions of Freund and Tiedeman respecting the power to prohibit the prescription and sale of alcoholic liquor for medicinal purposes are unsound and fallacious is so clearly shown by the Tennessee Supreme Court in its able and exhaustive treatment of the subject in Motlow v. State, supra, that it would be supererogatory for us to attempt to add to that court's pregnant criticisms.

Town of Selma v. Brewer, supra, presented a question as to the true interpretation of a municipal ordinance. According to the sweeping terms of one of its sections, the ordinance under consideration in that case purported to make the keeping, possessing, or storing of intoxicating liquors unlawful, without any express reference to the disposition to be made of them by the keeper or possessor. In view of other provisions in the ordinance, this sweeping inhibition against keeping, possessing, and storing was construed as intended to prohibit the storing or possessing of such liquor with a view to engaging in its unlawful sale. What was said in that case about the lack of power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors for medicinal use was not necessary to the decision, and was pure dictum. Nor was any attempt made to buttress the dictum by the citation of those authorities wherein the courts have discussed the principles of constitutional law which underlie the question. For these reasons we do not accept that decision as authority here. In each of the Kentucky cases cited by petitioner, the court upheld the particular statutory provision under which the accused was charged. What was said in those cases respecting the unconstitutionality of an inhibition against the sale of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes was, therefore, dictum pure and simple, and is not to be taken as authority upon the question before us. The same may be said of the Alabama case cited by petitioner—Ex parte Cowert. Like the Kentucky cases, it makes no attempt to sustain its dictum by reasoning based on any generally recognized principles of constitutional law applicable to the enactment of prohibitory legislation.

Concluding, as we do, that the city of Los Angeles, had it chosen to exercise the power, might have prohibited in the first instance all sales of alcoholic liquor as a medicine, it cannot be held that the city's restriction upon the filling of prescriptions by pharmacists has been so far augmented by the National Prohibition Law that it has now become unreasonable and void.

[3] Petitioner's second point is that subdivision c of section 5 of the Gandier ordinance—the subdivision relating to the filling of prescriptions by pharmacists—discriminates unlawfully between the filling of prescriptions for alcoholic liquors and the filling of prescriptions for drugs or other curative agencies. There is no merit in the contention. The ordinance deals only with alcoholic liquors. It is possible that there are ordinances of the city, not placed before us, which regulate in a similar manner the sale of drugs and narcotics. But even if the sale of drugs, poisons, and narcotics has not been similarly regulated, the ordinance in question does not arbitrarily discriminate between the sales of such articles and the sale of alcoholic liquors as medicines. No reasonable person will dispute the proposition that in view of the many evils which are peculiar to the consumption of intoxicating liquors regulations may be made which are specially applicable to the sale thereof. Police laws need not necessarily be omnibus in their character; and it is permissible to legislate against one form of evil even though other and similar evils have not been condemned. A person guilty of violating an ordinance regulating or prohibiting an evil of one character cannot complain that evils of a different character, but equally pernicious, have not been similarly regulated or prohibited.

> "The discriminations which are open to objection are those where persons engaged in the same business are subjected to different restrictions, or are held entitled to different privileges under the same conditions. It is only then that the discrimination can be said to impair that equal right which all can claim in the enforcement of the laws." Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145.

Thus, in Maguire v. Reardon, 41 Cal. App. 596, 183 Pac. 303, it was held that an ordinance which provides for the general demolition and removal of wooden buildings within the city's fire limits is not open to the objection that it is discriminatory because it does not refer to buildings made of other inflammable material. And in Philadelphia v. Brabender, 201 Pa. 574, 51 Atl. 374, 58 L. R. A. 220, it was held that an ordinance which prohibits the casting of handbills and advertisements into the vestibules of dwellings, although excepting newspapers and addressed envelopes, does not impair equal rights or make an unlawful discrimination. See also, Butte v. Paltrovich, 30 Mont. 18, 75 Pac. 521, 104 Am. St. Rep. 698, and Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 422, 132 Pac. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248, affirmed in 239 U. S. 394, 36 Sup. Ct. 143, 60 L. Ed. 348, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 927.

It next is urged that the main purpose of the Gandier ordinance was to permit or legalize the sale of certain kinds of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, such as light wines and beers; that the legalization of the sale of these alcoholic liquors for beverage purposes has been rendered invalid by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act; that subdivision c of section 5 of the ordinance was intended to be but an auxiliary provision—a mere incident to the authorization of the sale of beers and wines; and that this auxiliary provision would not have been enacted as a separate and independent regulatory measure, but only as an incident to what counsel are pleased to declare is the main purpose of the ordinance. From these premises it is argued that because what counsel claim was the main purpose of the ordinance—the legalization of the sale of light wines and beers—has been made illegal by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act, the whole ordinance has become a nullity, and the auxiliary provision contained in subdivision c of section 5 falls with the rest. There is no merit in the contention.

One vice of petitioner's argument lies in the assumption that the main purpose of the ordinance was to legalize the sale of certain kinds of liquors—light wines and beers. On the contrary, its main purpose seems to have been prohibitory. In section 1 of the ordinance it is expressly declared that "it shall be unlawful to establish, maintain, or conduct within the city of Los Angeles any * * * place in which, or in connection with which, alcoholic liquor is sold, served, or given away, except as hereinafter provided." Section 2 provides that it "shall be unlawful to sell, serve, or give away any alcoholic liquor within the city of Los Angeles, except as hereinafter provided." Section 5 provides that nothing in the preceding sections "shall be construed as rendering unlawful" any of the following acts: The service of alcoholic liquors in private homes; the use of wine for sacramental purposes; the filling of prescriptions at pharmacies; the sale of pure alcohol by registered pharmacists for scientific or medicinal purposes; the sale between specified hours "of not less than one-fifth of a gallon of vinous and malt alcoholic liquors in sealed or corked containers or closed packages" at any place within a certain designated zone, provided the same shall not be consumed on the premises where sold; and the service of vinous and malt alcoholic liquors with bona fide meals at a club, restaurant, or hotel, the proprietor whereof holds a valid license. In section 9 it is provided that the term "vinous and malt alcoholic liquors" shall include all malted and fermented liquors which do not contain more than 14 per cent. by volume of alcohol, and which do not contain any distilled spirits.

[4] It will be noticed that the ordinance nowhere says that it shall be "lawful" to sell vinous or malt alcoholic liquors, or any kind of intoxicating liquor. What the ordinance does say is that the general and sweeping prohibitory provisions in sections 1 and 2, banning traffic in all alcoholic liquor, shall not be construed as rendering "unlawful" the specifically designated exceptions to those comprehensive prohibitory provisions. In other words, without intending affirmatively to legalize the sale of any intoxicating liquor, the ordinance, read as a whole, makes it unlawful to sell any but certain specified kinds of liquor or liquors used for certain defined purposes. Prohibition of traffic in certain kinds of strong drink is the principal object sought by the ordinance. The only criticism which might be made is that, while prohibition is the ordinance's main purpose, its inhibitions do not cover all of the zone now occupied by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act. That, however, does not affect the validity of the ordinance's prohibitory features, nor does it affect such of its regulatory provisions as are not in conflict with the Eighteenth Amendment or the Volstead Act. Every inhibitory provision of the ordinance, including that which forbids the filling of a medical prescription calling for more than eight ounces of alcoholic liquor, may stand without obstructing or embarrassing the execution of the act of Congress. Thus, for example, the city could inflict the penal sanctions of the ordinance upon pharmacists who fill prescriptions calling for more than eight ounces of liquor, without in any wise interfering with the authority of the federal officials to invoke the penalties prescribed by Congress if these same pharmacists should aid and abet a physician in violating that provision of the national law which makes it unlawful to prescribe for the same person more than one pint of intoxicating liquor in any period of ten days. The state, or a political subdivision thereof, in the exercise of the police power which is inherent in the state and perserved to it by the Tenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, and the federal government, in the exercise of the delegated power which it derives from the Eighteenth Amendment, may each enact laws to secure prohibition, with the one limitation that no legislation can give validity to acts prohibited by the Eighteenth Amendment. Each may exercise an independent judgment in selecting and shaping measures to enforce prohibition. These measures may vary in many particulars, but this is an inseparable incident of independent legislative action in distinct jurisdictions. United States v. Lanza, 43 Sup. Ct. 141, 67 L. Ed. ——.

[5] It also is urged that those provisions of the ordinance which declare that the sale of wines and beers shall not be unlawful—permissive provisions which were nullified by the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act—are so intimately interwoven with the other provisions of the ordinance that it must be assumed that the electors who voted for this initiative measure intended that the whole ordinance should fall if its provisions permitting the sale of wines and beers should subsequently be nullified by the paramount power of the federal government. We can see no merit in the contention. This is not a case where some parts of a whole statute or of a whole ordinance were beyond the legislative power when originally enacted. Where some substantial part of a law is unconstitutional and void when the law is first enacted, the rule is that the whole statute or the whole ordinance will fall if all of its parts are so mutually connected with and dependent on each other as to warrant the belief that the lawmakers intended them as a whole and that if all could not be carried into effect the residue would not have been passed independently. That rule is not applicable here. When this ordinance was adopted, all of its provisions were valid and strictly within the constitutional power of the city and of the electors who voted upon it as an initiative measure. As was said by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 302, 128 N. E. 282, 10 A. L. R. 1583, addressing itself to a similar proposition:

> "It [the state statute] was all operative and valid, and strictly within the constitutional power of the Legislature when enacted. The point now is to ascertain whether the parts under which the present complaint is brought still remain valid and enforceable. This point is not the same which would arise where a whole statute has been enacted, some parts of which are beyond legislative power under then-existing constitutional provisions."

The rule that the whole statute will fall if, when passed, some of its parts are unconstitutional, and if all of its parts are so dependent upon each other as to warrant the belief that the Legislature intended them as a whole, rests upon the presumed intent of the lawmakers. But here the intent of those who made this ordinance a city by-law must be ascertained as of the time when they voted for its adoption. At that time this initiative measure, in all of its parts, was a valid expression of the electors' legislative will and intent. Then the ordinance was altogether impregnable in its constitutional aspects, and there was then a complete and valid expression of the intent of the lawmakers. The precise question, therefore, is: How much of a statute or of an ordinance, perfectly valid throughout at the time of its adoption, remains enforceable when, since its adoption, a superior power has supervened with a fundamental governing law at variance with some of its terms? Such a situation is analogous to that where, after the passage of some perfectly valid and enforceable law, a change takes place in the conditions obtaining in the field of the law's activities, such, for example, as a change in certain physical facts, so that the practical enforcement of the law in all of its aspects is no longer a physical possibility. Such supervening alteration in the law's environment might afford a reason for its repeal by the lawmaking body, or a reason for its amendment to conform to the altered conditions, but it can afford no ground for judicial repeal.

The principle declared in Re Rahrer, 140 U. S. 545, 564, 565, 11 Sup. Ct. 865, 35 L. Ed. 572, is applicable here. There it was held that a state statute, invalid at the time of its enactment for the reason that it infringed upon the federal power, was rendered valid and enforceable without re-enactment simply by the subsequent passage of an act of Congress removing an impediment to the enforcement of the state law, and thus conferring jurisdiction in that particular upon the states. That decision upholds this ordinance to the extent to which we have decided it to be operative. In Commonwealth v. Nickerson, supra, will be found a logical and convincing discussion of this question. See, also, Ex parte Pappas (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 483.

[6] Petitioner's final point is based upon a recent decision of the Florida Supreme Court —Hall v. Moran, 81 Fla. 706, 89 South. 104. Because the Volstead Act expressly permits physicians to prescribe for any one person one pint of spirituous liquor in any period of ten days, petitioner claims that there is thereby granted by Congress to citizens of the United States a "right" or a "privilege" which is protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, and that no state or political subdivision thereof may abridge such right or privilege. The decision of the Florida Supreme Court in Hall v. Moran, supra, seems to lend support to this proposition. We are unable to agree with the reasoning of that case. Because the Volstead Act declares that "it shall not be unlawful to possess liquors in one's private dwelling" for personal consumption by the owner, his family and guests, the Florida court held that permission was given by Congress to possess liquors, and that such permission confers "a federal right in the nature of a 'privilege' to lawfully possess, and an 'immunity' from punishment for such lawful possession"; and that a state statute making it unlawful for any one to have in his possession more than a certain defined quantity of liquor is a denial or curtailment of the "right" so conferred by Congress, and perhaps is also a violation of that provision of the Fourteenth Amendment which declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States."

The vice of this argument, as we view it, lies in its assumption that Congress may grant the "right" to possess intoxicating liquors. The Eighteenth Amendment—the sole source of the power of Congress to deal directly with the liquor traffic—is a prohibitory, not a permissive, amendment. It declares that "the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors * * * for beverage purposes is * * * prohibited"; and by the second section of the amendment Congress is given power to enforce such national prohibition by appropriate legislation. There is here no grant to Congress of the power to create or confer any "right" to possess intoxicating liquors. The sole power granted to Congress is the power to enforce the federal prohibition contemplated by the amendment. In the exercise of its power to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating beverages, Congress unquestionably may regulate the possession of such liquors for private use, since the regulation of such possession has a substantial relation to the enforcement of the prohibition aimed at by the amendment. Page v. United States, supra. But its power so to regulate the possession of liquors is but an incident to its power to prohibit. Its power to regulate possession for private use exists solely because such regulation of possession is an appropriate means whereby the expressly granted power to prohibit the manufacture, sale, and transportation may be effectively carried into execution. So far from being the grant of a right, the congressional regulation of possession is a limitation upon right or privilege. It is a limitation upon that privilege of possessing liquors which, but for the federal regulation, would be unlimited, save in so far as it might be limited by state legislation. It is absurd to say that Congress, merely because it has the power to regulate the possession of intoxicating beverages as an incident to its expressly granted power to prohibit their manufacture, sale, and transportation, confers a "right" when, by appropriate regulatory provisions, it places limitations upon the privilege of possessing liquors.

We quite agree with the ruling of Judge Neterer in Woods v. City of Seattle, supra (D. C.) 270 Fed. 315, where it was held that the Eighteenth Amendment and the national prohibition act confer no right to sell Jamaica ginger in quantities not prohibited by the act, but were intended as limitations upon the privilege, and that, therefore, a state, under its police power, can prohibit sales in such quantities as are permitted by the National Prohibition Act. That was a case brought by a duly registered druggist to enjoin the defendants from interfering with the sale of Jamaica ginger, the sale whereof was made unlawful by a city ordinance. Under a regulation of the commissioner, authorized by the National Prohibition Act, druggists are permitted to sell Jamaica ginger in quantities exceeding one or two ounces at a time. In the course of his opinion Judge Neterer says: "The plaintiff asserts that article 18, supra, [the Eighteenth Amendment] and the National Prohibition Act grant him a right to do except that which is prohibited, and that this right overrides all police power of the state with relation to intoxicants. In this the plaintiff is in error. Instead of granting a right, the amendment and the Volstead Act are limitations upon privilege."

The writ is discharged, and the petitioner is remanded.

I concur: CRAIG, J.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment, but I am not in accord with the views expressed by the majority opinion in making disposition of the first point discussed therein. Considering the importance of the question mentioned, it is proper that I should state the grounds upon which I decline to concur in those views, presenting them in outline only, and not with the assiduity which characterizes the treatment of the subject in the majority opinion. I shall then state, with great brevity, the reasons which impel me to concur in the judgment.

If any proposition of law is well settled, in most jurisdictions, at least, it is that every person has the constitutional right to resort to such established and legalized school or system of healing as he pleases for relief from his ailments. When men differ, in opinion merely, as to the efficiency of different schools or systems, it is not a proper subject of legislation to attempt to control or limit the right of any to act pursuant to his opinions or beliefs by resorting to the school or system of his choice. Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 10 N. E. 97, 58 Am. Rep. 400; State v. Liffring, 61 Ohio St. 39, 55 N. E. 168, 46 L. R. A. 334, 76 Am. St. Rep. 358; State v. Biggs, 133 N. C. 729, 46 S. E. 401, 64 L. R. A. 139, 98 Am. St. Rep. 731; State v. Smith, 25 Idaho, 541, 138 Pac. 1107; Bishop on Stat. Crimes, sec. 988a; Freund, Police Power, sec. 16. As having a general bearing upon the question, see, also, State v. Gravett, 65 Ohio St. 289, 62 N. E. 325, 55 L. R. A. 791, 87 Am. St. Rep. 605; Louisiana State Board v. Charpentier, 140 La. 405, 73 South. 248; American School v. McAnnulty, 187 U. S. 94, 23 Sup. Ct. 33, 47 L. Ed. 90. This principle has found frequent expression, not only in the cases cited, but in others, at the suit of the homeopath, the eclectic, the osteopath, the chiropractor, and the Christian Scientist.

A necessary corollary to the proposition just stated, so it seems to me, is that one may not be deprived, constitutionally, of his right to have alcoholic beverages prescribed for him as a medicine. If one may resort, without fear of legislative interference, to the duly qualified practitioners under the system in which that one believes, it must be true that he is also entitled, without fear of such interference, to use the medicines which his practitioner prescribes, as well as to submit himself to the rubbings or massage, or insist upon the benefit of the prayers, which are a part of the practitioner's system. Of what value is the patient's right to resort to the practitioner if he may be denied the services of the latter after he is called? Of what value is that right if the patient may be denied the medicines which the practitioner prescribes for his relief, whether alcohol or hot water? It appears to me, at least so far as the expressions of the majority opinion to the contrary are concerned, that a patient must have the constitutional right to resort, without stint or limitation, except as imposed by the practitioner in his prescriptions, to the medicine in which the school of the honest and qualified physician believes.

I am, therefore, impelled to the view that certain authorities which the majority opinion discredits are closer to the instant case than are those which it follows. The authorities which I have in mind are the ones to the effect that the legislative department may not prohibit the prescription and sale of intoxicating liquor as a medicine. See Sarrls v. Commonwealth, 83 Ky. 327; Commonwealth v. Fowler, 96 Ky. 166, 28 S. W. 786, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 360, 33 L. R. A. 839; McNulty v. Toof, 116 Ky. 202, 75 S. W. 258, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 430; Ex parte Cowert, 92 Ala. 94, 9 South. 225; Town of Selma v. Brewer, 9 Cal. App. 70, 98 Pac. 61; Freund, Police Power, §§ 222, 223; Tiedeman, State and Federal Control of Persons and Property, § 122. It is clear to me that if these authorities state the law it logically follows that the amount to be sold cannot be limited by legislation. If it be conceded that the physician may prescribe and the patient use a certain drug, it must be true that the physician must be allowed a free and untrammeled judgment to determine the quantity to be prescribed and used. If he may not exercise that judgment the patient is deprived of his services, for if in the opinion of the physician a given quantity of any drug is necessary to a healing, for him to be forced to prescribe less were as if he were forbidden to prescribe at all.

Notwithstanding all that I have said above, there are at least two decisions of the Supreme Court which appear to me to preclude the application of the principles to which I have referred. They are Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 226, 24 Pac. 383, and French v. Davidson, 143 Cal. 658, 77 Pac. 663, and they establish the rule that compulsory vaccination laws are constitutional. There are certain differences between those cases and the one now before us, but it does not appear to me that the differences are such as to render the cases inapplicable here. It is upon those two cases alone that I base my present concurrence.

BUELL v. BUELL. (S. F. 9736.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 21, 1923. Rehearing Denied May 21, 1923.)

1. Trusts 🔑86—Trust presumed to result in favor of one paying consideration for realty taken in another's name.

Ordinarily, when a transfer of real property is made to one person and the consideration paid by another, a trust is presumed under Civ. Code, § 853, to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made.

2. Trusts 🔑89(4)—Trust held not to have resulted, though consideration paid by another.

Evidence of real estate transaction by real estate broker as confidential agent for his mother, from which a personal profit was realized by him held sufficient to establish that, though he paid the consideration passed under a certain contract of sale taken in his mother's name no trust resulted in his favor, the payment having been made pursuant to an agreement that the property should be hers in place of property previously conveyed to him without consideration.

3. Trusts 🔑103(2)—Real estate broker, as confidential agent for his mother, trading equity in contract of another for property taken in his name held trustee for her.

Where a real estate broker, acting as confidential agent for his mother has paid the consideration passed in a contract of sale and taken title in his mother's name in settlement of amounts due her, and thereafter traded her equity in the contract of sale for other property which he took in his own name, held, that he must be deemed to hold in trust for her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by E. E. Buell against R. L. Buell, as administratrix of the estate of E. S. Buell, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Everts, Ewing & Wild and J. R. Fitch, all of Fresno, for appellant.

L. N. Barber and W. N. Gilliam, both of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to obtain a judgment impressing a trust on certain property in Fresno county. The court granted the relief prayed for, and the defendant appeals from the judgment.

The plaintiff is the mother of E. S. Buell, deceased, and the defendant is his surviving widow and the administratrix of his estate. The plaintiff had entered into a contract for the purchase of certain real estate referred to in the record as the Columbia Colony property, and her equity in this property, it appears, was given in exchange for a one-third interest in certain property in the town of Reedley, referred to as the Reedley garage, the deed to which upon the consummation of the exchange was taken in the name of the deceased. It appears that all of the consideration which had been paid upon the contract for the purchase of the Columbia Colony property was in the form of the conveyance by the deceased of property standing in his name valued at the sum of $2,800. It is therefore contended by his administratrix that he having furnished this consideration, the plaintiff must be deemed to have held the contract as trustee for him, and that when he traded said property for the Reedley garage he had the right to take title thereto in his own name, and that he was the owner thereof at the time of his death.

[1, 2] Passing the proposition as contended for by plaintiff that the doctrine of a resulting trust does not apply to an executory contract of sale (Green v. Drummond, 31 Md. 71, 1 Am. Rep. 14), we agree with the defendant that ordinarily, when a transfer of real property is made to one person and the consideration therefor is paid by another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made. Section 853, Civ. Code. But in the present case the evidence is ample to sustain the findings of the trial court that the property standing in the name of the deceased and which furnished the consideration for the contract of purchase of the Columbia Colony property belonged to the plaintiff, and that the same was conveyed to the vendors of the Columbia Colony property, with the understanding between the plaintiff and the deceased that it should be in settlement of the account between the parties, and that the title to the Columbia Colony property should be taken by and vest in the plaintiff. Under these circumstances it cannot be said that the property in litigation was held in trust by the plaintiff for her son.

The findings, in part, are as follows: The contract for the Columbia Colony property was executed by the plaintiff December 20, 1918, by which the vendors thereof agreed to sell it to the plaintiff for the sum of $8,000, $2,800 of which was paid at the time of the execution of the contract, "and that all right, title, interest, and equity of the purchaser thereunder was, and at all times hereinafter mentioned, remained the property of plaintiff; that neither E. S. Buell, now deceased, nor his estate, had any right, title, or interest therein or thereto"; and the court further finds that the exchange for the Reedley garage property was negotiated by defendant's intestate at the request of plaintiff and as her agent, and that the title to this property was taken by him against her will and without her knowledge or consent. The court then finds that the first payment of $2,800 on the Columbia Colony property was made by defendant's intestate, but "was so paid for the use and benefit of the plaintiff and under and in pursuance of an agreement between the plaintiff and said E. S. Buell that the property so purchased should be her property." The court then makes a specific finding of the probative facts regarding the consideration for this payment, to the effect that plaintiff had conveyed certain real property to E. S. Buell, her son, without consideration, who thereupon promised that he would exchange it for other property to be conveyed to plaintiff at her request; that for more than three years immediately preceding the execution of the contract for the purchase of the Columbia Colony property he had been acting as plaintiff's confidential business agent and adviser, and in the course of his transactions in that capacity had acquired without plaintiff's knowledge certain other property which the plaintiff claimed should rightfully have been received by her; that the property conveyed by E. S. Buell to the vendors of the Columbia Colony property had been obtained by him through a series of exchanges for which the original consideration was property of the plaintiff, together with the sum of $300 belonging to said E. S. Buell; and that in said exchanges Buell had also received and retained without plaintiff's knowledge or consent the sum of $1,260.

The numerous transactions between the plaintiff and her son, all of which have an important bearing on the issues here and which tend to support the findings of the court are correctly stated in plaintiff's brief. They are substantially as follows: In the year 1916 plaintiff was the owner of certain real property in Fresno county, known as the Jensen ranch, and her son was engaged in business as a real estate broker in the city of Fresno. At this time he claimed that the plaintiff had verbally given him a half-interest in this ranch in return for services rendered to her, which she, however, denied. In that year she purchased property known as Le Grand ranch, giving as part payment therefor the Jensen ranch. She then entered into a contract, negotiated by her son, to sell Le Grand ranch for a certain cash payment, receipt of which was acknowledged by the contract, and $6,000 in subsequent installments, but consented to receive in lieu of the cash payment a lot in Maricopa and 40 acres of land in Texas. In this connection there was conveyed to the son without his mother's knowledge or consent some lots in Seattle, and what is termed the Robinson tract property, and he also had the deed to the Texas property made in his own name without her permission. This latter fact she discovered a short time after the transaction, but knew nothing about the Robinson tract property until much later. She demanded that he surrender the Texas property to her, in satisfaction of which demand he arranged an exchange in which the plaintiff received a ranch in Madera county, for which she conveyed certain property and her son conveyed what is known as the Belmont addition property which, together with the Duncan's addition property, he had acquired for the Texas land. About this time the son invested $300 in a local transportation line, from which, by a series of exchanges, he obtained a Hudson automobile. After borrowing $300 from the plaintiff to redeem this car from foreclosure—which amount was never repaid—he carried on a further series of land exchanges in which he used this car, together with the Duncan's addition and Robinson tract properties. In March, 1918, the plaintiff conveyed to her son lots referred to as Long Bros.' addition lots and a 10-acre ranch upon his oral undertaking to exchange them for her. He exchanged the last-mentioned land for property in Dinuba, and without her knowledge or consent mortgaged the Long Bros.' addition lots for $250, which he appropriated to his own use. He then exchanged these lots subject to the mortgage, together with property previously held by him for her, and acquired Fairmont addition and Acacia Park lots. He had already extracted from the series of exchanges $800 in cash and a $200 crop mortgage, which he cashed for his own benefit. He then mortgaged the Fairmont addition property for $210, which he also appropriated. The plaintiff in the meantime had been insisting that her son perform his agreement with regard to the property she had deeded to him. In November, 1918, he negotiated the purchase of the Columbia Colony property, a contract concerning which was executed by the plaintiff and the vendors, and the son executed in favor of the latter two deeds, one conveying the Dinuba property, and the other the Fairmont addition and the Acacia Park lots. It was at this time that he informed his mother of his acquisition of the Robinson tract property and the mortgage on the Long Bros.' addition and Fairmont addition lots, and promised to turn all of her property back to her in the proposed deal. Thereafter he negotiated the exchange of his mother's interest in this contract for the one-third interest in the Reedley garage property and, having previously secured his mother's consent to the exchange, brought to her an assignment transferring the contract to the owner of the garage property, which she executed and intrusted to her son for the purpose of making the exchange. In doing so he took the garage property in his own name, which she only discovered after his death, which occurred shortly thereafter.

[3] This brief summary of the involved and large number of exchanges of property shows that E. S. Buell had been plaintiff's confidential agent and that the property exchanged for the Columbia Colony property had been derived almost entirely from property of the plaintiff; that into the chain of transactions E. S. Buell had put only the sum of $300 of his own funds, and that he had abstracted in the course of the transactions, without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff, sums amounting in all to $1,260, besides the real property which he conveyed as part of the purchase price of the Columbia Colony property. As before stated, the evidence clearly shows that the legal title to the property in controversy in this action was obtained by E. S. Buell by fraud and a breach of trust, and that the plaintiff is the party to whom it would have gone had the duty resting upon him been duly performed. It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded.

Judgment affirmed.

CRABTREE v. HOUGHTON. (L. A. 7447.)

Costs 🔑190—No costs awarded plaintiff for map made at his sole instance.

Where a map, to be used as an exhibit, was not prepared at the request of, or under the direction of, the trial court nor by stipulation of the parties, but was made at the sole instance of plaintiff, a motion to strike an item of cost paid by plaintiff for making the map should have been granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by R. R. Crabtree against W. H. Houghton. From an order refusing to strike items from cost bill, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles J. Kelly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Vernon Givan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an appeal from an order of the trial court, refusing to strike from the cost bill of the plaintiff an item of $26.75, paid by the plaintiff for making a map introduced as plaintiff's Exhibit 7 upon the trial of the action.

It was stipulated by the parties that the map referred to in the item was prepared for use as an exhibit and was in fact so used, and that the sum paid therefor was fair and reasonable, and that the map was not prepared at the request of or under the directions of the trial court nor by stipulation of either of the parties, but was made at the sole instance of the plaintiff in said action. The court should have granted the defendant's motion to strike out this item upon the authority of Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158.

The court is directed to modify the judgment by striking out the item of $26.75 costs, appellant to have his costs on appeal.

1. Divorce 🔑169—Interlocutory judgment conclusive between parties only during period elapsing before final judgment.

An interlocutory divorce judgment is provisional and temporary only, and is conclusive between the parties only during the period elapsing before the final judgment, unless by some court proceeding or agreement between the parties it is in some manner modified.

2. Master and servant 🔑388—Child in custody of divorced mother held entitled to compensation as dependent on father.

The mere fact that an interlocutory divorce judgment awarded the custody of an infant child to the mother, and that the mother thereafter for some time supported the child, did not preclude the child from recovering compensation for death of the father as a dependent of the father, under Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14 (b), in view of failure of final decree to award custody to mother, and facts showing that at the time of his death the father was in fact supporting the child.

In Bank.

Certiorari to the Industrial Accident Commission.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by W. E. McDonald, a minor, by his guardian ad litem, Bertha K. Ludolph, for compensation for the death of his father, Joseph B. McDonald, opposed by the Llewellyn Iron Works, employer and self-insurer. Award for claimant, and employer brings certiorari. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan and J. J. Wilson, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (H. C. Kelsey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

WASTE, J. Proceeding to annul an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission for death benefits to William E. McDonald, a minor, by reason of the death of his father, Joseph B. McDonald, an employee of petitioner; the award being made against the petitioner as a self-insurer. The commission found that the deceased was employed by the petitioner as a crane man in its manufacturing plant, that he sustained injury arising out of and occurring in the course of his employment from which he died, and that the said employee left surviving him, and wholly dependent, the respondent, William E. McDonald, a minor child, and the said minor child is entitled to a death benefit, together with the usual expenses.

The writ of review is sought upon the theory that the evidence introduced before the commission does not support the findings of dependency, and that in that respect there was a total lack of evidence, in that, at the time of the death of the employee, his minor child was, by interlocutory decree of divorce, awarded solely to the custody of his mother, and that, at the time of the death of said deceased employee, the minor child had been abandoned by the father and was being solely supported by his other parent. It is further claimed that there existed no agreement whatever subsequent to the divorce by which the deceased employee had agreed to support the minor child. It is also contended by petitioner that the status of the minor child at the time of the death of the employee was not such as to entitle him to the conclusive presumption of total dependency mentioned in section 14a of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 844), in force at the time of the death of the employee. That section, so far as pertinent, provides:

"(a) The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employee: * * * (2) A child or children under the age of eighteen years, or over said age, but physically or mentally incapacitated from earning, upon the parent with whom he or they are living at the time of the death of such parent or for whose maintenance such parent was legally liable at the time of death, there being no surviving dependent parent. (b) In all other cases, question of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who constitute dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employee."

It is not necessary to pass upon the contention last made by the petitioner. Assuming, but only for the purpose of stating the point, that the status of the minor may not have been such as to entitle him to the benefit of the presumption offered by the statute, a point we do not now decide, the fact of his dependency was clearly and satisfactorily determined in accordance with the facts existing at the time of the injury to the employee.

Petitioner would preclude our inquiry into these matters on the theory that the injured employee was relieved from the duty of supporting his child—a duty which it asserts was cast upon the mother of the claimant by an interlocutory decree of divorce obtained by her in an action against the employee. Passing for the moment the fact that no provision, either for the custody of the minor or for his support, was made in the final decree, we think the situation relied upon by petitioner, if it may be considered at all, only prima facie relieved the husband of the duty of supporting his child. Matter of McMullin, 164 Cal. 504, 507, 129 Pac. 773.

An examination of the facts in an industrial accident case, and an award made under somewhat similar circumstances, was upheld in Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 462, 194 Pac. 1, 13 A. L. R. 725. The undisputed facts in that case disclosed that the mother of the minor had procured a decree of divorce from the injured employee, the custody of the minor son being awarded to her. She later placed the boy in an orphanage, and disappeared. Ten years later the boy went to live with his father, who voluntarily resumed his parental relations and obligations and took the boy to live with him, and assumed the burden of his education and support. The father was accidentally killed, and the Industrial Accident Commission awarded the boy the maximum amount for total dependency. On petition to this court for a writ of review the only points presented were upon the question of the dependency of the minor on his father. It was urged that dependency was not shown, either actual or presumptive. The court said (184 Cal. 466, 194 Pac. 3, 13 A. L. R. 725):

> "We find no authority for holding that, as between parent and child, the father is absolved from his legal duty to provide support to his minor child who has no other source of maintenance, because, on account of his own fault, he has been deprived of the custody of such child. Both a legal and moral obligation rests upon a father to support his minor children. And while, as between himself and third parties, that obligation may be shifted in proceedings of divorce or guardianship, and he may by misconduct forfeit his right to the custody of his child, it may be doubted if by such proceedings, to which he is not a party, a minor can be deprived of his natural right to turn to his father for maintenance, if the substituted source of supply fails. It has been held that such right to look to a father for maintenance cannot be taken from the infant by contract between the parents (Fernandez v. Aburrea, 42 Cal. App. 131 [183 Pac. 366]), and it certainly would be a reproach upon the law if a father, by his own misconduct making him an unfit custodian of the child, could absolve himself from legal responsibility for its support. He, at least, may voluntarily resume his legal responsibility. Conceding, in this case, that the minor was not a dependent upon his father during the period he remained in the custody of his mother, there was nothing in the legal status of the parties at the time Kenneth joined his father in California to prevent the latter from voluntarily resuming responsibility for his son's support."

[1, 2] The record in this proceeding discloses that the parents were divorced when the child was between three and four years of age. There was no personal service on the father, summons being served by publication. By the terms of the interlocutory decree the custody and control of the minor was awarded to the mother, the plaintiff in the action, without any provision being made for the support of either the mother or the child. The final decree is entirely silent as to all such matters; it merely adjudging a dissolution of the marriage between plaintiff and defendant. There is, therefore, nothing in the divorce proceedings which changes the legal status of dependency of the minor child in this proceeding. It is now firmly established that under divorce proceedings in this state an interlocutory judgment is, by the terms of the statute, provisional and temporary only. It is conclusive between the parties to the divorce action only during the period elapsing before the final judgment, unless by some court proceeding or agreement between the parties it be in some manner modified. London Guarantee & Acc. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 460, 463–466, 184 Pac. 864.

Aside from these considerations, the unrefuted evidence in the record as to the decedent's attitude and conduct toward the minor applicant, at and immediately prior to his injury, demonstrates that he recognized and was, to the best of his ability under the circumstances, discharging his parental duties and obligations, and was supporting him. The evidence as clearly establishes that this arrangement was brought about through a voluntary agreement executed by the decedent, and consented to by the mother of the boy, shortly before the injury occurred. By the terms of that contract the decedent gave the mother the sum of $50, which one witness designated as "back support." He agreed also to pay her the sum of $20 on the next weekly pay day, and that every week he would make other payments "enough to support him well. He said he would support him the best way he could." The father thereupon took the boy with him, bought him clothing, and made arrangements with his own brother and the latter's wife, with whom he was living, for having the child in his company over weekends and at other times. The boy's eyes were crossed, and in anticipation of sending him to school the father engaged the services of a doctor for the performance of an operation necessary to correct the fault, at an agreed cost of $50. The mother was at that time supporting herself and the child by working in a store. It does not appear from the record what were her earnings at that time, or whether they were sufficient to adequately support the child and herself. It is very evident from the record, however, that she was very willing to accept the offer made by the father, and entered readily into the arrangement. From these facts, and from others appearing in the record, it at once appears that the commissioners were justified in holding that the father had voluntarily resumed his parental relations and obligations, had taken the boy to live with with him for a part of the time, and had assumed the burden of his maintenance, education and support. This being the fact, the relations of parent and child had been restored. The condition of dependency existed at the time of the father's death, as though it had never been disturbed. Pacific Gold Dredging Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 184 Cal. 467, 194 Pac. 1, 13 A. L. R. 725. Although this arrangement was completed but a short time before the injury and death of the father occurred, nevertheless the resumption of the parental relation with the boy by him had become an accomplished fact, and existed at the time of the injury.

The award is affirmed.

VARGAS v. MADEROS. (S. F. 9928.)

1. Easements 🔑17(1)—Facts held sufficient to show easement in right of way.

In an action to quiet title to land involving the right of defendant to use a strip of land as a means of ingress and egress to land owned by him, where, at the time of the purchase by defendant, a roadway was extending across premises subsequently purchased by plaintiff which had been used for more than 40 years in getting to and from his lot and was clearly marked at the time of plaintiff's purchase, held, that defendant's deed from a common grantor conveyed to him as appurtenant to his land the right of way.

2. Easements 🔑48(6)—Change of right of way by agreement transfers parties' rights to new location.

Where, at the time of purchase of a lot, it is subject to a private right of way to other property, which right of way is subsequently by agreement plowed up and transferred to a new location, the rights of the parties are also transferred to the new location.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by Manuel Vargas against M. F. Maderos. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

A. S. Ormsby, W. S. Tinning, and R. L. Boyer, all of Martinez, for appellant.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This action involved the rights of the respective parties in and to a strip of land which has been used by the respondent as a right of way for ingress and egress to the tract of land owned by him. The parties are both purchasers from Varney Estate Company. The latter company owned a large tract of land and subdivided it into farming tracts. The defendant purchased lot No. 3 as indicated upon the subdivision map of said land in 1914, and in 1916 the plaintiff purchased lot No. 5. At the time of the purchase by the defendant a roadway extending from the house upon the premises purchased by him had long been in use to and across the land subsequently purchased by the plaintiff. This roadway had been used for over 40 years as a means of getting to and from the residence upon lot 3 and was clearly marked upon the ground and was used by the defendant from and after the time of his purchase and at the time the plaintiff purchased lot 5 over which such roadway extended.

[1] Under these circumstances, it seems clear that when the owner of the entire tract sold to defendant lot No. 3 the deed conveyed to him as an appurtenant to his land this long-established right of way. The authorities are so numerous upon that question in this state that it seems unnecessary to do more than cite the provisions of the Civil Code upon that subject (Civ. Code, §§ 1084, 1104) and some of the more recent cases upon that subject (Nay v. Bernard, 40 Cal. App. 364, 180 Pac. 827; Jersey Farm Co. v. Atlanta Realty Co., 164 Cal. 412, 129 Pac. 593; Cheda v. Bodkin, 173 Cal. 7, 158 Pac. 1025; see, also, cases cited in note 23 to Civ. Code, § 1084, Kerr's Cyc. Code of Cal.). The trial court was correct in its conclusion that the right of way exercised by the defendant and respondent for ingress and egress, to the public highway running through the large tract of land owned by the Varney Estate Company at the time of the subdivision and shown upon the map of said subdivision with reference to which both the parties hereto purchased their land, was a rightful use. In arriving at this conclusion, however, the trial court found that the strip of land in controversy so used was a public highway. It is conceded by the respondent that this conclusion was erroneous, and predicating its contention for a reversal partly upon that admission, the appellant claims that the only issue between the parties was over the question as to whether or not the strip in controversy was a public highway. We are not disposed to critically analyze the pleadings or the findings and judgment for the purpose of determining whether that position is substantially correct, for the reason that it is clear from the entire record that the substantial controversy litigated before the trial court was as to the right of the respective parties in and to the strip of land in controversy, and their respective rights were fully presented to the trial court. Under the circumstances of the case, the fact that the respondent predicated his right to use the strip of land for ingress and egress upon the proposition that it was a public highway included the lesser right which he successfully established, namely, a private right of way.

[2] We have thus far ignored the fact that the roadway used at the time the respective parties purchased their respective lots of land was plowed up by the plaintiff in such fashion that it could not subsequently be used as a right of way and the parties by mutual consent substituted therefor a newly located way, which was subsequently used by the defendant. In view of this acquiescence the rights of the parties were transferred to the new location. 14 Cyc. 1205; 19 C. J. 953. The conclusion of the trial court that the defendant had a right of way over the strip in question was fully justified by the facts and circumstances proved in the case.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the case is remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter a new judgment upon the findings to the effect that the defendant and respondent is entitled to the use of the strip in question as a private right of way. Appellant to have his costs.

1. Intoxicating liquors 🔑11—County ordinance punishing same act as state law is in conflict therewith and void.

A county ordinance, enacted under authority of Const. art. 11, § 11, punishing exactly the same act denounced by the Wright Act, which by reference makes the Volstead Act the general law of the state, is in conflict therewith, and therefore void.

2. Criminal law 🔑252(3)—Judgment not void because complaint alleged violation of county ordinance instead of state law.

The mere fact that a complaint alleged a violation of a void county ordinance instead of the state law would not render the judgment of conviction void in so far as the facts alleged and proved showed a violation of the state law.

3. Intoxicating liquors 🔑11—State liquor law held not to grant additional power to county.

Wright Act, § 4, providing, "Nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the power of any city or county * * * to prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation or possession of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes, * * *" held not to grant to counties any powers which they did not already possess under Const. art. 11, § 11, or Pol. Briggs & Sorensen, of Fresno, for petitioner.

William R. McKay, of Hanford, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1] Defendant was convicted of having intoxicating liquor in his possession and sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and to be imprisoned 90 days in jail. The Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305) and the Wright Act (St. 1921, p. 79) make the first offense punishable by fine only. An ordinance of Kings county, adopted January 5, 1922, prescribes as the maximum for such offense a fine of $500 and imprisonment for not more than 90 days. The complaint charged a violation of this ordinance. The question presented is whether the ordinance fixing a greater punishment than is prescribed by the state law for the offense of possessing intoxicating liquor is valid. The question is not a new one in this state. The county ordinance derives its authority from the power delegated to counties by article 11, § 11, of the Constitution, which provides that police power is thereby delegated to enact such regulations as are not in conflict with general law. A county ordinance punishing exactly the same act denounced by a state law is in conflict therewith, and therefore to that extent void. In re Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405; Ex parte Stephen, 114 Cal. 278, 46 Pac. 86; Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 Pac. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172.

Before the adoption of the Wright Act by referendum at the last general election (November, 1922) such ordinances were valid and enforcible notwithstanding the concurrent power vested in Congress by the federal Constitution and the passage by Congress of the Volstead Act. In re Polizzotto (Cal. Sup.) 205 Pac. 676. But the enactment of the provisions of the Volstead Act by reference in the Wright Act, making it a general law of the state within the meaning of our state Constitution (article 11, § 11), thereby deprived the portions of the ordinance fixing a different penalty of all validity, because in conflict with such state statute. In re Sic, supra; Ex parte Stephen, supra.

[2] The mere fact that the complaint alleged a violation of the county ordinance instead of the state law would not render the judgment void in so far as the facts alleged and proved showed a violation of the state law (Ex parte Murphy [Cal. Sup.] 212 Pac. 30; Matter of Von Perhacs [Cal. Sup.] 212 Pac. 689; Ex parte Stephen, supra), but in the case at bar the sentence of imprisonment was not authorized by the state law.

[3] The respondent contends that section 4 of the Wright Act recognizes and establishes the validity of the county ordinance, and that therefore the rule hereinbefore stated does not apply. That section is as follows:

> "Nothing in this act shall be construed as limiting the power of any city or county, or city and county, to prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation or possession of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; and all fines and forfeitures collected under any ordinance now or hereafter enacted in the exercise of such power shall be paid into the treasury of the city or county, or city and county, whose ordinance is violated." Stats. 1921, p. 79.

The authority to enact prohibitory ordinances is derived by the board of supervisors from the Constitution (article 11, § 11), and there is no attempt in the delegation of powers to county boards of supervisors in the Political Code to enlarge upon the powers granted by the Constitution. These powers will be found in section 4041, subd. 31, of the Political Code, which reads as follows:

> "To make and enforce, within the limits of their county, all such local police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

Section 4 of the Wright Act does not purport to grant counties any power which they did not already possess, and we are therefore not confronted with the questions which would arise if there was such a specific grant. It is true that this construction of the law results in the conclusion that the punishment of a given offense in a given manner prevents the county from prescribing the same or a greater punishment for the same offense declared in the state law. This situation, however, does not result from the construction of any particular phraseology used in the Wright Act. It inheres in the nature of the situation. The constitutional and statutory power of the board of supervisors is limited to the enactment of such police regulations as are not inconsistent with the general law. When the state law and the county ordinance are in conflict, the situation is not changed by the legislative declaration that the act shall be construed as though there was no conflict.

In Ex parte Daniels, supra, we held that the Legislature could not create a conflict between a state law and local ordinance by the mere declaration in the statute that the local legislative bodies were prohibited from enacting any rules and regulations of traffic limiting the speed of automobiles, for the reason that the local bodies derived their authority from the Constitution, and the only way the Legislature could inhibit such legislation was by themselves occupying the same legislative field so completely that legislation on the subject by local legislative bodies would necessarily be inconsistent with the general rules laid down in the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382, and St. 1919, p. 191). It is true that there is a distinction between the situation dealt with in Ex parte Daniels, supra, and the situation now under consideration. There the Legislature attempted to prohibit local legislative bodies from exercising their powers derived from the Constitution; here the effort on the part of the Legislature is to allow legislation to stand which is authorized neither by the Constitution nor in any statutory grant of power. If we assume, as is contended, that it was the intention of the Legislature in adopting the Wright Act to allow all local ordinances upon the subject to stand unaffected by the new legislation, we are met by the fact that an ordinance of the city punishing exactly the same offense as is punishable under the state law and with a greater penalty is void (In re Sic, supra), because under the Constitution of the state the municipality cannot enact police regulations inconsistent with general law. This provision of the Constitution (article 11, § 11) has been held to be not only a delegation of power by the people of the state to the local body, but it has also been held to be a limitation upon the power of the local body and also upon the power of the state Legislature. In Re Sic, supra, it was said:

> "The last clause of this section must be held to be a limitation upon the power of municipalities, whether that power is derived under this provision of the Constitution or from the charter. If, as is held both by Bishop and Dillon to be the effect of authorities, a municipality can only pass ordinances punishing the same acts which are punishable under general laws, when expressly authorized to do so, and that no authority to pass such laws will be presumed from grants of power general in their character, it must be because that such ordinances may supersede the general law upon the subject. Here there is not only no such authority, but, if such ordinances are conflicting, there cannot be such authority. [Italics ours.]
> "It would seem that an ordinance must be conflicting with the general law which may operate to prevent a prosecution of the offense under the general law. The Constitution provides that no one shall be twice put in jeopardy for the same offense. If tried and convicted or acquitted under the ordinance, he could not be again tried for the same offense under the general law. The contrary doctrine has been held in some states, but this conclusion seems more in consonance with reason and justice. Some of these decisions apply to acts which are said to be of a dual nature, and offend at once against the general law and police regulations, which are not directed specifically at the offense denounced in the general law."

The conclusion arrived at in Re Sic, supra, precludes the delegation of any authority by the state Legislature to a county board of supervisors to enact police regulations which conflict with state legislation on that subject. There are other decisions in other states to the contrary (note 1 L. R. A. [N. S.] 382 et seq.), but this interpretation of our Constitution has been adhered to in this state.

SHEFFIELD v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION, Inc.

Venue 🔑52(1)—Plaintiff may make counter motion to retain case on motion for change, unless answer has not been filed when demand made.

When defendant applies for a change of venue because the action was not brought in the county where he resides, plaintiff may oppose the motion by showing the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by refusing the change, and such facts should control the court in determining the question, the rule being subject to the exception that, unless answer has been filed when demand for change of venue is made, a counter motion to retain the case on the ground of convenience of witnesses will not lie, for until the issues are settled the court cannot determine what testimony will be material.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Homer H. Sheffield against Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc. From an order denying a motion for change of venue, defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Theodore Hale, of San Francisco (Barry J. Colding, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Ford & Johnson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion for a change of venue. The action was to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff while being carried as a passenger in one of defendant's stages. The principal place of business of the defendant corporation was in Los Angeles county. The accident occurred in Santa Clara county, and the action was commenced in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. The defendant did not demur to the complaint, but filed its verified answer, and with it an affidavit of merits and a written demand that the action be transferred to Los Angeles county for trial. Its notice of motion for change of venue was upon the grounds that (1) the county designated in the complaint was not the proper county; (2) that the defendant was and is a resident of the county of Los Angeles; and (3) that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be best served by changing the place of trial to the latter county. Defendant made no showing, by affidavit or otherwise, in support of its third ground.

In response thereto, the plaintiff made a counter motion to retain the action in the city and county of San Francisco, on the ground that the convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted by so doing. His affidavit in support thereof is admittedly sufficient, both as to form and substance. Upon the hearing of the two motions, the trial court made its order denying defendant's motion for change of place of trial, from which order this appeal is prosecuted.

Appellant's contention is that "retaining or changing the venue of this action upon the ground of convenience of witnesses can only be done when the action is instituted in the proper county in the first instance." This precise question has been decided adversely to appellant's contention as often as it has arisen in the courts of this state. In Jenkins v. California Stage Co., 22 Cal. 537, this court said:

> "When a defendant applies for a change of the place of trial, on the ground that the action was not brought in the county where he resides, the plaintiff has a right to oppose the motion by showing that the 'convenience of witnesses and the ends of justice would be promoted' by refusing the change, and such facts should govern and control the court in determining the question whether the application for the change should be granted or not."

See, also, Loehr v. Latham, 15 Cal. 418; Pierson v. McCahill, 22 Cal. 127; Hanchett v. Finch, 47 Cal. 192; Edwards v. S. P. R. R. Co., 48 Cal. 460; Hall v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 49 Cal. 454; Reavis v. Cowell, 56 Cal. 588; Wong Fung Hing v. San Francisco, etc., 15 Cal. App. 537, 115 Pac. 331.

In Hall v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., supra, the court said:

> "In Edwards v. Southern Pacific Railroad Company, 48 Cal. 460, we held that under the former Practice Act, in a similar case, the place of trial ought not to be changed, if the convenience of witnesses required that the action be tried in the county where it was pending. The Code of Civil Procedure has made no change in the law, which requires a modification of the rule, and the rule has been so long established that we do not feel at liberty to depart from it."

Those words are equally appropriate to the present time and the instant case. We find no authority to the contrary, and none has been cited by the appellant.

The rule of the cited cases is subject to the exception that, unless answer has been filed at the time the demand for change of venue is made, a counter motion to retain the case on the ground of the convenience of witnesses will not lie. Cook v. Pendergast, 61 Cal. 72; McSherry v. Penn. C. G. M. Co., 97 Cal. 637, 32 Pac. 711; Pascoe v. Baker, 158 Cal. 232, 110 Pac. 815. This is for the obvious reason that, until the issues are settled, the court cannot determine what testimony will be material thereto. The case at bar was at issue when the motion was made, and therefore does not fall within this exception.

The order is affirmed.

1. Appeal and error 🔑635(1), 1127—Failure to give notice to prepare typewritten record not ground for dismissal; in absence of sufficient record, motion for affirmance is proper.

The failure to give the notice to prepare the typewritten record for use on appeal is not a ground for a dismissal of the appeal; but if it appears from the record that, in the absence of a properly authenticated reporter's transcript, the record is insufficient on which a reversal of the decision could be predicated, it is proper to move for an affirmance of the judgment on that ground, and on such application the court will consider the question as to whether the record was properly prepared.

2. Appeal and error 🔑607(1)—Certification of transcript, notwithstanding delay in filing statutory notice, held an exercise of court's power to grant relief against delay in giving notice to clerk.

Where the delay of appellant in filing the notice with the clerk of the court for preparation of transcript prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, was urged on the trial court as a reason for denying the certification of the transcript, and appellant at that time, without admitting that a default occurred, stated the reasons for such default, and the court, notwithstanding the delay, certified the transcript, held that, if the court had jurisdiction to relieve appellant under section 473, the certification of the transcript was an exercise of the court's power to grant relief under that section, notwithstanding the lack of formality in the request for such relief.

3. Appeal and error 🔑612(1)—Transcript not available for use on appeal, where trial court certified it six months after appellant defaulted.

A trial court, certifying a transcript, notwithstanding notice to the clerk for preparation of the transcript was not filed within the time required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, held not to have had jurisdiction to make such certification, under section 473, where it was made six months after appellant's default, and such transcript, in view of sections 473, 953a, was not available on appeal, though it was in fact prepared with reasonable diligence; the delay in its earlier presentation being due to the clerk's sending the transcript to the appellate court before proper authentication, and appellant's lack of knowledge that he was in default.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1127—Motion for affirmance and answer held to raise question as to power of trial court to relieve appellant from default in preparing transcript.

Where respondent predicated her motion for affirmance of judgment on failure of appellant to file notice of preparation of transcript within the time limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, and as an only answer to such motion, appellant asserted the trial court had relieved him from his default, held, that appellant's ground for denial of respondent's motion brought the whole subject-matter before the Appellate Court, so that it could determine whether the trial court had jurisdiction to grant relief from appellant's default, as provided in section 473.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. P. Gosbey, Judge.

Petition by Benjamin B. Stanley for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of Lydia H. Barney. From an order denying the petition, petitioner appeals. Order affirmed.

Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, Fry & Jenkins, of San Jose, and Jesse Robinson, of Oakland (Clarence De Lancey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

A. Kincaid, of Redwood City, and Rodgers & Smith, of Palo Alto, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1] The trial court having denied an application for letters of guardianship of the person and estate of Lydia H. Barney, a motion for a new trial of the matter was made in the trial court, and motions were made to vacate the order denying the letters of guardianship, and in various ways the trial court was pressed for a reconsideration of the decision. The trial court having adhered to its conclusion, an appeal was taken from the order denying the application for letters of guardianship and various other orders denying the application for reconsideration of such decision. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon various grounds, some of which will be hereinafter stated, and also moves for an affirmance of the order of the trial court upon the ground that there is no sufficient record upon which the merits of the appeal can be considered. It is conceded that all the appeals, other than the one from the order denying the letters of guardianship, should be dismissed, and that a motion for a new trial in such proceedings was not authorized by law. It has been frequently held, and is now thoroughly established, that the failure to give the notice to prepare the typewritten record for use on appeal is not a ground for a dismissal of the appeal. If, however, it appears from the entire record that, in the absence of a properly authenticated reporter's transcript, there is no record upon which a reversal of the decision could be predicated, then the proper course is to move for an affirmance of the judgment on that ground, and upon such application the court will consider the question as to whether or not the record was properly prepared. It follows, from what has been said, that the motion to dismiss all the appeals, other than the one from the order denying the application for letters of guardianship, should be granted, and that the motion to dismiss the latter appeal should be denied.

The motion to affirm the order denying the application for letters of guardianship and the motion for the dismissal of the appeal from such order is based upon affidavits filed by the respondent, and in connection with these affidavits the appellant has filed a typewritten transcript of the proceedings at the time of the final settlement of the reporter's transcript and its certification by the judge on September 16, 1922. From the affidavits thus presented, and from the transcript on appeal and the reporter's transcript filed on the motion, it appears that the notice to the clerk for the preparation of the transcript required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure was filed April 15, 1922, although the appellant had notice of the entry of the decree denying letters of guardianship at least as early as February 25, 1922. The time for the filing of such notice was not extended.

The clerk of the superior court immediately upon the completion of the reporter's transcript handed it to the judge for certification, and it was certified and forwarded to the clerk of this court; but, inasmuch as the parties had not been notified of its presentation to the trial judge, the appellant requested the return of the transcript for certification. It was presented to the trial judge on the 23d day of June, 1922, but the matter of the approval of the transcript was continued until September 1, 1922, when it was again continued until the 16th day of September, 1922, at which time it was certified by the judge. This was more than six months after the default of the appellant for failure to file his notice for the preparation of the record within time. It is contended by the respondent that the application for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure was too late if made at the hearing September 16, 1922, and that the court had then lost jurisdiction to grant the application for relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

It has been the custom of this court to consider applications for dismissal and for affirmance for lack of a record upon affidavits filed in this court and upon the transcript on file. Inasmuch as it appears that the notice for the preparation of the transcript was filed too late, and no claim is made that the time for its filing had been extended, the only question is whether or not the court had and exercised the power to excuse the delay. No formal application for relief was made by the appellant at the time of the certification of the transcript on September 16, 1922; but the respondent objected to the settlement of the statement on the ground that the notice had not been filed in time. The appellant suggested that the delay was due to the inadvertent proceedings for a new trial, which were not authorized by law, and the court announced that, notwithstanding the delay, it would settle the bill of exceptions.

[2] In view of the fact that the delay of the appellant in filing the notice prescribed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, was urged upon the trial court as a reason for denying the certification of the transcript, and in view of the fact that the appellant at that time, without admitting that a default had occurred, stated the reasons for such default and the court thereupon, notwithstanding the delay, certified the transcript, we think that, if the court had jurisdiction to relieve the appellant under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, the certification of the transcript under these circumstances was an exercise of that power, notwithstanding the lack of formality in the request for such relief.

[3] The more serious question, however, is whether or not the court had jurisdiction after the expiration of six months from the time of appellant's default. We feel constrained by the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to say that the court was without jurisdiction. If we had any discretion in the matter, we would be disposed to exercise that discretion in favor of the appellant, for the reason that the transcript has been, in fact, prepared with reasonable diligence, and the delay in its proper presentation grew out of the fact that the clerk of the superior court sent the transcript to this court before its proper authentication. At the hearing in June upon the certification of the transcript, the attention of the appellant was not called to the fact that he was in default, and apparently the appellant was of the opinion, until the 16th of September, 1922, that he was not in default. In view of the limitations fixed by sections 473 and 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, it must be held that the transcript offered for use on appeal has not been prepared in accordance with the law and, therefore, is not available upon appeal. There is nothing in the clerk's transcript, if it be treated as a judgment roll, which would show error.

[4] The appellant resists the motion for an affirmance upon the ground that the motion for an affirmance is not predicated upon the ground that the trial court exceeded its jurisdiction in settling or certifying to the reporter's transcript, but upon the ground that the notice for the transcript was filed too late.

This point is not available to the appellant for the reason that the respondent predicates her motion upon the failure of the appellant to file the notice in time and the only answer to that obvious insufficiency is the one sought to be made here, namely, that the trial court has relieved the appellant for this default. That point having been suggested by the appellant as a ground for the denial of the respondent's motion, the whole subject-matter is before us and the order must be affirmed.

The order denying the application for letters of guardianship is affirmed. All other appeals are dismissed.

LLANO INV. CO. v. MINTON. (L. A. 7274.)

1. Pleading 🔑150—Allegations of answer to cross-complaint setting up new matter deemed denied.

In action for money had and received where defendant filed a cross-complaint setting up a cause of action for salary under a contract with plaintiff, and plaintiff's answer thereto set up as new matter that defendant was employed by it under the contract with its predecessors of which contract plaintiff was the assignee, the allegation of the answer is deemed to have been denied and a new issue presented with respect to the nature of defendant's contract of employment.

2. Trial 🔑396(3) — Finding held consistent with issues presented by answer to cross-complaint.

In action for money had and received where defendant set up a cause of action for salary owing him by plaintiff, and plaintiff answered the cross-complaint setting up that the contract was with its predecessors and assigned to plaintiff, findings which took into consideration all charges and debits under the old and the new contracts were consistent with issues presented by plaintiff's answer to the cross-complaint.

3. Judgment 🔑256(6)—Finding of amount due when action commenced held to support judgment.

In action for money had and received in which defendant counterclaimed for salary due under a contract with plaintiff, and plaintiff answered setting up that the contract was with its predecessors and assigned to it, and all the facts on which indebtedness to plaintiff rested occurred before the action was commenced, nothing being alleged to have occurred after that date which would change the situation, a finding that a balance was due and unpaid at commencement of action was equivalent to a finding that it was due and unpaid at the time judgment was rendered and was sufficient to support the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Hartley Shaw, Judge pro tem.

Action by the Llano Investment Company against E. C. Minton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Packard & Fisher and John C. Packard, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert Sidney Brown, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Plaintiff commenced this action to recover the sum of $550.30 from defendant as money had and received, alleging that defendant was employed by plaintiff to superintend a ranch which plaintiff controlled and was authorized to sell certain goods belonging to plaintiff; that he sold the goods and received the sum of $1,400.30 therefor; that he had turned over to plaintiff but $850 of that amount and was therefore indebted to plaintiff in the sum prayed. Defendant denied all the allegations of the complaint and filed a cross-complaint, in which it was alleged that he was employed by plaintiff as superintendent of its ranch from December 10, 1917, to May 12, 1920; that for his services plaintiff promised to pay him at the rate of $50 per month from December 10, 1917, to October 31, 1918, of $100 per month from November 1, 1918, to February 29, 1920, and of $150 per month from March 1, 1920, to May 12, 1920; that the total salary promised was $2,493.33; that there is owing him for salary from November 21, 1919, to May 12, 1920, the sum of $693.33; that defendant used his automobile in connection with plaintiff's business at plaintiff's request, for which plaintiff agreed to pay a reasonable sum; that $276, or $15 per month for 18⅖ months, is a reasonable amount for such use, wherefore defendant prayed judgment for the sums of $693.33 and $276.

Answering the cross-complaint, plaintiff denied that defendant was employed by it from December 10, 1917, to May 12, 1920, and alleged that he entered a contract of employment with the Llano Del Rio Company of Nevada, which contract was assigned to plaintiff, with defendant's consent; that defendant was employed by plaintiff under the contract from February 17, 1919, to April 7, 1920, and not for any other period; denied that it promised to pay defendant for his services the sum of $2,493.33, or any other sum in excess of $675, the amount provided by the contract, which, it was alleged, has been paid to him, and denied all the allegations with respect to the use of the automobile.

Upon the trial the court made and filed findings of fact and conclusions of law, and pursuant thereto entered judgment that defendant recover from plaintiff the sum of $505.26 and his costs. From that judgment plaintiff takes this appeal upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] The first contention of appellant is that the judgment is based upon a cause of action not within the allegations of the pleadings and therefore not sustained by them. In support of this position are cited Chetwood v. California National Bank, 113 Cal. 414, 45 Pac. 704; Wilson v. White, 84 Cal. 239, 241, 24 Pac. 114; Benedict v. Bray, 2 Cal. 251, 56 Am. Dec. 332; Eidinger v. Sigwart, 13 Cal. App. 667, 674, 110 Pac. 521; and McCormick, etc., Co. v. Nofziger Bros. L. Co., 10 Cal. App. 241 101 Pac. 688—to the effect that a plaintiff must recover upon the cause of action set out in his complaint and not upon a different case made out by the findings or proof.

The court found that there was a balance due, owing, and unpaid to respondent by appellant upon the salary of the defendant "under his employment by the plaintiff and its predecessors referred to, after all charges and debits, which the plaintiff and its predecessors had against the defendant, had been made against him," the sum of $505.26. It is claimed this finding is based upon a cause of action which respondent might have against appellant for salary under an employment by appellant and its predecessors, whereas respondent in his cross-complaint alleged only that he was employed by the appellant, saying nothing about its predecessors, and that there was a sum due him from appellant from November 21, 1919, to May 12, 1920. Appellant insists now that it could not be called upon to prove all charges and debits which appellant or its predecessors had against respondent; that the finding cannot be construed as a finding of a balance due and unpaid under an employment by appellant alone; and that no basis exists upon which to infer that the balance due under the three employments was the same balance as might be due under only one of them.

In its answer to the cross-complaint appellant set up as new matter that respondent was employed by it under the contract with its predecessor, of which contract appellant was the assignee. This allegation is deemed to have been denied by respondent (Colton Land & Water Co. v. Raynor, 57 Cal. 588, 589), and a new issue was presented with respect to the nature of respondent's contract of employment (Rogers v. Riverside L., etc., Co., 132 Cal. 9, 11, 64 Pac. 95). As instructions upon issues so presented are proper (Rankin v. Sisters of Mercy, 82 Cal. 88, 95, 22 Pac. 1134), similarly findings upon them are not outside the pleadings.

In the case at bar the court found, against respondent's allegation, that he had not been employed from 1917 to 1920 by appellant, but, as alleged in the answer to the cross-complaint, that his employment was under the contract set forth—first with appellant's predecessor and subsequently with appellant, following the assignment of the contract. It was further found that appellant assumed all the obligations and liabilities under the contract. Under such circumstances, the fact that there had been several employers instead of one is immaterial, inasmuch as appellant occupied the same position as its predecessors. Also, all the rights and obligations which had arisen under the contract at any time would have to be considered to determine the balance due at the time of its termination. There is no contention that the finding in question is not based on proper evidence, and it must be assumed the parties presented to the court all their respective claims under the contract. It may be remarked that as respondent alleged he had been fully paid up to November 21, 1919, at which time he was admittedly working for appellant, the charges and debits prior to that time could only have run in favor of appellant and, according to the finding, charges and debits were made in favor of appellant only.

[2] The court further found that the contract between respondent and appellant, to which appellant became a party by assignment, was superseded on November 1, 1918, by a new agreement, under which respondent was to receive $100 per month, commencing November 1, 1918. Thereupon, considering the charges and debits in favor of appellant under the old contract and those under the new one, the court found that there was due and owing to respondent the sum of $505.26. This finding is entirely consistent with the issues presented by appellant in its answer to the cross-complaint.

Appellant's second point is that the judgment is not sustained by the findings. The court found there "was a balance on May 12, 1920, due, owing and unpaid to the defendant by the plaintiff," the sum of $505.26. This finding, it is claimed, does not show appellant had not paid the money due on that day or that there now exists or has existed subsequent to May 12, 1920, any obligation on appellant's part to pay respondent. It is pointed out that in its answer to the cross-complaint filed June 4, 1920, appellant denied it owed respondent anything. Majors v. Cowell, 51 Cal. 478, 483, is cited to the point that—

> "Under our present Code of Civil Procedure, as we have repeatedly held, the findings must support the judgment, and no facts in issue will be presumed to have been proved except those which are found."

We are also referred to Jacuzzi v. Jacuzzi, 38 Cal. App. 533, 176 Pac. 872. That was an action to recover money for work and labor performed by the plaintiff at the request of the defendant. The court found the work had been performed two years before and that a stated sum was the reasonable value thereof, making no finding that it was unpaid. It was held the issue of payment was raised by the pleadings and that the finding referred to was insufficient to support the judgment.

[3] However, we are of the opinion the finding that the amount appellant owed to respondent was unpaid on May 12, 1920, the day the action was commenced, is sufficient to support the judgment in the case at bar and distinguishes it from Jacuzzi v. Jacuzzi, supra. All the facts upon which the indebtedness of appellant rested occurred before May 12, 1920. Whether or not there was a sum owing and unpaid was a conclusion to be drawn from the facts as they existed at that time, regardless of when appellant denied he was indebted. In the pleadings filed after the commencement of the action there there were no events alleged to have occurred after the date which would have changed the situation. Therefore, in the absence of a subsequent satisfaction or mitigation, such as payment, a finding that a balance was due, owing, and unpaid on May 12, 1920, would be equivalent to a finding that it was due, owing, and unpaid at the time judgment was rendered. There was no allegation that the amount had been subsequently paid, and in order to hold that it was paid after May 12, 1920, it would be necessary to assume that the issue of payment after that time had been raised, that evidence had been offered to that effect, and that the court had failed to make a finding thereon. Such an assumption will not be indulged, in view of the rule laid down in Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. 104, 106, 23 Pac. 1098, 1099, that—

> "The findings must be sufficient to support the judgment, and must contain nothing inconsistent with it, but a failure to find upon some issue, a finding upon which would merely have the effect of invalidating a judgment fully supported by the findings made, will not be held ground for reversal, unless it is shown by statement or bill of exceptions that evidence was submitted in relation to such issue."

Ex parte KENNERLY. (Cr. 2556.)

Criminal law 🔑258(3)—Justice's court can imprison for nonpayment of fine for offense not punishable by imprisonment.

In view of Pol. Code, §§ 4481–4483, relating to construction of inconsistent provisions in different titles, chapters, and articles, Pen. Code, § 1205, which is contained in a title dealing with proceedings in the superior court and which provides that the imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine shall not exceed the maximum period for which imprisonment might be imposed as a punishment for the offense, does not apply to convictions in justices' courts, which are governed by Pen. Code, § 1446, authorizing imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine not to exceed one day for each dollar of the fine, so that one who was fined in the justice court for the first offense of unlawfully selling intoxicating liquor, which is not punishable by imprisonment, may be imprisoned for nonpayment of the fine.

In Bank.

Application by J. H. Kennerly for a writ of habeas corpus prayed to be directed to the sheriff of Fresno county to secure the release of petitioner from custody after conviction of possessing intoxicating liquor. Petitioner remanded.

Gearhart, Carling & Cummings, of Fresno, for petitioner.

WILBUR, C. J. The petitioner was convicted of having intoxicating liquor in his possession. It was his first offense. The penalty therefor under the Wright Act was a fine of not exceeding $500. He was fined $500 and in addition it was directed that he be imprisoned in the county jail of the county of Fresno until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine.

The petitioner's application is based upon the proposition that inasmuch as the state law provides no term of imprisonment for the first offense of having liquor in possession, section 1205 of the Penal Code expressly prohibits any imposition of imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine "beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted." It is therefore contended that the portion of the judgment sentencing the defendant to imprisonment for nonpayment of fine is void.

The question thus raised is not free from difficulty. There is a great diversity of decision in the various opinions rendered by this court from time to time, due, no doubt, to the hasty consideration of applications for relief from imprisonment and the prompt determination of the cases thus considered.

It is clear that section 1205 of the Penal Code relates to proceedings in the superior court. Beginning with title 3 of part 2 of the Penal Code, the Code deals primarily with proceedings in the superior court after indictment or upon information; for instance, title 3 is, "Proceedings in Criminal Actions Prosecuted by Indictment, to the Commitment, Inclusive." Title 4, "Proceedings After Commitment and Before Indictment." Title

5, "The Indictment." Title 6, "Pleadings and Proceedings After Indictment and Before the Commencement of the Trial." Title 7, "Proceedings After the Commencement of the Trial and Before Judgment." Title 8, "Judgment and Execution." While title 11, in which section 1446 of the Penal Code is found, is entitled "Proceedings in Justices' and Police Courts and Appeals to the Superior Courts," and chapter 1, containing sections 1425 to 1461, inclusive, is headed "Proceedings in Justices' and Police Courts."

The Political Code gives us the rule of construction which will apply in case of conflict between different sections of the Code. Political Code, § 4481, provides that—

> "If the provisions of any title conflict with or contravene the provisions of another title, the provisions of each title must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such title."

Section 4482 provides:

> "If the provisions of any chapter conflict with or contravene the provisions of another chapter of the same title, the provisions of each chapter must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such chapter."

Section 4483 provides:

> "If the provisions of any article conflict with or contravene the provisions of another article of the same chapter, the provisions of each article must prevail as to all matters and questions arising out of the subject-matter of such article."

Under these provisions of the Code, established for its own interpretation, it would seem clear that if there is a conflict between section 1205 of the Penal Code, relating to proceedings in the superior court, and section 1446, relating to proceedings in the justices' or police courts, that each should prevail in its own proper domain; that the provision in section 1205 that the term of imprisonment for the nonpayment of fine cannot exceed the term of imprisonment provided by the law for the particular offense in question is in conflict with the provisions of section 1446, which authorizes an imprisonment at the rate of $1 per day for the nonpayment of fine, is well illustrated by the case at bar, in which, under the terms of section 1446, the petitioner may be imprisoned 500 days, whereas under the provisions of section 1205 he cannot be imprisoned at all.

Without considering any of the previous decisions of the court, and treating the matter as a new one for the construction of the Code sections bearing upon the subject, it would seem clear that the case is controlled by section 1446, dealing with proceedings in a justice's court.

It may be well at this juncture to call attention to some of the confusion resulting from previous decisions and then to attempt to reach a conclusion as to the proper disposition of the case at bar. In Ex parte Kelly, 28 Cal. 414, it was held that imprisonment for the nonpayment of a $5,000 fine might extend to 2,500 days, although the term of imprisonment for the same offense was a much less time. The court reached its conclusion upon the ground that the imprisonment for nonpayment of fine was merely a method of enforcing the payment of the fine. In that connection it was said:

> "The mere fact that by its operation the defendant may be imprisoned in the county jail, by way of enforcing payment or satisfaction of his fine, for a longer period than he could be lawfully imprisoned in the state prison by way of punishment, is entitled to no weight. The latter imprisonment is the punishment or a part of it; but the former is no part of the punishment per se, but is merely one of the modes by which the law enforces the satisfaction of the fine which is in itself the punishment or a part of it. The punishment fixed by the statute is imprisonment in the state prison, or fine, or both; all beyond is mere mode and manner of enforcement. The first is to be satisfied by serving out the prescribed term in the state prison, and in that way only; but the latter may be satisfied in either of three ways, by voluntary payment of the amount of the fine, or by its collection under execution as in the case of a judgment in a civil action (Crim. Prac. § 461); or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one day for every two dollars of the fine. The alleged incongruity is apparent only when the mere mode and manner of enforcing the punishment is confounded with the punishment itself and regarded as a part of it, but it wholly disappears when the obvious distinction between the two is kept in view. * * *"

This was but an elaboration of the same conclusion expressed in People v. Markham, 7 Cal. 208, 209, where it was said:

> "The act of 1855 must be construed with reference to the section above quoted, and as there is no conflict between them, both must stand. But it is said, this will be virtually convicting a man under one law, and punishing him by the provisions of another. The answer to this is, that the imprisonment is not a punishment, but a means of enforcing a payment of the fine, and, even if it should be regarded as a punishment, it would make no difference, as the provisions of this law must be regulated by those of the general act on the same subject, inasmuch as there is no contradiction. * * *"

Both of these decisions were based upon section 460 of the Criminal Practice Act of 1851 (Stats. 1851, p. 263), as follows:

> "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, specifying the extent of the imprisonment, which shall not exceed ten days for every hundred dollars of the fine, or in that proportion."

This section of the Practice Act was amended in 1857 (Stats. 1857, p. 164) to read as follows:

> "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine, may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, specifying the extent of the imprisonment, which shall not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, or in that proportion."

It was under this latter amendment that the decision of Ex parte Kelly, supra, was rendered, sustaining a commitment which for nonpayment of fine might extend to 2,500 days, although the term of imprisonment fixed for the offense of which the petitioner was convicted was two years' imprisonment.

Section 1446 of the Penal Code originally appeared in the Criminal Practice Act as section 626, contained in part 5 of that act, "Of Proceedings in Justices', Recorders', and Mayors' Courts." The section then read as follows:

> "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine, may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be paid or satisfied."

In 1857 (Stats. 1857, c. 126, p. 151) the Legislature passed a statute concerning persons under sentence of imprisonment wherein it authorized boards of supervisors of each county to cause persons in the county jail under sentence of imprisonment to labor upon public or private work. This statute contained the following provision:

> "Sec. 2. When a person shall be imprisoned for nonpayment of a fine, or until a fine be paid, the imprisonment may extend to, but shall not exceed one day for every two dollars of the fine, and the costs that may be due from the person imprisoned, in the prosecution in which the fine was adjudged."

Section 1446 of the Penal Code as originally enacted read as follows:

> "A judgment that the defendant pay a fine may also direct that he be imprisoned until the fine be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every two dollars of the fine."

This was amended in 1873–74 (Stats. 1873–74, p. 455) to read, "be satisfied, in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for every dollar of the fine." This section has not since been amended unless by implication.

Section 1205 of the Penal Code was also amended in 1873–74 (Stats. 1873–74, p. 455) so that the imprisonment could not exceed one day for each dollar of the fine. These two sections remained the same until 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 52), when section 1205 was amended in its present form, fixing the imprisonment at one day for each $2 of the fine and providing that the term of imprisonment could not exceed the term "for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted."

In the decisions rendered on habeas corpus the court has frequently used sections 1446 and 1205 interchangeably and without reference to the fact that one applied to the superior court and the other to the justices' or recorders' courts.

For instance, in Ex parte Ellis, 54 Cal. 204, the petitioner had been committed by a justice of the peace for nonpayment of fine. In passing upon the case the court said that the judgment conformed to the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code. Inasmuch as it also conformed to section 1446 of the Penal Code, relating to justices' courts, the erroneous reference is immaterial, for between 1873–74 and 1891 the two sections were practically identical, both having been amended by the same act of the Legislature (Amendments to the Pen. Code, 1873–74, p. 455).

The cases of Ex parte Ellis, 54 Cal. 204, Ex parte Chin Yan, 60 Cal. 78, and Ex parte Baldwin, 60 Cal. 432, all dealt with imprisonment for nonpayment of fine under judgments rendered by justices of the peace or police court judges. Notwithstanding that fact in Ex parte Baldwin, supra, the court distinguished that case from Ex parte Ellis, supra, and Ex parte Chin Yan, supra, upon the ground that the former were judgments rendered under section 1205 of the Penal Code. The question involved there is of no importance here, but these decisions illustrate the confusion resulting from the failure to apply these two sections to the judgments of the courts to which they were respectively applicable.

In the case of Ex parte Miller, 82 Cal. 454, 22 Pac. 1113, the petitioner was convicted of a misdemeanor for the violation of an ordinance which only authorized the imposition of a fine. It was therefore claimed that the judgment imprisoning the petitioner for the nonpayment of fine was not valid. That matter was disposed of as follows:

> "But the offense for which the petitioner was convicted was a misdemeanor, and the Code provides for such imprisonment as a means of enforcing the fine."

The principle enunciated in Ex parte Kelly, supra, that the imprisonment for nonpayment of fine is merely a method of enforcing the payment of the fine, is thus again declared.

In Ex parte Arras, 78 Cal. 304, 20 Pac. 683, it was held that a judgment for imprisonment in the state prison for the nonpayment of a fine was void, the court intimating that the imprisonment should be in the county jail. In Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 518, 23 Pac. 190, this view was confirmed. Justice McFarland, however, in a concurring opinion, expressed a doubt as to whether or not the term of imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine could exceed the term of imprisonment provided for the particular offense. Justice Paterson, who concurred in this view, wrote an opinion in the matter of In re Mulholland, 97 Cal. 527, 32 Pac. 568, in which he held that notwithstanding the amendment of section 1205 of the Penal Code in 1891 changing the rate of imprisonment to $2 per day instead of $1 per day, that section 1446 of the Penal Code still controlled in justices' and police courts and that the imprisonment in such courts under section 1446 of the Penal Code could be at the rate of $1 for each day, and a judgment imposing an imprisonment at the rate of $1 per day for nonpayment of a fine of $50 was sustained by him. It is important to notice that although this decision is recorded by the reporter as an application to the Supreme Court for relief upon habeas corpus, that the opinion is that of Justice Paterson alone, as is made evident by an inspection of the original opinion now on file at Sacramento. It is therefore only entitled to the weight of his individual opinion.

In Ex parte Casey, 85 Cal. 36, 24 Pac. 599, we have also the opinion of a single justice on habeas corpus. Mr. Justice Fox expressed the opinion that the term of imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine under section 1446 of the Penal Code might exceed the time fixed as the term of imprisonment for the offense, basing his decision in part upon Ex parte Kelly, supra, and distinguishing the cases of Ex parte Wadleigh, supra, and Ex parte Rosenheim, 83 Cal. 388, 23 Pac. 372, and Ex parte Arras, supra.

The case of Ex parte Erdmann, 88 Cal. 579, 26 Pac. 372, is confidently relied upon by the petitioner as decisive of the question involved on his application for relief. This was an opinion by the court in bank. The petitioner had been sentenced to pay a fine of $500 and in default of payment to be imprisoned in the county jail at the rate of one day for each dollar until the fine be satisfied. The maximum term of imprisonment for the offense was not exceeding three months. The prisoner contended that he could not be imprisoned for more than three months for the nonpayment of fine, and having been so imprisoned he sought relief. The court there stated:

> "The question has been presented to us heretofore, when there was some difference of opinion in regard to it. As the Legislature, at its recent session, amended said section 1205 so as to expressly provide that imprisonment to enforce a fine must 'not extend, in any case, beyond the term for which the defendant might be sentenced to imprisonment for the offense of which he has been convicted,' we think that former doubts on the subject should, in justice, be resolved in favor of the petitioner."

This conclusion is reached by the erroneous assumption that the prisoner was sentenced under section 1205 of the Penal Code by a police court. This decision amounts simply to this assertion by the court:

> "We have heretofore been in doubt as to whether or not the term of imprisonment for nonpayment of fine can exceed the term of imprisonment fixed by the law for the given offense. The Legislature having expressly provided by section 1205 of the Penal Code that such a term cannot exceed the term of imprisonment provided by the offense, we will accept the opinion of the Legislature although it was not expressed until after the sentence, and we will discharge the prisoner."

The court apparently overlooked the fact that section 1205 did not apply to a police court, and that the sentence there under consideration was one by such court. The court did not pass upon the question as to whether or not the amendment of section 1205, general in its terms, applied to both superior and justices' courts, because the sentence involved in that case was imposed before the amendment became effective, and, of course, that question was not involved. There was no citation of the case of Ex parte Kelly, supra, in which it had been affirmatively established that the term of imprisonment for nonpayment of fine might exceed that for the offense by many years. The question presented to us is whether or not we shall follow this case as an authority, for, admittedly, it holds that a judgment for nonpayment of a fine rendered by a justice's court cannot exceed the term of imprisonment for the offense.

Notwithstanding the fact that Ex parte Erdmann, supra, decided April 2, 1891, assumed that section 1205 of the Penal Code applied to a police court sentence, in Ex parte Soto, 88 Cal. 624, 26 Pac. 530, decided the same month, the decision was devoted entirely to a consideration of the question of whether or not a conviction in a recorder's court, followed by a sentence to imprisonment in the city jail in the proportion of one day's imprisonment for each $2 of the unpaid portion of the fine, was a valid judgment. The recorder, in imposing the sentence, had apparently followed the provisions of section 1205, which had been approved by the Governor March 10, 1891, but had not yet gone into effect. Three of the justices were of the opinion that under section 1446 of the Penal Code the judgment of the justice's court might provide for a greater allowance to the prisoner for each day of imprisonment than $1 per day. Three were of the opinion that the section did not authorize such a judgment, but two of them, Justices De Haven and Harrison, were of the opinion that the question could not be raised on habeas corpus. Later, however, the opinion expressed by Mr. Justice Beatty in Ex parte Soto, supra, was concurred in by four justices of the Supreme Court, including Justice Sharpstein, who did not participate in Ex parte Soto, supra, and thus became the opinion of the Supreme Court. Ex parte Noble, 96 Cal.

362, 31 Pac. 224. This decision is only of importance in the case at bar because it is expressly based upon the proposition that section 1446 was still applicable to justices' courts, for section 1205 expressly provided for the rate of imprisonment of one day for each $2, and this section as thus amended was in force at the time of the imposition of the sentence considered in Ex parte Noble, supra, and unless section 1446 was still in force in justices' courts, the mere reference to section 1205 would have been sufficient authority for affirming the imprisonment at the rate of $2 per day.

As we have already pointed out, the case of Ex parte Erdmann, supra, was not based upon the limitation expressed in section 1205 of the Penal Code nor upon any distinction between sections 1205 and 1446 of the Penal Code, but upon the proposition that the extent of the imprisonment for nonpayment of fine could not exceed the term of imprisonment provided for the offense. This case, however, is not the latest expression of this court upon that subject. In Ex parte Karlson, 160 Cal. 378, 117 Pac. 447, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1334, the court had under consideration a sentence for contempt. The petitioner had been fined in the sum of $200 and it was provided:

> "Upon his failure to pay such fine he be committed to the county jail until such fine is paid at the rate of one day's imprisonment for each two dollars of said fine."

The court held that this imprisonment for the nonpayment of the fine was valid notwithstanding the fact that the power to imprison for contempt was limited to five days. Code Civ. Proc. § 1218. The court held that the power to imprison for nonpayment of fine existed at common law; that section 1205 of the Penal Code did not apply to nor limit the powers of the superior court to punish for contempt and remanded the prisoner notwithstanding the fact that the term of five days had already been served by him. This case must be taken as a repudiation of the doctrine that there is any inherent restriction upon the power to imprison for nonpayment of fine, merely because the Legislature has fixed a term of imprisonment as a punishment for the offense which may be less than the term of imprisonment for the nonpayment of a fine. It was suggested by Justice Angellotti in his dissenting opinion that the result reached by the court might justify permanent imprisonment where the party was unable to pay the fine. The answer of a majority of this court to this proposition was that excessive fines and imprisonment were prohibited by the Constitution, and consequently, if the imprisonment was thus excessive, there would be relief under the constitutional provision limiting the power of courts to impose excessive imprisonment. In this connection it should be noted that in a recent case (In re Garner, 179 Cal. 409, 177 Pac. 162) the provisions of section 1218 of the Code of Civil Procedure limiting the power to punish for contempt by imprisonment for five days was sustained as a constitutional limitation upon the inherent power of the court to punish for contempt. The cases of Ex parte Karlson, supra, and Ex parte Crittenden, 62 Cal. 534, were based upon the fundamental proposition laid down in Ex parte Kelly, supra, that imprisonment for nonpayment of fine is not a punishment in addition to the fine, but a mere method of enforcing the collection of the fine. In the case of Ex parte Karlson, supra, the following is quoted from Ex parte Crittenden, supra:

> "The payment of the fine is the punishment. The awarding or infliction of the fine is no punishment. The commitment is an incident of the fine. It is not, in any manner, the 'imprisonment' allowed by the statute. The payment of the fine, and a commitment for not paying it, cannot coexist. The commitment is not a separate punishment or imprisonment added to the payment of a fine. It is in this view that it has always been held that where a statute authorizes or prescribes the infliction of a fine as a punishment, either for a contempt of court or for a defined offense, it is lawful for the court inflicting the fine to direct that the party stand committed until the fine is paid, although there be no specific affirmative grant of power in the statute to make such direction."

In so far, then, as the case of Ex parte Erdmann, supra, decided in 1891, lays down principles in conflict with the case of Ex parte Kelly, decided in 1865, and People v. Markham, supra, decided in 1857, it was in effect overruled by Ex parte Karlson, supra, decided in 1911. We are therefore free to consider the question here involved upon its merits and in consonance with the decisions sustaining the power to punish by imprisonment for nonpayment of a fine as an incident to the collection of the fine.

If the conviction was in the superior court, the limitation in section 1205 of the Penal Code would clearly apply and require the discharge of the petitioner; but the conviction in this case was in the justice's court, and section 1446 of the Penal Code applies unless the amendment to section 1205 in 1891 was a limitation upon justices' courts as well as upon superior courts. We may say that the latter point is not advanced by the petitioner and it is clear that it is not tenable for the reasons heretofore given.

We conclude, then, that under the provisions of section 1446 of the Penal Code a justice's court may, upon imposing a fine for the offense of having intoxicating liquor in possession, direct the imprisonment of the defendant in accordance with the provisions of section 1446; that is to say, at the rate of $1 per day until the fine be satisfied.

Petitioner remanded.

LAMBORN v. LAMBORN. (S. F. 10138.)

Divorce ⚷222—Former wife entitled to attorney's fees and expenses on husband's application for modification of decree for alimony.

Where a former husband, after rendition of a divorce decree, has applied for a modification of that decree as relates to the alimony, the court may, under Civ. Code, §§ 137, 139, award the former wife whatever costs, attorney's fees, or expenses are necessary for the prosecution of an appeal rendered necessary by the former husband's application.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; A. F. St. Sure, Judge.

Action by Frances H. Lamborn against Ervin H. Lamborn for divorce. Judgment for plaintiff. Motion of defendant for a modification as to the amount of alimony. Judgment modified. From an order awarding counsel fees and costs on an appeal by plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hayes, Oliphant & Dukette, of Oakland, for appellant.

Dixon L. Phillips, of Oakland, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The parties to this proceeding were divorced, and by the final decree of divorce an award of permanent alimony of $45 per month was made to the plaintiff. After the time for appeal from the final decree, both parties moved the court for a modification of the amount of alimony awarded to the plaintiff. The trial court decreased the amount of alimony to $35 per month. The plaintiff took an appeal from the order and moved the court for an allowance for attorney's fees and costs on the appeal thus taken. The defendant appealed from the order awarding counsel fees and costs on the plaintiff's appeal. We will hereafter refer to the parties as the former husband and former wife.

The former husband contends that the trial court had no jurisdiction to make an award for counsel fees and costs on the appeal of the former wife, from the order modifying the allowance of alimony made to her in the final decree of divorce. Section 139 of the Civil Code provides that the award made to the wife for her support during her life in the final decree of divorce may be modified from time to time. Section 137 of the Civil Code provides that, during the pendency of the divorce action, the court may, in its discretion require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary for the prosecution of the action and for support and maintenance. It also provides:

> "The final judgment in such action may be enforced by the court by such order or orders as in its discretion it may from time to time deem necessary, and such order or orders may be varied, altered, or revoked at the discretion of the court."

It matters not whether we consider the allowance of costs and attorney's fees to the wife to enable her to appeal from the order modifying the decree as an additional allowance to her for her support as authorized by section 139, Civil Code, made after the final decree of divorce, or whether we consider that the divorce action is pending within the meaning of section 137, Civil Code, so long as the court retains power to modify the terms of the decree, or whether we regard it as an order deemed necessary for the enforcement of the final decree within the meaning of the provisions for such enforcement contained in section 137, Civil Code, above quoted. It is clear that the court has jurisdiction to award the former wife whatever costs and expenses are necessary for the prosecution of an appeal rendered necessary by the application of the husband for the modification of the decree.

It is true that an ordinary action is deemed to be pending only until the appeal from the judgment is determined or until the time for an appeal has passed (section 1049, Code Civ. Proc.), but this general provision of the statute with reference to ordinary judgments is modified in the case of divorce actions by the provisions of the Code, authorizing the modification of an award for alimony at any time after the final decree is entered. If there is any doubt about this proposition, it is clear that, where it is necessary for the wife to maintain a proceeding against her husband in order to secure proper maintenance that the costs of such a proceeding may be necessary for her support and justify an allowance to her for her support in the amount of her expenses so necessarily incurred. Whether we regard the allowance to the wife as money necessary for her support, the allowance of which is authorized by section 139, Civil Code, or as money paid to her as counsel fees and costs during the pendency of the divorce action, it is clear that the court is authorized to make such an allowance to the former wife.

It is contended that this allowance should not have been made until after the appeal had actually been taken. We think it unnecessary to discuss this point, inasmuch as the appeal was in fact taken and is now pending in this court for determination.

Judgment affirmed.

PRICHARD et al. v. KIMBALL et al.

1. Pleading 🔑359—Verified answer may not be stricken as sham, if material issue is presented.

Where an answer is verified, and no claim was made by affidavit or otherwise it was false, it may not be considered sham before trial if it presents a material issue.

2. Pleading 🔑8(6, 11)—Denial that lease and option was nullity or constituted a cloud on title held conclusions.

In an action to have declared void a lease containing an option and to cancel it of record, and to have cloud on title to leased premises, caused by the lease removed, an answer denying that the lease and option, or either of them, had become a nullity, or that they were a cloud on plaintiff's title, were conclusions of law, raising no issue.

3. Pleading 🔑358—Denial that defendant threatened to use outstanding instruments of title to vex plaintiff held immaterial, and to present no issue.

In an action to cancel a lease and option, an answer asserting that the defendant had not threatened to use the outstanding documents vexatiously against plaintiff was insufficient to present material issue on motion to strike, as Civ. Code, § 3412, provides that a written instrument as to which there is a "reasonable apprehension" that it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void may be canceled.

4. Pleading 🔑358—Allegation that attorney's fee was not reasonable held not to present an issue as against motion to strike.

In an action by lessor to have canceled a lease and option, providing that, if lessee's act caused lessor to bring action for enforcement, lessor shall be entitled to reasonable attorney's fees, a denial in defendants' answer that $1,000 was a reasonable attorney's fee presented an immaterial issue as against a motion to strike; the attorney's fees provided in the lease not being the cause of action, but an incident to it.

5. Landlord and tenant 🔑92(1)—Option in lease held nonassignable.

Where a lease containing provision against assignment gave lessee an option to purchase, conditioned on performance of the terms of lease running only during the term of the lease, and that, in case of exercise of the option, purchase price should be paid in installments, and no deed given until 60 per cent. of the purchase price was paid, the option formed a part of the lease, and was subject to the provision against assignment.

6. Appeal and error 🔑193(9)—Contention that lessor's complaint to cancel lease was insufficient for failure to give lessees notice of nonperformance held proper on appeal, though not made below.

In lessor's action to cancel lease, defendant's contention, that inasmuch as the lease required lessor to give lessee notice in event of breach, and provided for the giving of a deed by lessee, who had erected a building, in case he did not exercise his option to purchase, the complaint was insufficient for lack of allegation of notice to lessee, was a contention which might be raised at any time during the proceedings under Code Civ. Proc. § 434, though no demurrer was filed, and no such contention made below.

7. Cancellation of instruments 🔑22—Notice of breach by lessor held futile and not necessary as condition of lessor's suit to cancel lease.

Though a lease giving lessee option to purchase on faithful performance provided that lessor should give lessee notice of breach, and that, in case lessee did not exercise the option, he should execute a deed to lessor, allegation by lessor that such notice was given was not essential to his right to maintain suit to cancel the lease, because lessee was setting up some claim of right under the lease and option which the lessee's answer set forth, and asked decree that he be permitted to exercise the option, making it apparent that notice would have been futile.

8. Cancellation of instruments 🔑62—Provision for attorney's fees to lessor enforcing lease or quieting title held not to apply in suit to cancel lease.

A provision in a lease giving reasonable attorney's fees to lessor in case suit should be brought to enforce it, or for quieting title to or obtaining possession of the premises, did not apply where the lessor took possession of the premises and brought suit to declare void and cancel the lease and option contained therein on the ground that lessee was setting up some claim of right under such lease and option, though the complaint asked that the cloud on lessor's title caused by the lease be removed, as such suit was not to enforce the lease or obtain possession, nor was it an action to quiet title; there being a clear distinction between the old remedy to cancel instruments preserved by Civ. Code, § 3412, and the newer statutory remedy, under Code Civ. Proc. § 738, to determine adverse claims or quiet title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles R. Burnell, Judge.

Bill by Elmer M. Prichard and others against Carolyn Kimball and another, administrators of the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

D. A. Stuart, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Geo. A. Prichard, Leslie E. Clawson, and M. M. Meyers, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to have declared void a lease, to secure its cancellation of record and delivery up to them, to have the cloud upon their title to the leased premises caused by the lease removed, and to recover attorneys' fees and costs.

Plaintiffs, on June 30, 1917, were the owners of certain described real property in Los Angeles county, and on that date leased it to Wade H. Kimball, since deceased, and A. J. O. Korbel, one of the defendants herein. The lease by its terms was to expire December 31, 1920. Some time before November 18, 1918, defendant Korbel assigned his interest in it to Wade H. Kimball. On the latter date a supplementary lease was entered into between plaintiffs Elmer M. Prichard and Hallie Prichard, who are husband and wife, as lessors, and Wade H. Kimball and defendant Carolyn Kimball, as lessees, in which were incorporated all the provisions of the first lease. Wade H. Kimball is now deceased, and defendants Carolyn Kimball, his wife, and A. C. Thorpe are the administrators of his estate.

By the terms of the lease the lessees agreed to erect a frame cottage upon the property, which was to become a part of the realty; to cultivate the land in a proper manner; to commit or suffer no waste or damage to be done to the premises; to pay the lessors $50 per month rental; to pay all regular state, county, and city taxes levied, and to have the house they should construct insured. It was further understood and agreed that the lessees might make other improvements upon the premises, such as the installation of pipe lines and pumping facilities, at their own expense; that time should be of the essence of the contract; that, in event of a failure of the lessees to perform any of their obligations under the contract, the lessors should give them notice of the breach, whereupon the lessees should have 30 days to perform the things required by the notice; that the parties of the second part should not assign the lease without the written consent of the lessors, except from one to another, such an assignment not to release either of the lessees to carry out the terms of the lease, and that the lessees would give peaceable possession of the said premises at the expiration of the lease.

In consideration of the promises and agreements on the part of the lessees, the lessors agreed, in the event that the lessees carried out the terms of the agreement, that the lessees should be granted an option during the life of the agreement to purchase the property on or before December 31, 1920, for $13,500, $3,000 to be paid at the time of the exercise of the option, and the balance in installments. It was further agreed that, if the lessees exercised the option, they should give notice thereof in writing to the lessors, and at the same time make the cash payment provided, and that if the lessees failed to comply with the provisions of the lease and the lessees elected to terminate the lease, the option should also terminate without further notice or act by the lessors. Further provisions were included, relating to the giving of a deed by the lessors and the payment of an existing mortgage in case the lessees exercised the option. Finally, it was agreed that, should the lessees fail to exercise the right to purchase, they should execute to the lessors a deed sufficient to convey title to the lessors, free and clear of any act or thing done, made or suffered by the lessees, and that, should suit be brought "to enforce any of the terms or conditions of this lease, or for the purpose of quieting title to or obtaining possession of the said premises, or any portion thereof, from the said parties of the second part, * * * there shall be allowed to the parties of the first part * * * a reasonable attorney's fee to be included as a part of any judgment in favor of the parties of the first part."

By the terms of the supplementary lease the lessors agreed to mortgage the premises for $1,400 to install a pumping plant. The lessees agreed to purchase and install an electric motor, which should become a part of the realty, to pay interest on the mortgage, and to pay the sum of $1,400 in addition to the $3,000 first payment in case they should exercise their option of purchase, and at that time the mortgage to install the pumping plant should be unpaid.

It was alleged in the complaint that the lease and option expired on December 31, 1920; that no extension thereof was granted; that no notice of their election to exercise the option has been given by the lessees, and that no payment whatever has been made on account of the option to purchase the premises; that by reason of their expiration the lease and option have become a nullity; that it does not appear from the records of Los Angeles county, or upon the face of the lease and option, whether or not the lessees have exercised their option to purchase the premises, have given notice of their intention to do so, or have paid any sum for the purchase, as provided in the option; that the defendants are setting up some claim, the exact nature of which is unknown to the plaintiffs, to the effect that the defendants still have some rights under the lease and option; that the instruments throw a cloud over the plaintiffs' title, and that there is a reasonable apprehension, and plaintiffs do apprehend, that if the instruments are left outstanding serious injury may be caused to the plaintiffs; that it was necessary for plaintiffs to employ counsel in behalf of the matters for which it was provided in the lease reasonable counsel fees should be allowed, and that such reasonable fees for the services in the case at bar are $1,000.

Defendant A. J. O. Korbel interposed a demurrer to the complaint, which was overruled. Defendants Carolyn Kimball and A. C. Thorpe, as administrators of the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, and Carolyn Kimball in her own behalf, filed an answer. In it they denied that, by reason of their expiration and termination, the lease and option, or either of them, became a nullity; that they threaten to use the lease and option vexatiously against the plaintiffs, or that these documents throw a cloud over plaintiffs' title; and denied that $1,000 was a reasonable attorney's fee. Further answering the complaint, it was alleged that the plaintiffs had failed to carry out and perform their part of the lease and option; that, after defendants were let into possession, they made improvements amounting to $1,500, which increased the value of the land more than $10,000, and paid sums totaling $1,450 to plaintiffs and $65.92 taxes; that, in order to satisfy creditors of the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, it was deemed necessary to sell the option rights of the estate in the premises; that on or about August 3, 1920, the plaintiffs wrongfully and forcibly entered upon the premises, and took and retained possession of them; that, although defendants procured persons who were willing to buy the premises subject to the option rights for $22,500, provided, upon inspection, they should be found to be as represented, and although the premises were as represented the plaintiffs prevented the buyers from inspecting the premises, and stated that the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, no longer had any interest in the premises; that by reason of these facts defendants had been damaged to the extent of $7,500, and plaintiffs are entitled to no relief until they offer to do equity.

In a part of the answer designated as a counterclaim similar facts were alleged, and it was further stated that plaintiffs gave defendants no notice, as provided in the lease, wherein it was claimed there was any breach or failure upon the part of the lessees to perform their obligations under the contract. Defendants prayed that the option be declared to be in full force and effect for such time as the court might deem it necessary for them to sell the option rights, and asked that, if this could not be done, they recover $7,500 and costs from plaintiffs.

A demurrer to this answer was filed, but before decision thereon the entire answer was stricken from the files upon the grounds that it was sham and irrelevant, irrelevant and redundant. Leave was granted to further answer within 10 days, but none was filed. Thereupon "this cause, taken as confessed by the said defendants served with process, coming on to be heard before the court, the court, having hearing evidence presented herein finds that all of the allegations of plaintiffs' complaint are true, and that plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against the said defendants." The lease, supplementary lease, and option were declared to be terminated, null and void, and canceled of record; the defendants were declared to have no rights under the option; any cloud on plaintiffs' title growing out of the leases and option was declared removed; and it was further ordered that the plaintiffs recover from defendants the sum of $600 attorney's fees and $15.20 costs, "all to be paid in due course of administration of the estate of the said Wade H. Kimball, deceased." From that judgment the defendants, except A. J. O. Korbel, take this appeal.

[1] Appellants' first assignment of error is that the trial court erred in striking out their answer. It is insisted that, as the answer was verified, and no claim was made by affidavit or otherwise that it was false, and as nothing appears in the record to question its truth or its form, it could not be stricken out as sham. Before it can be said the answer was properly stricken out on that ground, it must appear that no defense was set up by it, for it was held in Greenbaum v. Turrill, 57 Cal. 285, 291, that a verified answer, setting up a defense, either affirmatively or by a denial of the allegations of the complaint, may not be considered sham before a trial of the issues. Therefore it is necessary only to determine whether or not a material issue was presented by the answer, for, if none was, the answer was properly stricken out as irrelevant. Felch v. Beaudry, 40 Cal. 439; Hemme v. Hays, 55 Cal. 337; Montgomery v. Merrill, 62 Cal. 385; Loveland v. Garner, 74 Cal. 298, 15 Pac. 844.

[2, 3] In the case at bar the answer denied that the lease and option, or either of them, had become a nullity, that they threw a cloud on respondents' title or that appellants threatened to use the documents vexatiously against respondents. The first two of these denials were conclusions of law, which raised no issue, and need not be considered. Frost v. Harford, 40 Cal. 165. The third denial is immaterial, for section 3412 of the Civil Code provides only that—

> "A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled." (Italics ours.)

The material allegation of the complaint in this respect was that if left outstanding there was reasonable apprehension that the lease and option would cause serious injury to respondents, in that appellants were setting up some claim under the instrument. Whether the appellants were using the document vexatiously or not was immaterial. If they were claiming rights under it, and their claim was groundless, respondents had the right to a decree that as to them the instrument was void, whether appellants' claim was bona fide or for purpose of vexation. If their claim was valid, it would make no difference whether it was vexatious to the repondents or not. There was no denial of any other facts stated in the complaint.

[4] The denial that $1,000 was a reasonable attorney's fee was also immaterial, the attorney's fee provided in the lease not being the cause of action, but an incident to it. Huber v. Shedoudy, 180 Cal. 311, 314, 181 Pac. 63.

[5] The second part of the answer and the counterclaim rest upon the proposition that appellants might have sold their option rights but for the unlawful act of the respondents in taking possession of the premises before the expiration of the lease. It is claimed in this connection that, although it was provided in the lease that the lessees should not assign it without the written consent of the lessors, the lease and option were severable, and the option could be assigned without the lessors' consent. We do not so read the lease, which, with the option, formed one document. The first part of the lease recited the obligations of the lessees, including the agreement that they would not assign it. Then followed the provisions relating to the option, the granting of which was conditioned on the faithful carrying out of the terms of the lease by the lessees, and which was to run only during the term of the lease.

With reference to the option, it was provided that, should the conditions of the lease be performed and the option exercised by the lessees, the purchase price should be paid in installments, and no deed should be given by the lessors until 60 per cent. of the purchase price was paid. The option thus formed a part of the lease, and was dependent on it. In view of the provisions for installment payments in case the option was exercised, and that no deed should be given until 60 per cent. of the purchase price had been paid, it cannot be said the lessors intended, as to the option, to deal with any one whom the lessees might select. The option must be held to be part of the lease, and governed by the clause that no assignment should be made except with the written consent of the lessors.

It was not alleged that the lessors agreed to the transfer of the option rights to any of the purchasers which the appellants alleged they had procured. In the absence of such assent, they could not sell the right to purchase the property. Therefore their claim for damages, based solely on the fact that the lessors had prevented them from selling the property at a profit, is without merit, and presents no issue. It follows there was no error in the court's striking out the answer and counterclaim on the ground they were irrelevant.

[6] Appellants further contend that, inasmuch as the lease provided for a notice to be given by the lessors in the event of a breach of the lease by the lessees, and for the giving of a deed by the lessees in case they did not exercise their option of purchase, the lessees were entitled to a notice and demand for the deed before the lessors became entitled to bring this action. There is no allegation in the complaint that any such notice was given or demand made, and it is insisted by appellants that because of this fact it affirmatively appears respondents are entitled to no relief in this suit, and that the complaint fails to state a cause of action. Although it appears from the record that no such contention was made by appellants in the trial court, no demurrer having been filed, this point is one which may be raised at any time during the proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 434; Ryan v. Holliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 Pac. 891; Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 374, 83 Pac. 148.

[7] The case here differs from one brought before the making of a demand to recover money or enforce the performance of an obligation, in that here the execution of the deed, for which it is claimed the demand should have been made, is not the thing sought in the action. The contention is that, had respondents pursued another remedy, appellants would not have been subjected to the annoyance and expense of a suit. However that may be, it is settled that a demand is unnecessary where it appears it would be unavailing. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 104, 120, 33 Pac. 836; California Cured Fruit Ass'n v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 713, 719, 75 Pac. 320. In this case it is alleged in the complaint that appellants were setting up some claim of right under the lease and option. Such a fact would be entirely incompatible with a willingness to give a quitclaim deed to the premises. In addition, these appellants in their answer set forth their claim, and asked a decree that they be allowed to exercise the option. Under such circumstances a demand for a deed would obviously have been fruitless.

[8] There remains but to consider the action of the court in allowing counsel fees. Under the lease reasonable attorney's fees were to be allowed in case suit should be brought to enforce any of the terms of the lease or for "quieting title to, or obtaining possession of, the said premises." This action is not brought to enforce any term of the lease or to obtain possession of the premises. Nor, in our opinion, is it an action to quiet title. Although one result of an action to cancel an instrument may be to remove a cloud from title, there is a well-recognized difference between such an action and one to quiet title. Thus, in Castro v. Barry, 79 Cal. 443, 21 Pac. 946, it was pointed out that suits to have an instrument canceled or adjudged to be void were quite common in the old chancery practice, and were preserved in section 3412 of the Civil Code, while suits to determine adverse claims, or to quiet title, were unknown to the old chancery practice, but were provided for by statute and carried into section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure. See, also, Code Civ. Proc. § 749a. The court there said:

> "The distinction between the two kinds of action is clear. They are different not merely in form (for we have no forms of action in the common-law sense), but in purpose. In the former case the proceeding is aimed at a particular instrument, or piece of evidence, which is dangerous to the plaintiff's rights, and which may be ordered to be destroyed in whosesoever hands it may happen to be. While in the latter, the proceeding is for the purpose of stopping the mouth of a person who has asserted or is asserting a claim to the plaintiff's property, whether such claim be founded upon evidence or utterly baseless. It is not aimed at a particular piece of evidence, but at the pretensions of an individual."

See, also, Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 697, 64 Pac. 1091.

The leases were evidently drawn with care, and it cannot be said the rights of the lessors were not fully safeguarded. Attorney's fees were provided for only in the cases enumerated, and actions to quiet title were expressly included. In view of the marked difference between such actions and the one at bar it must be held this is not an action in which respondents are entitled to recover attorney's fees from appellants.

Appellants object to the provision of the judgment that plaintiffs recover attorney's fees and costs from all of them, but "all to be paid in due course of administration of the estate of the said Wade H. Kimball, deceased." However, in our opinion, this clause could only have reference to such portion of the total amounts as were collected from the estate, and was not a direction that the whole judgment be collected from it.

The judgment as to the appellants herein is modified by striking therefrom the portion providing for a recovery of attorney's fees, and as so modified is affirmed; each party to pay his own costs on appeal.

PRICHARD et al. v. KIMBALL et al.

Cancellation of instruments 🔑35(3) — Assigning lessor held proper party defendant to suit by lessor to cancel lease.

Where a lease provided that assignment should not release assignor from carrying out the lease, and one of the lessees assigned his interest, and a supplementary lease between the other lessee and lessor provided that none of the lessees under the first should be released by the second lease, the assigning lessee was a proper party defendant to the lessor's action to cancel the lease and an option contained therein, and to remove the same as a cloud on title.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles R. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Elmer M. Prichard and others against Carolyn Kimball and another, administrators of the estate of Wade H. Kimball, deceased, and A. J. O. Korbel. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Korbel appeals. Modified and affirmed.

John R. Layng, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. A. Prichard, Leslie E. Clawson, and M. M. Meyers, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The facts in this case are the same as in Prichard v. Kimball (L. A. No. 7083) 214 Pac. 863, this day filed. This appeal is taken separately by defendant A. J. O. Korbel from the judgment entered against all the defendants and rendered as to him upon his failure to answer after the overruling of his general demurrer to the complaint.

Appellant contends the complaint fails to state a cause of action, in that there is no allegation that respondents demanded of him or that he failed or refused to give a quitclaim deed upon the expiration of the lease, which it is insisted was necessary before the respondents could institute this action; that, from the fact that the second lease, which materially altered the terms of the first, was not signed by appellant, but by Wade H. Kimball, deceased, and defendant Carolyn Kimball only, it follows that appellant has assigned his interest in the lease or had been released by operation of law arising from the act of signing the second lease.

Considering these arguments, it must be borne in mind that this action is not one to recover damages for a breach of the contract, or to enforce any of its provisions, but to cancel the outstanding contract, which, it is admitted by the demurrer, has terminated and expired, but from the face of which it cannot be ascertained whether or not the defendants still have any rights thereunder.

With reference to the first point, it is sufficient to refer to the holding in Prichard v. Kimball, supra, wherein was considered the appeal of appellant's codefendants, that, in view of the allegations of the complaint to the effect that the defendants were claiming rights under the lease and option, a demand for a deed would have availed respondents nothing, and was not necessary.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Considering the second point, in our opinion it is immaterial whether or not appellant has assigned his rights under the principal lease. It was provided in that instrument that such an assignment should not release the assigning lessee from carrying out the terms of the lease, and in the supplementary lease that none of the lessees under the first lease should be deemed to be released from any terms or conditions thereunder by the supplementary lease. Appellant, although not a party to the supplementary lease, was in any event still bound by the terms of the first lease, and, as far as could be determined therefrom, remained a party to it. He was therefore properly made a party to this action to cancel it and a cause of action stated as to him in that regard.

In view of our conclusion in Prichard v. Kimball, supra, that this is not an action to quiet title or to enforce a term of the lease, the complaint did not state a cause of action entitling respondents to recover attorneys' fees, and it follows that that portion of the judgment allowing such fees is erroneous.

The judgment as to this appellant is modified by striking therefrom the portion providing for a recovery of attorneys' fees, and as modified is affirmed, each party to pay his own costs on appeal.

PASADENA UNIVERSITY v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY. (L. A. 7003.)

1. Taxation 🔑204(1)—Constitutional amendment not limited or extended by statute subsequently enacted.

Pol. Code, § 3613, subd. 2, enacted subsequent to the adoption of Const. art. 13, § 1a, providing for exemptions, can in no way limit or extend the terms thereof.

2. Taxation 🔑242(1)—Constitutional exemption of collegiate institutions held applicable only to institutions whose whole work is of "collegiate grade."

Const. art. 13, § 1a, providing, "any educational institution of collegiate grade * * * shall hold exempt from taxation its buildings and equipment, * * * used exclusively for the purposes of education," held to exempt from taxation only an institution of collegiate grade as a whole, and not one wherein part of the students enrolled were doing work of less than a collegiate grade.

3. Statutes 🔑194—General words, followed by enumeration of particular classes, limited thereby.

It is a rule of construction of statutes that, where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes, the general words will be construed as applicable only to the persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated; the words being construed in their natural and ordinary sense.

4. Statutes 🔑235—Courts should liberally construe statutes for maintaining educational institutions.

It is the policy of the law to favor by reasonable legislation the maintenance of educational institutions, and it is the duty of the courts, in construing such statutes, to indulge in reasonable liberality to effect the purpose of the legislation.

5. Taxation 🔑438—Correction of assessment roll by removing notation of exemption held proper.

Where it appeared that the notation, "Exemption allowed," had been erroneously indorsed on the assessment roll opposite the listing of a particular educational institution's property, held, under Pol. Code, § 3881, as amended by St. 1917, p. 968, that the auditor should have extended the tax, notwithstanding the erroneous notation of exemption, and a failure to do so was subject to correction, with the written consent of the district attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Pasadena University, a corporation, against the County of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan Newby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Gordon Boller, Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This cause is before us after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, Division 1. The appeal is from an order denying appellant relief from a property tax assessed against its property for the year 1919.

Appellant, an institution of learning, chartered or incorporated by virtue of the laws of this state, claims that it is an educational institution of collegiate grade, and, being such, lays claim to those certain exemptions allowed by the provisions of article 13, § 1a, of the Constitution of this state. It is also the claim of appellant that the county assessor of Los Angeles county, having entered on the assessment roll opposite the listing of appellant's property a notation, "Exemption allowed," had no authority thereafter to cancel said notation or entry and insert in lieu thereof "No exemption." This right involves an interpretation of section 3881 et seq., Political Code, which will hereafter receive attention.

The mandate of the Constitution is that all property of the state, except as otherwise in the Constitution provided, and not exempt under the laws of the United States shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained by law. Article 13, § 1a, under which exemption is claimed, provides:

> "Any educational institution of collegiate grade, within the state of California, not conducted for profit, shall hold exempt from taxation its buildings and equipment, its grounds within which its buildings are located, not exceeding one hundred acres in area, its securities and income used exclusively for the purposes of education."

[1] The decision of this case rests solely upon an interpretation of the language of the Constitution. Section 3613, subdivision 2, Political Code, was passed subsequent to the adoption of the constitutional amendment above set out, and it can in no way limit or extend the exemption therein granted. Neither is there involved in this case a claim of exemption of an institution covering part of a collegiate course, nor claim of exemption for that part of the property of an educational institution exclusively devoted to an entire or partial collegiate course, where such institution also conducts other grades on other property.

Within the period of time to which our attention is directed, to wit, the first Monday in March, 1919, and for several months thereafter, the total number of enrolled students in attendance at appellant University was 304, of which number but 37 had, before admission thereto, completed a four-year high school course or its equivalent. One hundred and seventeen pupils were enrolled in the academic department; the only requirements for admission thereto being the completion of the eighth grade course. Eighty-nine were in attendance upon the grammar grade department. Of the remaining 61 students, two-thirds of them were taking work which required for admission not less than four years of high school work or its equivalent. Thus it will be seen that but a small fractional part of the student body was engaged in work of a collegiate grade. But it is not necessary to resort solely to the laws of ratio or relations to determine the legal status of appellant.

[2] The language of the Constitution seems clear and unambiguous as to meaning and intent, and it is not at all necessary to read into it any other word or words to persuade us, even against our inclination, that appellant is not an educational institution of collegiate grade, and is therefore without the exemption provisions of the Constitution. Unquestionably it was the intention of the electorate, as expressed in the language of the Constitution, to exempt only educational institutions of collegiate grade. If it was not so, the words "of collegiate grade" would have been omitted, and the property of all educational institutions, both graded and mixed, if used exclusively for educational purposes, and not for profit, would have come within the exemption. Had it been the intention to grant the exemption claimed, undoubtedly appropriate and definite terms would have been selected to express the real purpose. It would not have been difficult to have said, by the selection of words and the arrangement of sentences, that the property of all educational institutions in which a collegiate grade is maintained or conducted shall be exempt from taxation.

As we read the language of the Constitution, exemption is granted to an institution of collegiate grade as a whole and not otherwise. Appellant University is made up or composed of a number of grades or groups of students ranking in classification below the grade defined as a collegiate grade. By far the largest number of enrolled students are not within the collegiate grade classification. Appellant is not, therefore, and cannot be, characterized as an institution exclusively of any particular grade, but one of many grades.

We are not required to speak in defense of the policy of the law granting exemptions to an institution of collegiate grade exclusively and withholding its favors from institutions such as appellant. The fact, however, that free elemental, rudimentary, and grammar schools are quite universal throughout the state, and the number of institutions of a collegiate grade offering training in technical knowledge and advanced branches of education are limited in number, and can be maintained only at a high cost to the educational bodies supporting them, may have been deemed a sufficient justification for the state to encourage by way of tax exemptions the establishment of such private institutions not conducted for profit and devoted exclusively to educational work of collegiate grade. The educational benefits accruing to the state by reason of the existence of such institutions may have been regarded as outbalancing any loss suffered by the tax-exemption. Many good reasons may be advanced to justify the exemption. The language we are called upon to construe is not only statutory, but also constitutional, and we are not at liberty to wrest from its place a single phrase in order to give a meaning to a section of the Constitution not warranted by the language employed. In such case we are bound to respect the maxim, "Ita lex scripta est."

[3] The subject of the section under discussion is "Educational Institutions of Collegiate Grade." These words are the antecedent of "used exclusively for the purposes of education," and under all rules or canons of construction qualify and limit the purposes for which the buildings, equipment, and grounds may be used. It is the rule of construction that, where general words follow the enumeration of particular classes of per sons or things, the general words will be construed as applicable only to persons or things of the same general nature or class as those enumerated. 36 Cyc. 1119; 25 R. C. L. 996, 997; 2 Lewis' Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 803, 804. Words used in a statute are to be read in a natural and ordinary sense. Black on Interpretation of Laws (2d Ed.) pp. 142, 143.

> "Where words and sentences, and parts of sentences, having no very definite signification in their ordinary use, are employed and clearly intended to have a particular and definite meaning and application, and this appears from their particular use, connection, and application in the statute, that meaning and application must be accepted as proper and controlling. * * * The rule of 'noscitur a sociis' is frequently applied in the construction of revenue laws." 25 R. C. L. 995, 996.

[4] The maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," bears with full force upon the provisions of the language under consideration. The construction we have been forced to place upon the language is not narrow, but is as broad as the language itself will permit and a failure to go further is due to a dearth of words. It is true that it is the policy of the law to favor by reasonable legislation the maintenance of institutions designed to promote education generally. It is the duty of courts, in construing statutes enacted for their benefit, to indulge in reasonable liberality, to the end that the evident purposes of such legislation may become effective. It is equally true, on the other hand, that grants of exemption from taxation cannot be allowed, unless the intention to do so is expressed in direct terms, or is fairly inferable from the language of the instrument by which the right is claimed.

In concluding the discussion of this branch of the case, we may add to what has already been said that we are further fortified in our conclusion by the argument made in favor of the adoption of the constitutional amendment, as prepared by its sponsers and distributed to the qualified electors, as required by law, for their enlightenment and consideration prior to the general election at which it was submitted and adopted, to wit, November 3, 1914. We quote the following from the argument of the proponent:

> "Sixth. The amendment as drawn is carefully safeguarded against possible abuse by the following limitations: * * *
> "(a) It exempts only institutions of collegiate grade. * * *
> "(c) The exempt property is limited to buildings, equipment, and grounds, with securities and income 'used exclusively for the purposes of education.' Real estate held for investment or revenue will be taxed just as at present, only the educational 'plant' actually in use being exempt from taxation. * * *"

[5] The final question raised in this case is as to the scope of the authority of the assessor to correct an assessment at any time after the assessment has been made and prior to the sale of the property assessed for delinquent taxes under the provisions of section 3881, Political Code as amended by St. 1917, p. 968. Said section provides that:

> "Defects in description or defects in form or clerical omissions of the assessor, or clerical errors of the assessor, in any assessment book, when it can be ascertained from the assessment book, or from the assessor's maps or block books, or other papers in the assessor's office, what was intended, or what should have been assessed, may, with the written consent of the district attorney, be supplied or corrected by the assessor at any time after the assessment" and prior to the sale of said property.

Counsel have devoted themselves to a consideration of the meaning of the clause "or other papers in the assessor's office." We hardly think a decision of the question whether or not the cards and papers resorted to by respondent are sufficient to authorize the assessor to change the assessment in the manner attempted, to be necessary for a decision of the instant case. The situation, as we understand it, was as follows:

The head or manager of the Pasadena University failed to file a request for exemption from taxation, as required by law, until he had been notified by the assessor that, unless he did so, the University property would be assessed and required to pay its taxes. A few days before the first Monday in July, 1919, the assessor received from the head of the University an affidavit and claim for exemption. On July 7, 1919, before the rolls had passed from his custody, upon further consideration of said affidavit and claim, in connection with other information received, the assessor concluded that appellant was not entitled to exemption, and on that day directed one of his deputies to cancel said exemption entry. This the deputy neglected to do. On the same day the assessor indorsed the words "No exemption" across the face of appellant's affidavit and claim for exemption, which was then on file in his office. On a card kept by the assessor, enumerating the list of colleges exempt from taxation, appeared a notation opposite appellant's name, "Not allowed." This card was kept in the files of the office. On July 8, 1919, the assessor informed appellant by writing that its application for exemption had been disallowed.

On October 1, 1919, formal application was made by the assessor, with approval of the district attorney, to the board of supervisors for permission to change the assessment roll by placing the property of the Pasadena University thereon for taxation and for an order canceling such exemption entry. Appellant filed its objections to the proposed change on October 31, 1919. On December 9th the board ordered the correction to be made and the assessment was accordingly changed to include the omission and taxes were assessed against appellant to the amount of $1,660, which sum was subsequently paid under protest. In an effort to establish a right to make the change or supply the omission, papers admittedly not official records in a strict sense were resorted to and parol evidence was also admitted.

We think it unnecessary to enter into an extended discussion as to the admissibility of parol evidence received in the case or as to whether or not the documents and letters admitted in evidence were of the character sanctioned by section 3881, Political Code, and therefore entitled to consideration. We are of the opinion that, inasmuch as the property of the University was listed and described and the valuation thereof entered on the assessment roll, and the rate of the tax levy had been established by the board of supervisors, the carrying forward of the amount of tax was but a mere mathematical calculation, and the amount of taxes assessed against said University was easily determinable by the application of the simple rule of mathematical computation, and this was a permissible correction under section 3881, supra.

We are of the opinion that the auditor should have extended the tax notwithstanding such erroneous notation of exemption, and the omission to do so was subject to correction by the provisions of said section 3881, and which omission was supplied with the written consent of the district attorney.

Appellant's claim of exemption from taxation was heard within the time provided by law upon notice to appellant, who was present at the hearing and fully contested the same. It was determined as a matter of law that said University could not be brought within the grant of the Constitution. We find no reversible error in the proceedings.

BAYLEY v. GARRISON, County Auditor.

1. Officers ⟹100(2)—Increase of salaries of deputies not violative of constitutional inhibition against increasing salaries of "officers"; "term of office."

The inhibition of Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that salary of a public officer shall not be increased during his term of office, applies only to officers who have a fixed and definite term, and does not preclude the increase of salary of a deputy holding office at the pleasure of his principal; such deputy having no term of office within the meaning of the constitutional provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Officer; Term of Office.]

2. Officers ⟹100(1)—Increase of salaries of deputies not violative of constitutional inhibition against increasing salaries of officers.

Increasing the salaries of deputies is not an increase of the salary of the officer by reason of the fact that the added advantage of more competent service or help inures to the benefit of the officer.

3. Statutes ⟹102(2) — Statutes increasing compensation of deputies payable from county treasury not in violation of constitutional requirement of uniformity of county government.

The uniformity of county government, as required by Const. art. 11, § 4, is not destroyed by a statutory construction which permits the increase of salaries of deputies, notwithstanding the constitutional inhibition of article 11, § 9, against increasing the salaries of officers, because some deputies are paid by the county, while others must be paid by the officer, from his salary; the fact that there is an inherent difference in the payment of compensation not, of itself, resulting in lack of uniformity in county government.

4. Constitutional law ⟹48—Statutory construction invalidating whole scheme of county governments for want of uniformity to be avoided.

A statutory construction which would result in overturning all county governments in the state by holding that the entire scheme of payment of county officers is violative of Const. art. 11, § 9, requiring uniformity in county governments, should not be indulged in if by any reasonable course it can be avoided.

5. Courts ⟹90(3)—Doctrine of stare decisis applied.

Where the dual system of fixing salaries of deputies of county officers, in some counties deputies being paid from the county treasury and in others from the salary allowed to the officer, has been for many years recognized by the Legislature, and held by the courts as not violative of Const. art. 11, § 4, requiring uniformity of county governments, the doctrine of stare decisis precludes the court from now holding otherwise.

6. Constitutional law ⟹48—Doubts resolved in favor of constitutionality of statute.

Where there is a reasonable doubt as to whether or not a legislative enactment violates a constitutional inhibition, the doubt must be resolved in favor of the validity of the statute.

In Bank.

Application by A. C. Bayley for writ of mandate against E. F. Garrison, as Auditor of Alameda County, requiring him to audit petitioner's demand for salary. Writ granted.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for petitioner.

Ezra W. Decoto and Frank Mitchell, Jr., both of Oakland, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus brought by a deputy in the office of the county clerk of Alameda county, whose petition existed before the county clerk took office on January 6, 1919, but whose compensation was increased by the Legislature of 1921, during the term of the office of the county clerk. The point involved, as stated in the petitioner's points and authorities, is as follows:

> "His petition involves the question as to the right to increase the pay of existing deputies, during the term of the principal, in cases where the principal at the commencement of his term was given a fixed salary and allowed deputies, also with fixed salaries, and all paid out of the county treasury."

That question was determined in favor of the petitioner's contention in the case of Harrold v. Barnum, 8 Cal. App. 21, 96 Pac. 104. In addition to the authorities cited in that opinion in support of the view there expressed the following cases may be cited: Board of Com'rs of Muskogee County v. Hart, 29 Okl. 693, 119 Pac. 132, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 388; State ex rel. v. Oklahoma City, 38 Okl. 349, 134 Pac. 58; State ex rel. Rumbold v. Gordon, 238 Mo. 168, 142 S. W. 315, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 312; Bowers v. City of Albuquerque, 27 N. M. 291, 200 Pac. 421; Stone v. State, 18 Ala. App. 228, 89 South. 824; Quernheim v. Asselmeier, 296 Ill. 494, 129 N. E. 828; People v. Stong, 67 Colo. 599, 189 Pac. 27; Hibbard v. Suffolk County, 163 Mass. 34, 39 N. E. 285.

The general rule is thus stated in 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 389 as follows:

> "The general rule, however, seems to be that this constitutional prohibition against changing the salary of a public officer during his term of office applies only to officers who have a fixed and definite term, and does not apply to appointive officers, who hold only at the pleasure of the appointing power."

[1] It is clear then that so far as the increase of salary to the deputy is concerned it is not violative of article 11, § 9, of the Constitution, which prohibits the increase of the salary of an officer during his term of office for the reason that such deputy has no term of office within the meaning of the constitutional provision. Does the increase of the salary to a deputy increase the salary of the officer appointing the deputy? In considering this question it should be observed at the outset that the Penal Code (section 74a) makes it a felony for the officer to directly or indirectly receive or accept any part of the compensation of his deputy. That section provides as follows:

> "Every officer of this state, or of any county, city and county, city, or township therein, who accepts, keeps, retains, or diverts for his own use or the use of any other person any part of the salary or fees allowed by law to his deputy, clerk, or other subordinate officer, is guilty of a felony."

[2] It is clear then that whatever advantage the officer may derive from the fact that his deputy has an increased salary is not a direct benefit, but arises, if at all, from the securing of more valuable or competent help than could be obtained for the lesser amount. Is this advantage an increase of his compensation within the meaning of the Constitution? So far as we know this point has never been decided adversely to the constitutionality of an increase of compensation to the deputy because of whatever incidental advantage might result to the principal. The point does not seem to have been considered sufficiently important to have been even suggested in any of the cases. Perhaps the outstanding reason for this is that it is by no means clear that the additional compensation to the deputy is an advantage to the principal, and because the fixing of a salary to the deputy is altogether taken out of the hands of the principal, and there is no means of ascertaining whether he could do better or worse for himself financially by the selection and payment of the deputy out of his own salary. Perhaps the antithesis of the proposition under consideration will be helpful in reaching a conclusion. The Constitutions of many of the states prohibit the increase or the decrease of the salary of a public officer, as ours does, in the case of certain state officers. Const. art. 5, § 19. It has been held that the decrease of the salary of a deputy is permissible notwithstanding this constitutional provision. Somers v. State, 5 S. D. 321, 58 N. W. 804; Id., 5 S. D. 585, 59 N. W. 962. It seems clear that the Legislature could decrease the compensation of a deputy, at least to a reasonable extent, without in any wise affecting the compensation of the principal. If the same deputy continued to work for the reduced compensation it is evident that the salary of the principal would not thereby be reduced. If the volume of the work of the county officer was so reduced that the number of deputies supplied to him was wholly unnecessary it would seem clear that to take away the salary provisions for such unnecessary deputies would not constitute a reduction of his salary. For instance, if the Legislature should provide that the registration of voters should occur every four years, instead of every two years, and should make a corresponding reduction in the office force of the county clerk or registrar of voters, this would hardly be considered a reduction of their salary, for they would receive for their compensation the same amount they had theretofore received.

We conclude that the provision for the deputy is neither an increase of the salary of the officer nor of the deputy during his term of office within the meaning of article 11, § 9, of our Constitution, prohibiting an increase of salary.

[3-5] It is suggested that this construction of our Constitution brings this opinion in conflict with that just rendered in the case of Wines v. Garrison, 214 Pac. 56, a companion case, for the claimed reason that the conclusion reached is inconsistent not only with the authorities supporting the case of Wines v. Garrison, supra, but also the theory on which the County Government Act is held to be general and uniform within the meaning of article 11, § 4, of the Constitution. The question then is this: Does this construction of the act of the Legislature increasing the salary of the deputy render the Political Code dealing with the subject of county government unconstitutional? This suggestion requires a reconsideration of some of the fundamental principles involved in the question. It was definitely determined in the case of Tulare County v. May, 118 Cal. 303, 50 Pac. 427, that the system by which in some counties officers were paid in a lump sum and in other counties were paid a certain stipend, and were allowed a certain number of deputies, to be paid directly from the county treasury, did not destroy the uniformity of county government within the meaning of article 11, § 4, of the Constitution. In other words, it was there decided that the Legislature could provide both schemes for the compensation of county officers and their deputies. That conclusion has ever since been adhered to. A contrary conclusion would result in destroying all the county governments in the state by holding that the entire scheme for the payment of all county officers and deputies is unconstitutional and void. Such a result should not be arrived at if by any reasonable course it can be avoided. The doctrine of stare decisis furnishes the complete escape from this dilemma. It has been determined that the dual system of fixing salaries does not violate article 11, § 4. This conclusion was not only arrived at after full argument and careful consideration, but, in order that the conclusion might be reached, three previous decisions of this court were overruled. We ought not now to say after a lapse of 25 years, and after a continuous and consistent course of legislative and judicial action, that dissimilarities between the two systems, perhaps now for the first time fully appreciated, require us to reverse the decision in Tulare County v. May, supra, and to reconsider the authority of that conclusion.

In this connection it is suggested that the lump sum theory of compensation as discussed in Tulare County v. May, supra, and the corresponding system by which certain deputies were paid directly from the county treasury, were harmonized in the case of Tulare County v. May, supra, by holding, in effect, that in either case the entire amount to be paid by the county was fixed by the statute, and, in effect, in both cases payments were made to all officers and deputies from the county treasury. Consequently it is now suggested that, to hold that the lump sum payable from the county treasury can be increased in one class of counties, and not in another class of counties, is inconsistent with the decision in Tulare County v. May, supra, and those subsequent decisions following that case, including our own decision of the companion case, Wines v. Garrison, supra. It is true that the conclusion that the salaries of deputies can be increased in one class of counties by payments from the county treasury, and that, in order to increase the salaries of deputies in other counties, the increase must come from the officer who receives a lump sum from the county, does demonstrate that there is a difference between the two methods of fixing compensation; but the fundamental question is not whether there is a difference between the two systems, for that there is a difference is perfectly clear to us as it was to the authors of the opinion in Tulare County v. May, supra, but the question is whether the difference, whatever it may be, arises to such proportions as to destroy the uniformity in county government required by the Constitution. It was held otherwise in Tulare County v. May, supra. It was there recognized that there were some differences between the two systems; for instance, it was argued that the systems were not uniform, for the reason that in one case the county officer could determine whether or not he would employ a deputy, and thus determine whether or not the county would be compelled to pay the amount of that deputy's salary, while in the other class of counties the salary was fixed and certain. It was recognized that in one class of counties the saving resulting from not employing a deputy would inure to the benefit of the county officer, and in the other class of counties it would inure to the benefit of the county itself. Notwithstanding this discrepancy between the two plans, it was held that the system was, nevertheless, uniform. So here we clearly recognize that the increase of compensation to the deputy in one case must be paid by the county officer, if necessary, and in the other class must be paid by the county; but this does not create a greater irregularity than that involved in the proposition just stated.

[6] Moreover, we are not permitted to examine these questions in the light of cold logic, and determine by a system of syllogistic reasoning that a scheme may or may not be right or logical; but we are required merely to ascertain whether or not there is a reasonable doubt as to whether the Constitution has been violated by the legislative enactment. If there is such a doubt, that doubt must be resolved in favor of the validity of the statute. To overturn the statute in question would require us not only to entertain a greater doubt than a reasonable one as to the validity of the legislative action, but would also require us to reach that degree of certainty which alone justifies the overturning of previous decisions of this court. Both these considerations would constrain us to sustain the constitutionality of the act so far as its uniformity is concerned, even though we might entertain some doubt upon that question. It should be noted, also, that the doubt expressed is not as to the conclusion reached in Tulare County v. May, supra, that the act is uniform, but as to the validity of the reasoning by which that conclusion was reached, namely, that the two systems were equal—that is, that the lump sum salary and the salary of the officer, plus the deputy's salary, were equivalent—and, even though we may impeach this reasoning to some extent, it does not require us to set aside the conclusion that the County Government Act as enacted was uniform. As already pointed out, there may be differences and still be uniformity.

We conclude, therefore: That the increase of compensation to a deputy who holds office at the pleasure of his principal is not a violation of article 11, § 9, of the Constitution as to him; second, that the increase of the salary of the deputy is not an increase of the salary of the principal within the meaning of article 11, § 9; third, under the previous decisions of this court the system by which some officers in some counties are paid a lump sum and others allowed a salary, and also deputies and clerks payable from the county treasury is a uniform system, and our present conclusion does not require reconsideration of those cases holding the two systems of payment not to infringe upon the constitutional inhibition against the lack of uniformity in the county government, notwithstanding the fact that the conclusion reached indicates a dissimilarity between the two systems of paying the deputies.

The petition for writ of peremptory mandate will be granted.

STORM et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10323.)

Master and servant 🔑373—Injury by dynamite caps exploded by employee smoking held not compensable as "arising out of employment."

Where apprentice painter, while sandpapering the walls of an unoccupied dwelling which his employer was renovating under contract, lost his eyesight by explosion of dynamite caps which in some unknown manner had been placed on a window sill of the room, and which were caused to explode by coming in contact with a spark from a match with which the painter lit a cigar, held, that the injury did not arise out of, nor was it proximately caused by, the employment.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by R. D. Lindsay, applicant, opposed by Floyd G. Storm, employer, and the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, insurance carrier. Award by the Industrial Accident Commission, and the employer and insurance carrier apply for certiorari. Award annulled.

Barry J. Colding, Theodore Hale, and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MYERS, J. Writ of review to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. The essential facts found by the Commission are as follows:

> "(1) R. D. Lindsay, applicant, while employed as apprentice painter on February 13, 1922, at San Francisco, Cal., by defendant Floyd G. Storm, sustained injury occurring in the course of and arising out of his employment, as follows: While at work sandpapering the walls of an unoccupied dwelling which the employer was renovating under contract, the applicant sustained minor wounds and lost the sight of both his eyes by reason of the explosion of dynamite caps which in some unknown manner had been placed on a window sill in the room where he was at work and which were caused to explode by coming in contact with a spark from a match with which just previously the applicant had lit a cigar to smoke while he would be working."

It was also established without conflict in the evidence that Lindsay had been working in the premises where the injury occurred several days prior thereto; that his duties were to wash the walls and sandpaper the woodwork, preparatory to retinting and re-painting; that he was the only person working there on the day of the accident; that the dynamite caps which caused the injury were not on the premises at the time he was put to work there, nor were they there on the morning of the day he was injured; that they were placed there or dropped there while he was out at lunch on that day by some person unknown; that they were not brought there by his employer or any fellow employee, and that nothing of that sort was ever used by the employer in connection with his business; that the employer was not involved in any labor dispute or controversy which would afford a motive for placing the caps there; that there was not upon the premises at the time any paint, varnish, distillate, or any explosive or inflammable substance connected with the employer's business which could have contributed to the injury.

An injury, in order to be compensable under the terms of the Compensation Act (St. 1917, p. 831), must have been sustained by the employee "arising out of and in the course of the employment," and must have been "proximately caused by the employment." It is conceded that the injury herein was sustained in the course of the employment, but it is urged in behalf of petitioners that the facts found by the Commission, considered in the light of the other undisputed facts, do not justify the conclusion that the injury arose out of the employment or that it was proximately caused thereby.

They emphasize the thought that the purpose of the Compensation Act is to place upon industry the burden of only those losses which arise out of industry, as a natural and proximate result thereof, and that it was not intended to cover those losses which, while having some connection with industry, are in no sense a product or result thereof. They insist that the injury suffered by the employee herein can in no sense be fairly said to "arise out of a risk in some way peculiar to the business in which he was engaged." Honnold on Workmen's Compensation, p. 418.

We are convinced the petitioners' position is well sustained. As was said in Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 158 Pac. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164, and reaffirmed in Federal Mutual Liability Ins. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 284, 201 Pac. 920:

> "The accidents arising out of the employment of the person injured are those in which it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employee's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employee. The accident must be one resulting from a risk reasonably incident to the employment."
> "But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause." Kimbol v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 173 Cal. 351, 160 Pac. 150, L. R. A. 1917B, 595, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 312.

The instant case is clearly distinguishable from Whiting-Mead Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comm., 178 Cal. 505, 173 Pac. 1105, 5 A. L. R. 1518, except as to the point wherein it is there held that the act of smoking while at work, when not forbidden by the employer, does not constitute a departure from the employment. That is conceded by the petitioners herein. In that case the employee injured his hand while at work, and as a proximate result of his work. In order to enable him to continue working an agent of the employer bandaged the hand and saturated the bandage with turpentine. While at work thereafter the employee struck a match, which ignited the turpentine and seriously burned the injured hand. It is thus apparent that the presence of the inflammable substance in that case was a condition created by the act of the employer, and that it was one of the conditions under which the employee was required to work. Both of these elements are absent from the instant case.

The Kimbol Case, supra, presents more points of similarity to the case at bar. There the employee was injured by the collapse of a floor above the room in which he was required to work. The collapse was not due to a structural defect in the building, but to an unauthorized use which another tenant had made of the room above by storing heavy materials therein. There, as here, the risk which resulted in the injury was one created, not by the employer, but by a stranger to the employment, and it was there held to be "a risk to which the employer's business specially exposed the employee." That conclusion was predicated, at least in part, upon the fact that "the danger was a constant one, inherent in the place itself under the conditions there existing," and that it "was peculiar to the particular place in which the employee was required to work." No such conditions obtained here. The danger incident to the presence of the dynamite caps was not a constant one, but came into existence but an hour or two before the accident happened. The premises in which the employee was required to work were wholly free from any such danger, and so remained until just before the accident. That danger was not, in any sense, inherent in the place itself; on the contrary, so far as the evidence discloses, it was a purely fortuitous circumstance that those caps chanced to be left there at that place rather than in some other vacant building.

To render an injury compensable there must be discernible some relationship of cause and effect between the employment and the injury. "It is not sufficient for a workman to say, 'I should not have been injured unless I had been where I was and doing the work which I was employed to do.'" Cooper v. N. E. Ry. Co., 9 Butterworth's W. C. C. 129. It must be shown, in addition, that the injury was a natural or probable result of the employment, or of the conditions thereof. Such would seem to be the meaning of the requirement that it must have been "proximately caused by the employment." This case would have been no different, on principle, if the employee had been injured by a stray bullet coming from the scene of an attempted hold-up, several blocks away. Under those circumstances it would scarcely be claimed that the injury was proximately caused by the employment.

The distinction between the case of Gen. Acc., F. & L. A. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 186 Cal. 653, 200 Pac. 419, and cases such as the instant one was pointed out by this court in Fed. M. L. Ins. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 187 Cal. 285, 201 Pac. 920. The case of Benson v. Bush, 104 Kan. 198, 178 Pac. 747, 10 A. L. R. 1165, is not in point. In that case the employee was injured as the direct consequence of performing an act which his employment required him to perform. He performed that act in a negligent manner, but, contributory negligence being no defense, he was entitled to recover. In the case of Rish v. Iowa P. C. Co., 186 Iowa, 443, 170 N. W. 532, the presence upon the premises of the dynamite caps which caused the injury was due to the fact that the employer was using those caps in the conduct of its business, and the court affirmed the award because of its conclusion that this circumstance showed "the causal connection between the employment and the injury complained of." In Haller v. City of Lansing, 195 Mich. 753, 162 N. W. 335, L. R. A. 1917E, 324, the employee was injured by the explosion of gasoline which was brought to and kept upon the premises by the employer for use in his work. So, here, if the employee had been injured by an explosion of varnish or distillate which was upon the premises for use in connection with the employer's business, the causal connection between the employment and the injury would have been apparent. In Laurino v. Donovan, 183 App. Div. 168, 170 N. Y. Supp. 340, and 186 App. Div. 387, 173 N. Y. Supp. 619, the right to recover was predicated upon the circumstance that the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow employee, acting in the course of his employment, while they were both working upon the employer's premises. The court there held that negligence of a fellow workman, in the course of the employment, which is neither a willful nor a sportive act, is a risk incidental to the employment.

It would serve no useful purpose to discuss in detail the remaining cases cited by the Commission in support of its award. Suffice it to say that there were present in each of those cases facts showing a causal connection between the employment, or the conditions thereof, and the injury complained of. That essential element is wholly absent in the present case, and the award is therefore annulled.

LAPIQUE v. WALSH. (L. A. 7500.)

1. New trial 🔑163(2)—Granting of new trial vacates judgment rendered after trial and in pursuance thereof.

The granting of a new trial vacates the judgment which has been rendered after the trial and in pursuance thereof.

2. Costs 🔑260(4), 263—Appeal held frivolous, justifying imposition of $1,000 penalty as damages to respondent.

Appeal from order setting aside a so-called deficiency judgment, based upon the alleged invalidity of a second judgment of the Supreme Court vacating its previous judgment upon untenable grounds, held frivolous, and taken for delay, justifying the imposition of a penalty of $1,000 damages to be paid respondent.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller and Leslie R. Hewitt, Judges.

Action by John Lapique against Frank E. Walsh, administrator of the estate of Laurent Etchepare, deceased. From an order refusing to set aside order vacating purported deficiency judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per.

Alfred Wright, Alexander Macdonald, Bauer, Wright & Macdonald, and Harry L. Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. A motion was made by the respondent to dismiss the appeal in this action on the ground that the appellant's opening brief had not been filed in time. The appellant made a counter motion to submit the case upon his opening brief on the ground that the respondent had not filed a reply in time. The former motion was denied, and the latter granted, for the reason that we felt that the whole case had been decided by this court in its order denying a rehearing from a decision of the District Court of Appeal. Lapique v. Plummer, 50 Cal. App. 88, 195 Pac. 293; Lapique v. Walsh, 50 Cal. App. 82, 195 Pac. 296. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal will be found in 51 Cal. App. 191, 196 Pac. 512. It was held by the District Court of Appeal and affirmed by this court in the denial of a rehearing that the judgment affirmed by this court in De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 73 Pac. 813, was vacated and set aside by the order of the Supreme Court in De Leonis v. Walsh, 145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637, reversing an order denying a new trial. In the course of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal it said:

> "We see no reason for holding that the same result [that is, the vacation of the judgment] did not follow upon a new trial being granted by the Supreme Court. Consequently, appellant's claim, under his purported assignment, gives him neither right, nor color of right, to revive a judgment which is legally dead."

In our decision denying a transfer to this court we said:

> "This general order necessarily had the effect of vacating and rendering for naught the judgment of June 3, 1901; and this notwithstanding the prior affirmance of the judgment. See Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 327, 27 Pac. 186; Houser & Haines Mfg. Co. v. Hargrove, 129 Cal. 90, 61 Pac. 660; People v. Bank of San Luis Obispo, 159 Cal. 82, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 1148, 112 Pac. 866."

It is thus made to appear that the judgment upon which plaintiff founds his whole claim was vacated by the judgment of this court given October 29, 1904, and could not thenceforth be effective for any purpose. The appellant in his brief asks us to overrule the opinion expressed in our denial of the rehearing, claiming that it is obiter dicta.

[1] These opinions merely express what has been frequently determined, namely, that the granting of a new trial vacates the judgment which has been rendered after the trial and in pursuance thereof.

[2] In view of the fact that the appeal in this case is utterly frivolous and without the slightest foundation, some additional facts will be stated in order to further disclose that fact. Plaintiff's predecessor brought this action to redeem from a deed theretofore given by plaintiff therein to the defendant as security for an indebtedness owing from the plaintiff therein to the defendant, claiming that such indebtedness had been entirely paid. The court determined that the deed was in fact given as a mortgage, but that the plaintiff owed the defendant $2,444.09. De Leonis v. Walsh, 140 Cal. 175, 73 Pac. 813. This judgment was affirmed in the case just cited. An appeal was also taken by the plaintiff from the order denying a new trial, and in De Leonis v. Walsh, 145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637, that order was reversed. The case was thereupon presented to the trial court for retrial, and upon such trial it was stipulated that the entire amount of the indebtedness owing from the plaintiff to the defendant had been paid, and in addition, the plaintiff had overpaid the defendant $4,834. It was accordingly adjudged that the deed given as security be canceled, and that the plaintiff have judgment for $4,834. The plaintiff's predecessor thus secured upon the retrial the property involved in the action and a judgment against the defendant. The title thus established in her was no doubt disposed of by her before her death, which occurred in 1908. Thereafter, on January 13, 1912, more than seven years after the judgment of 1905 was entered and had become final, an order was made by a judge of the superior court reciting that the cause was still pending, and substituting Juan J. Menendez, the son and executor of the last will and testament of Maria Espiritu Chijulla De Leonis as plaintiff. On January 15, 1912, an agreement was signed by Juan J. Menendez, as executor of his mother's estates, as follows:

> "In consideration of the sum of two thousand ($2,000.00) dollars I hereby agree to sell and transfer and convey all of my rights, title, and interest, that I now may have in the above-entitled decree and judgment filed on the 14th day of October, 1901, in the above-entitled action, Docketed October 16, 1901; entered October 16, 1901, Book 99, p. 149, by D. C. Burson, Jr., deputy clerk, to John Lapique, of Los Angeles county. Dated January 15, 1912. Juan J. Menendez, Executor of the Estate of Maria Espiritu Chijulla de Leonis, Deceased."

On March 12, 1912, Juan J. Menendez, purporting to act as son, legatee, devisee, and distributee of the undescribed residue of the estate of Mrs. Leonis, signed an agreement assigning "all my right, title, and interest, that I now may have in the above-entitled action, and judgment docketed and entered October 16, 1901, Book of Judgments No. 99, p. 149, to John Lapique."

On March 13, 1912, Juan J. Menendez was substituted as plaintiff, and on March 14, 1912, John Lapique filed an affidavit:

> "That he is the owner of the foregoing cause of action now pending in this Court, and that the assignment and transfer of judgment from Juan J. Menendez to your affiant is on file herein, transferring to your affiant all the estate, right, title and interest in the above-entitled action, and for that reason your affiant desires to be substituted as the plaintiff in the above-entitled action in place and in stead of Juan J. Menendez. John Lapique."

And upon that date the same judge of the superior court who had made the previous orders of substitution entered an order substituting John Lapique as plaintiff. Thereupon John Lapique began a series of proceedings in the superior, appellate, and Supreme Courts, in which neither party to the record had any interest in the land purporting to be the subject-matter of the action.

John Lapique based all his claims upon the contention that the original judgment entered in 1901, and affirmed in 140 Cal. 175, 73 Pac. 813, was not affected by the subsequent reversal of the order denying a new trial (145 Cal. 199, 78 Pac. 637), and that the trial in pursuance of such reversal was wholly void, although based upon a stipulation of the parties. Thus, after his alleged predecessor had secured the land and the fruit of the judgment rendered upon the new trial, and had thus obtained more than she secured by the original judgment, the substituted plaintiff claims the right to redeem the land as ordered by the original judgment, although the defendant no longer had the land.

On March 25, 1919, the clerk of the superior court entered what purported to be a deficiency judgment. This document covers 15 pages of the clerk's transcript on appeal, and is signed "Harry J. Leland, Court Commissioner," and was "Directed to be entered in the Judgment Book and Deficiency Judgment docketed 4/1/19." This "deficiency" amounted to $255,779.20, and was apparently rendered against the defendant Frank E. Walsh personally, as well as in his representative capacity, upon the theory that he was liable for the rents, issues, and profits of the lands involved in the action. This deficiency also included the amount awarded the plaintiff by the judgment of 1905, upon the new trial ($4,834), with interest thereon, amounting to $4,568.15. However, the clerk charges John Lapique with the amount of $2,444.09, fixed by the judgment of 1901 (see 140 Cal. 178), with interest from July 27, 1899, amounting in all to $5,845.89. Thus, on the face of the "deficiency judgment" the clerk gave to the plaintiff the fruits of both judgments, although John Lapique's entire claim was based upon the invalidity of the second judgment.

The court on June 13, 1919, set aside this so-called deficiency judgment by an order reciting that such purported judgment was void, and was entered by the clerk after an application for a similar judgment had been made to the court January 18, 1919, and had been denied. This is one of the orders appealed from. John Lapique on December 15, 1919, moved to set aside the order vacating the "deficiency judgment" upon various grounds, based upon the claim that the attorneys for the plaintiff and defendant in 1905 had no power to stipulate to the judgment then entered, and that the same was entered in contempt of the order of the Supreme Court affirming the original judgment (140 Cal. 175, 183, 73 Pac. 813), and upon the ground that the judge who entered the order vacating the "deficiency judgment" was disqualified, and numerous other grounds. This application was denied, and the appellant has appealed from this order. It is clear that there is absolutely no basis for the appeals. The entry by the clerk of the purported "deficiency judgment" was absolutely without authority.

This appeal is clearly frivolous, and evidently taken for delay. It is a case in which a penalty should be imposed for a frivolous appeal.

Order affirmed, with $1,000 damages to the defendant for frivolous appeal, to be entered as costs in the trial court.

PEOPLE v. KLOPFER. (Cr. 927; Cr. 2565.)

1. Criminal law 🔑369(4)—Evidence of larceny of check held relevant to show opportunity to commit forgery.

In a prosecution for forgery, evidence showing a larceny by defendant of a check, written by the one whose name he was charged with subsequently forging to the checks in controversy, from the fireplace, where it had been thrown because it was blurred, and the cashing of that check with a forged indorsement, was relevant as directly connecting defendant with the forgery of the checks as charged, by showing his familiarity with the checks and check book and with the signature, which was forged.

2. Criminal law 🔑369(2)—Evidence of other offense is competent, if relevant to material issue.

The general rule that evidence of another and distinct offense is not admissible does not require the exclusion of evidence which tends to prove a fact material to the commission of the offense charged merely because it also shows another offense and may prejudice accused with the jury.

3. Criminal law 🔑1170½(6)—Question and answer subsequently stricken held not prejudicial.

The question as to who lived with accused, and an answer "a lady known as his wife," were not prejudicial to accused, where the answer, which was not entirely responsive to the question, was stricken out by order of the court.

4. Witnesses 🔑286(4)—Redirect examination as to suspicion of another offense held proper.

Where defendant had brought out on cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution the fact that the witness had lost a sum of money and that considerable feeling existed between the witness and defendant, it was not error to permit the witness, on redirect examination, to state that he suspected accused of taking that money.

5. Criminal law 🔑1170(3)—Exclusion of letter subsequently held admissible is not reversible error.

It was not reversible error for the court to exclude from evidence a letter when first offered by defendant's counsel, where he subsequently ruled that the letter was admissible, though defendant's counsel then neglected to offer the letter in evidence, since the inadvertence of counsel cannot be charged to the judge.

6. Criminal law 🔑427(3)—Acts and declarations of conspirator can be admitted before proof of conspiracy, if facts are intimately connected.

Aside from the general rule that the order of proof is within the discretion of the trial judge, it is not error to receive evidence of the acts and declarations of a conspirator before the corpus delicti or the conspiracy is proved, if the facts from which the conspiracy is to be inferred are intimately blended with the other facts going to make up the crime which is charged.

7. Criminal law 🔑511(4)—Evidence held sufficient to corroborate testimony of accomplice as to forgery.

Evidence that a written check subsequently cashed by defendant, and blank checks subsequently used in a forgery, were taken from a residence after one of defendant's visits, that defendant was hard-pressed for funds, with other facts and circumstances, held sufficient to corroborate the testimony of an accomplice that defendant forged the two checks.

8. Criminal law 🔑511(2)—Evidence corroborating accomplice need not be of strong nature.

To meet the requirements of Pen. Code, § 1111, evidence to corroborate an accomplice need not be of a very strong nature, but is sufficient if it tends in and of itself to connect the accused with the commission of the offense, though it must do more than raise a mere suspicion.

9. Criminal law 🔑829(10) — Requested instruction on corroboration of testimony held covered.

A requested instruction that corroborative evidence was additional evidence of a different character to the same point was sufficiently covered by a given instruction that the testimony was corroborated, when it was shown to correspond with the representation of some other witnesses, or to comport with some facts otherwise known or established by evidence.

10. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Omission from instruction as to corroboration of accomplice held not prejudicial.

The omission from an instruction on corroboration of an accomplice of the provision of Pen. Code, § 1111, that the corroboration is not sufficient if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof, was not prejudicial to accused, where the jury was plainly told what was a sufficient corroboration, and there was ample corroborating evidence tending to connect accused with the commission of the offense.

11. Criminal law 🔑822(12) — Instruction defining corroboration of witness held not reversible error.

An objection that a charge that testimony was corroborated when shown to correspond with that of some other witnesses, or to comport with some facts otherwise known or established by evidence, was erroneous because the jury may have understood that it applied to the testimony of an accomplice, since it immediately followed an instruction relating to an accomplice, does not require reversal, where the jury elsewhere was appropriately instructed concerning both the testimony of the accomplice and the necessary corroboration of such testimony, since the instructions must be considered as a whole, and failure to arrange them in logical order is not ground for reversal.

12. Criminal law 🔑656(2)—Direction to defendant to write name faster held not misconduct.

In a prosecution for forgery, where defendant as a witness undertook to write the name forged to the check in controversy, a direction by the court to him to write the name again and write it faster was not misconduct on his part, since it was the duty of the judge to prevent any attempt by the witness to disguise his handwriting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

William Klopfer was convicted of forgery, and he appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for new trial. Affirmed.

George D. Higgins, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was found guilty on each of two counts of an information charging him with having committed the crime of forgery. He appeals from an order denying his motion for a new trial and also from the judgment.

[1] Appellant's first specification of error is that the trial court erred in admitting evidence, over the objection of defendant, of the commission by defendant of a separate and distinct offense not charged in the information nor directly connected with the charges therein, to wit, the crime of larceny of a $50 check from the fireplace or grate in the home of Frank O. Helmig, on the 9th day of December, 1921. The two forgeries of which defendant was found guilty were respectively shown to have been committed on the 20th and 21st days of December, 1921. Frank O. Helmig was the complaining witness in the case on trial, and it was alleged in the information that it was the name of Frank O. Helmig which was forged to the two checks. The particular evidence admitted by the court, and to which counsel objected, is to the effect that, on December 9th, Mr. Helmig executed and indorsed with his own signature a check for the sum of $50, payable to "cash"; that because it was somewhat blurred he doubled it up and threw it into the fireplace; that defendant was a frequent visitor at Mr. Helmig's home and had access to the desk in which Mr. Helmig kept his check book; that such check book was an ordinary business man's check book, with each check numbered in a series and Mr. Helmig's name printed thereon; that defendant was without funds and pressed for money; that on or about the 12th day of January the check which Mr. Helmig had thrown into the fireplace was returned to him by his bank, cashed. The testimony further showed that this particular check, after having been indorsed by Vernon T. Ashcraft, had been presented by defendant to one Jacobson as payment for a suit of clothes. Such evidence directly connected defendant with the crime of forgery of the two checks as charged in the information by at least showing his familiarity with the checks and the check book and the signature of Mr. Helmig and his opportunity to copy and to forge his signature. It also showed system, or motive, or guilty knowledge on the part of defendant.

[2] That such testimony may have tended to show that larceny was also committed by defendant is no cause for complaint upon the part of defendant, for, while it is a general rule of evidence that, on the trial of a person accused of crime, evidence of another and distinct offense is not admissible, it is also the rule that, where the evidence tending to prove such independent offense also tends to prove a fact material to the commission of the offense charged, such evidence is admissible, and the fact that such evidence may appear to prejudice the defendant with the jury is no ground for its exclusion. It is said, in the case of People v. Sanders, 114 Cal. 230, 46 Pac. 157:

> "If the evidence of another crime is necessary or pertinent to the proof of the one charged, the law will not thwart justice by excluding that evidence, simply because it involves the commission of another crime."

And the same principle of law is announced in the following cases: People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 725, 106 Pac. 65; People v. Cook, 148 Cal. 341, 83 Pac. 43; People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 663, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269; People v. Walters, 98 Cal. 141, 32 Pac. 864; People v. McPherson, 6 Cal. App. 270, 91 Pac. 1098; People v. Rowland, 12 Cal. App. 19, 106 Pac. 428; People v. Mack, 14 Cal. App. 16, 110 Pac. 967; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 234, 111 Pac. 513; People v. Kizer, 22 Cal. App. 15, 133 Pac. 516, 521, 134 Pac. 346. That the particular evidence to which objection is made was also admissible for the purpose of showing system, or motive, or guilty knowledge, is too well settled to require the citation of authorities.

[3] If for no other reason than that the answer was not entirely responsive to the question and because it was stricken out by order of the court, defendant was not injured by the following question and answer: "Q. Who else lived there with Mr. Klopfer? A. A lady known to me as his wife."

[4] Concerning the specification of error that the trial court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to a question propounded to the witness Ashcraft, with reference to the alleged theft by the defendant of the sum of $210 from said witness Ashcraft, which question and answer were as follows: "Q. Did you suspect Mr. Klopfer of taking the money at that time? A. Yes, sir;" it is sufficient to say that, in view of the fact that the question to which objection was made arose on redirect examination regarding a matter brought out on cross-examination—that is to say, the loss by the witness of the sum of $210, and that considerable feeling existed between the witness and defendant for the reason that the witness had accused defendant of taking it—the question was not improper, as it tended to throw some light on the possible bias or prejudice of the witness as to defendant.

[5] Counsel for appellant specifies as error the refusal by the court to admit a certain letter in evidence, but it appears that the court later decided that the letter was competent—at a time, so counsel says, "when the letter was not under consideration and in the hurry and stress of the trial counsel for defendant inadvertently overlooked the opportunity to again offer it in evidence." Counsel, having had the opportunity to put the letter in evidence, is in no position to predicate error upon the fact that the court first refused to admit it. Any inadvertence on his part cannot be properly charged to the judge of the trial court.

[6] Appellant next complains that the court erred in overruling the objection of defendant to the testimony of the witness Ashcraft, in advance of the corpus delicti being proven, of conversations concerning an alleged conspiracy before the conspiracy was shown. The corpus delicti was proved by this particular witness; and aside from the general rule that the order of proof is within the discretion of the trial judge, when the facts from which the conspiracy is to be inferred are so intimately blended with the other facts going to make up the crime which is charged, it is not error to first receive evidence of the acts and declarations of a conspirator. People v. Fehrenbach, 102 Cal. 397, 36 Pac. 678; People v. Daniels, 105 Cal. 262, 38 Pac. 720; People v. Van Horn, 119 Cal. 330, 51 Pac. 538; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 408, 56 Pac. 44; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 398, 77 Pac. 177.

[7] Appellant has urged that the court erred in denying defendant's motion for a new trial, upon the grounds that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, that the verdict is contrary to the evidence, and that the verdict is contrary to law, the point being that there is no evidence which corroborated the testimony of the accomplice; but in this regard it should be remembered that the evidence, in addition to that adduced by the accomplice, showed many other things—access, opportunity, corroboration of the means employed in and the object of cashing the $50 check; the defendant's financial condition; the disappearance of the $50 check from the fireplace of Mr. Helmig and its reappearance, together with the other forged checks, among Helmig's cashed checks; the motive: the use by defendant of Ashcraft, the accomplice, in the first instance, and later the use by defendant of Jacobson, an outsider, to further the scheme; the physical condition of the $50 check itself, with reference to its being crumpled, etc., as exhibited to the jury; the disappearance of all these checks at about the same time, that is, during defendant's visit or visits at the home of Helmig; that these checks were all similar in blank form, supporting the inference that defendant, having been shown to have had one of them, may have had all of them in his possession; together with the additional fact that exemplars of defendant's handwriting were admitted in evidence for the purpose of comparing them with the signatures and the indorsements on the forged checks. Considering all of these facts, which were corroborative of the testimony of the accomplice, the evidence was certainly sufficient to justify the verdict, which was neither contrary to the evidence nor contrary to the law.

[8] In order to meet the requirements of Penal Code, § 1111, regarding the corroboration of an accomplice, it is not necessary that the evidence received be of a very strong nature. Although more is required by way of corroboration than to raise a mere suspicion (People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480), if the evidence, however slight, tends in and of itself to connect the accused with the commission of the offense, it is sufficient (People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 482, 24 Pac. 32; People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 620, 46 Pac. 601; People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 479, 154 Pac. 317; People v. Garwood, 11 Cal. App. 665, 106 Pac. 113; People v. Martin, 19 Cal. App. 295, 125 Pac. 919; People v. Flood, 41 Cal. App. 377, 182 Pac. 766).

[9] The next four specifications of error relate either to the refusal of the court to give, or to the giving by the court of, certain instructions. The first one to which attention is directed is that the court erred in refusing to give the following instruction requested by the defendant:

> "You are instructed that corroborative evidence is additional evidence of a different character, to the same point."

The principle of law contained in the refused instruction was sufficiently covered by another instruction given by the court as follows:

> "The testimony of a witness is said to be corroborated when it is shown to correspond with the representation of some other witness, or to comport with some facts otherwise known or established by evidence."

Hence the defendant has no cause to complain in that connection.

[10] Another matter of which appellant complains is that the court erred in instructing the jury as follows:

> "A conviction cannot be had on the testimony of an accomplice, unless he is corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. Such corroborative evidence need not tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice. It is sufficient if such corroborative evidence, standing alone, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged."

Exception is taken to that instruction because there is omitted therefrom the following words, as found in section 1111 of the Penal Code: "And the corroboration is not sufficient, if it merely shows the commission of the offense or the circumstances thereof." An instruction containing, among other things, the exact words as herein quoted was also refused by the court. The jury was plainly told what was a sufficient corroboration; also that the offered evidence need not tend to establish the precise facts testified to by the accomplice. If the evidence offered in corroboration of the testimony given by the accomplice merely showed that an offense was committed or the circumstances thereof, but did not tend to connect defendant therewith, it is plain that such "corroboration" would not be sufficient. But an examination of the corroborative evidence, as herein outlined, will show that so many of the different pieces of evidence submitted to the jury for its consideration in connection with the corroboration of the testimony of the accomplice were entirely independent of, and so thoroughly separated from, any testimony given by the accomplice—all of which tended to connect defendant with the commission of the offense—that neither the omission of the phrase to which reference has been made from the instruction as given, nor the refusal by the court to include the same in instructions offered by defendant, can be said to have worked any substantial injury to him.

[11] The third complaint with reference to the instructions is that the court erred in charging the jury as follows:

> "The testimony of a witness is said to be corroborated when it is shown to correspond with the representation of some other witness, or to comport with some facts otherwise known or established by evidence."

Counsel argues that the instruction was not proper because the jury may have understood that it applied to the testimony of an accomplice. But elsewhere the jury was appropriately instructed concerning both the testimony of an accomplice and the necessary corroboration of such testimony; besides the attacked instruction did aptly apply to the testimony given by other witnesses in the case; and, even assuming that the instruction in question immediately followed an instruction affecting an accomplice, such fact does not furnish ground for criticism for the reason, if for no other, that the instructions are not to be taken singly, but must be considered as a whole. It would be going a long way to hold that the failure of a judge to arrange a set of multitudinous instructions in logical order would be good ground for the reversal of the case.

The last specification of error regarding instructions is to the effect that the court erred in refusing to give each of the instructions requested by the defendant, and particularly the instruction with reference to the presumption of innocence. No argument is presented by appellant; neither is there any citation of authority. It suffices to say that an examination of the record herein discloses the fact that the jury was fully instructed on all issues in the case, and that the jury was especially instructed with reference to the presumption of innocence of defendant.

[12] Appellant also urges misconduct of the court as a reason why a new trial should be granted. He specifies that during the cross-examination of defendant as a witness, when, for the purpose of using the handwriting of defendant as an exemplar, he was requested to write the name of Frank O. Helmig, the court said to defendant: "Now write it again and write it faster." Such act on the part of the court did not constitute misconduct; and, while it does not appear that the court suspected the defendant of anything wrong in connection with his handwriting, it may safely be presumed that such was the case, and, if there was any doubt in the mind of the judge as to any attempt on the part of the witness to disguise his handwriting, it was the duty of the court to see that his natural and genuine handwriting was submitted to the jury.

Misconduct by the deputy district attorney is also suggested in that he brought out irrelevant matters concerning the defendant's living with a woman not his wife, and, in his closing argument, accusing defendant of stealing the $50 check from the fireplace or grate of Frank O. Helmig; but both those matters have heretofore been the subject of attention herein and it at least satisfactorily appears that, so far as the deputy district attorney was concerned, there was nothing which deserved criticism.

No prejudicial error appearing, it is ordered that the order denying the motion for a new trial and the judgment herein be, and the same are, affirmed.

Opinion of the Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a hearing in this case, we withhold approval of that portion of the opinion to the effect that evidence of the theft of the $50 check was admissible to show system or motive, or guilty knowledge on the part of the defendant.

The application for a hearing in this court, after decision in the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

YOUMASHEF et al. v. WEISGERBER.

Sales ⚷479(7)—Complaint in action by vendor after default in conditional sales contract held not to state cause of action.

Complaint in action by vendors after default of purchaser under conditional sale, seeking only a foreclosure of the purchaser's equity and an order compelling a reconveyance, held not to state a cause of action, as it did not pray for recovery of the balance due, and there was no need for a reconveyance, since, according to the allegations, plaintiff had retained and still had title, nor was a cause of action stated to recover possession; there being no allegation that defendants were in possession or of a demand by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by A. P. Youmashef and A. G. Youmashef against Fred Weisgerber. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henry B. Lister, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Edward J. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. The plaintiffs entered into a contract with the defendant on the 20th day of January, 1920, wherein the plaintiffs agreed to sell and the defendant agreed to buy the furnishings and fixtures contained in the Arcadia Apartments, 522 Hyde street, San Francisco, and also the lease of said premises. Defendant paid $7,500, and the balance of the purchase price, amounting to $1,250, with 6 per cent. interest on the deferred payments, was to be paid in monthly installments of $150 each for 5 months, and at the end of the sixth month the balance of principal and interest was to become due. It was agreed that, if any installment of principal or interest was unpaid for 30 days after it was due, then the whole amount of principal and interest remaining unpaid should forthwith become due and payable at the election of the holder of this agreement. The defendant agreed to pay the rent of the apartments and pay all bills incurred in conducting the apartment house business. The plaintiffs agreed to deposit the bill of sale subject to a chattel mortgage on the furnishings and fixtures to secure the payment of rents "on the following terms and conditions, to wit: If the party of the second part [defendant] shall pay all money due and to become due as herein provided, and faithfully comply with each and all of the covenants herein contained, then in that event said bill of sale above referred to is to be delivered by the said Italian-American Bank to the party of the second part, [the defendant], or his agents, on demand." It was further agreed by the defendant, in case of a default in the payment of any installment for 30 days, "then in that event all moneys paid hereunder shall be forfeited to the party of the first part as liquidated damages, for nonfulfillment of this agreement, and as for rent for the use of said premises, and does hereby agree to peacefully surrender possession of the premises herein described, and the furnishings described in the inventory hereunto annexed, to the holder of this agreement." It was agreed that title should remain in the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs brought this suit, claiming that the defendant had defaulted in the payment due April 20, 1920, to the extent of $50, and alleged that said default had continued for more than 30 days. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint alleging damages for fraud. The trial court found that all of the allegations of the complaint were true, and that none of the allegations of the answer or cross-complaint was true and rendered judgment that the plaintiffs should take nothing by their action. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal on the judgment roll alone.

The plaintiffs insist that the action is one for the foreclosure of an equitable mortgage. The only thing that bears this out is the prayer of the complaint for a judgment foreclosing all of defendant's equity in the property described in the agreement and for an order compelling the defendant to reconvey the property immediately to the plaintiffs. The agreement was a conditional sale with the title remaining in the vendors and apparently with the possession surrendered to the vendee. The vendors upon default had a right to sue for the balance of the purchase price or to recover the possession of the personal property. Silverstin v. Kohler & Chase, 181 Cal. 51, 183 Pac. 451, 9 A. L. R. 1177. The plaintiffs did neither. They did not pray for the balance due under the contract, which, at the time of the filing of the amended complaint, was the full balance of the purchase price, nor did they ask for the possession of the property.

It is clear that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a judgment herein for the balance due them, for they did not pray for the recovery of such balance. They were satisfied to retain the amount already paid them and sought to secure the title to the property which they had sold to the defendant, but, according to their own allegations, they already had such title and consequently did not need the interposition of the court to secure that title in themselves. The complaint did not state a cause of action to recover the possession of the property, because it contained no allegation that the defendant was in the possession thereof, or that the plaintiffs had demanded the possession of the property, nor did the plaintiffs pray for judgment awarding them the possession of the property.

The complaint failed to state a cause of action, and in consequence the judgment of the trial court that the plaintiffs take nothing by the action was not erroneous.

In the presentation of this matter in the briefs both parties have stated facts not shown by the record. The appellants excuse themselves for not bringing up a transcript of the evidence on the ground that the transcript would cost more than the amount involved in the action. They also claim that the defendant sold the property, and that by an agreement between the parties the sum of $1,000 from such purchase price was deposited with the clerk to pay the balance of $850 due the plaintiffs in the event it should be determined that the defendant's claims for damages were not sustained. The respondent claims that the plaintiffs refused to accept a judgment for the balance due or to accept payment of the $850. This the appellants deny. None of these matters is properly before us for our consideration.

The appellants have failed to show that the judgment of the trial court was erroneous and the judgment must be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

WILMON v. AROS et al.

SMITH v. SAME.

1. Appeal and error 🔑524—Maps and copies of the surveyor's notes, not incorporated in bill of exceptions or authenticated, form no part of record on appeal.

In an action to quiet title to land and establish a location of certain range lines, boundaries, and corners, where maps and a copy of the field notes and surveys of the property have been introduced below, but have not been properly incorporated in the bill of exceptions or authenticated in the manner provided by law, they cannot form any part on the record of appeal.

2. Appeal and error 🔑907(4)—Where record does not purport to contain all evidence produced, evidence cannot be held insufficient to sustain finding on appeal.

Where the bill of exceptions does not set out all of the evidence, the appellate court must affirm, upon the presumption that the court below decided correctly upon all of the evidence reported.

3. Boundaries 🔑4—Duty of court to establish lines and corners in best accord with natural objects and where least inconsistent with government surveys, notes, and plats.

In an action to quiet title and determine the location of range lines, boundaries, and corners, it is the duty of the court to ascertain, as near as might be, where the monuments were set by the government surveyors, and from records of the official survey and the evidence as to present conditions and positions of natural objects to locate lines and corners and lines in controversy, where they will best accord with the natural objects described in the field notes as being about the monuments found to exist and in a manner least inconsistent of the government surveys, notes, and plats.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Actions by J. C. Wilmon against Teofilo E. Aros and others and Frederick Smith against Teofilo E. Aros and others, to quiet title. Judgments for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Judgments affirmed in each case.

Thomas T. Porteous, of Riverside, for appellants.

Swing & Wilson, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

WASTE, J. Two causes are affected by this appeal. The respective plaintiffs and respondents each brought an action against the same defendants to quiet title to what appear to be adjoining pieces of land. Each, for a second cause of action, alleged his ownership of the respective parcels of land, that certain boundary line fences existed, and that the defendants wrongfully entered, taking possession and ousting plaintiffs, and destroyed certain portions of the fence, to the damage of the plaintiff, in each case alleged to be in the sum of $500. By appropriate denials the defendants tendered issues on all of these matters. The actions were actually brought for the purpose of having the north and east boundaries of the plaintiff Wilmon's land, the south boundary of one portion and the east boundary of another portion of plaintiff Smith's land, concerning all of which there is a dispute, between the two plaintiffs on the one side, and the defendants on the other, fixed and determined by means of monuments and marks located on the ground. These boundaries can only be determined by fixing and locating the original corners and lines which are applicable to the lands of both plaintiffs, and the testimony as to the surveys made to fix those corners and lines applies to both tracts of land. It was therefore stipulated in the court below that the two actions be tried together and the testimony applied to both cases. On submission, separate findings and judgments were made. The plaintiffs prevailed, and the defendants have appealed.

[1, 2] The only point made by the appellants is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of the trial court as to the location of certain range lines, boundaries, and corners, and that certain other original monuments set by the United States government surveyor are not now in place and cannot now be identified. For two reasons the judgment must be affirmed. There were introduced and admitted in evidence in the court below certain exhibits. These include a map of the lands in controversy, made by the county surveyor of San Bernardino county prior to the trial, a copy of government plat filed by the Surveyor General from field notes in his office, copy of the field notes and surveys of the property certified to by the Surveyor General of the United States, and a map of the township in which the property lies. These exhibits were not properly incorporated in the bill of exceptions and were not authenticated in the manner provided by law. They, therefore, form no part of the record on appeal. Moore v. Semple, 11 Cal. 360. The bill of exceptions does not set out all the evidence, and we are uninformed upon what record the court acted. The judgment must therefore be affirmed upon the presumption that the court below decided correctly upon all the evidence before it. Gates v. Buckingham, 4 Cal. 286; Miller v. Dailey, 136 Cal. 212, 220, 68 Pac. 1029. Assuming the exhibits to have been properly authenticated as part of the record on appeal, we should still be of the opinion that the findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence. The testimony of 13 witnesses, found in nearly 1,000 folios, was almost entirely directed to the location of the descriptive lines and corners of the property and physical objects thereon. Four competent civil engineers and surveyors of many years' experience gave precise and technical descriptions of surveys of the lands made by them. The witnesses did not all agree in many particulars concerning the lines and corners of the property. The surveyors did not locate certain monuments in the same place. All trace of some of the monuments has disappeared, and the exact places where they were erected cannot now be positively identified.

[3] The rule governing the duty of the trial court in such cases is so well expressed by this court in the two decisions in Weaver v. Howatt, 161 Cal. 77, 118 Pac. 519, and 171 Cal. 302, 152 Pac. 925, that it is only necessary to refer to those cases, which present facts in many instances parallel to the case at bar. It was the duty of the trial court to ascertain, as near as might be, where the monuments were set by the government surveyors, and from records of the official survey and the evidence as to the present conditions and positions of natural objects to locate the lines and corners of the sections and the boundary lines of the property in controversy at points where they will best accord with the natural objects described in the field notes as being about the monuments found to exist on the ground, and in a manner least inconsistent with the government surveys, notes, and plats.

With all the evidence in the case before it the trial court was satisfied as to the proper location of the lines in dispute, and its conclusions are reflected in the findings.

It is ordered that the judgments appealed from be, and each is, affirmed.

GARFIELD v. FORD et al. (S. F. 10036.)

Guaranty 🔑30—Agent held not entitled to recover on guaranty contract executed in his name which did not disclose agent sold goods for principal only.

Where plaintiff sold goods to defendant F. in name of plaintiff's principal, defendants C. and S. executing a guaranty contract running to plaintiff, in consideration of plaintiff's sale of goods to defendant F., and the principal assigned to plaintiff all rights in the goods sold to F., held, under Civ. Code, § 2809, plaintiff could not recover on contract of guaranty because it did not disclose the fact he was selling only as agent and that the property sold belonged to the principal; the guarantors being entitled to know with whom they were contracting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Chester A. Garfield, doing business under the name of Garfield & Co., formerly Garfield, Myers & Co., against Oscar Ford and others. Judgment against named defendant only, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dozier & Dozier, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sloss, Ackerman & Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WASTE, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the purchase price of a quantity of machinery alleged to have been sold by him to defendant Ford, it being alleged that defendants Castleman and Smith were guarantors of the amount due. The sole defense was that plaintiff did not sell the property. Judgment was entered that the plaintiff recover the value of the machinery from the defendant Ford, but take nothing against defendants Castleman and Smith. Plaintiff appeals from that portion of the judgment which denies him relief against the guarantors.

The facts are clearly established, and appellant admits that "it cannot be contended that there is no conflict of evidence." The case is presented by the findings, which are comparatively simple and involve but one question. Appellant entered into an agreement with the defendant Ford, in the name of his principal, the Ransome Concrete Machinery Company of New Jersey, to sell and deliver to Ford certain concrete mixing machinery and appurtenances, for the sum of $1,627.50, payable in installments; title not to pass until full payment was made, but delivery to be made at once. The day before this contract was made, but obviously in contemplation of its being entered into, the respondents Castleman and Smith executed the guaranty contract sued on. That instrument recites that, whereas appellant has agreed to sell to Oscar Ford certain machinery and equipment, in consideration of the premises and of the sale and delivery of such machinery and equipment by appellant to Ford, Castleman and Smith agree to and do guarantee the payment of the full purchase price thereof. The machinery was delivered, pursuant to the contract, but Ford did not pay for it, and this action was brought.

The evidence establishes, and the trial court in effect found, that the machinery agreed to be sold by appellant to Ford was the property of the Ransome Concrete Machinery Company of New Jersey, and that the plaintiff was merely the agent for that concern. While the trial court found that appellant retained an interest in the machinery and in the purchase price, the extent of that interest is not disclosed, and we may assume it was merely to the extent of appellant's commission on making the sale.

Although the fact was not pleaded, it appears that prior to the commencement of the action the Ransome Concrete Machinery Company sold and assigned to the plaintiff whatever right, title, and interest it might have in the machinery and equipment, and all claims and demands against the respondents. Defendant Ford has not appealed from the judgment entered against him. The theory of the defendants Castleman and Smith in the court below, and now, is that appellant cannot recover on the contract of guaranty because it does not disclose the fact that he was selling only as agent and that the property sold belonged to his principal. This contention must be upheld.

This is not a case of construing a doubtful or inartificially drawn instrument, in which recourse may be had to the facts and circumstances accompanying the transaction, in order to arrive at the intention of the parties, as was the situation in First Nat. Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 74 Pac. 856, cited by appellant; but one in which it is asserted that no liability was incurred by the guarantors to a party other than the one to whom the guaranty was plainly executed. The obligation of guarantors must be neither larger in amount nor in other respects more burdensome than that of the principal. Civ. Code, § 2809. They cannot be held liable upon any contract that is not within the terms of their guaranty. Glassell v. Coleman, 94 Cal. 260, 266, 29 Pac. 508; Graham v. F. & M. Bank, 116 Cal. 463, 466, 48 Pac. 384; Jack v. Sinsheimer, 125 Cal. 563, 568, 58 Pac. 130. "The strictness with which parties assuming to act upon the faith of a guaranty have been held to its precise terms is illustrated in Barns v. Barrow, 61 N. Y. 39; s. c., 19 Am. Rep. 247, where it was decided that a guaranty running to a member of a firm for goods to be sold by him, did not inure to the benefit of the firm of which he was a member, although they delivered the goods described in the guaranty." Evansville Nat. Bank v. Kaufmann, 93 N. Y. 273, 287 (45 Am. Rep. 204). A new party could no more be imported into the contract and imposed upon the guarantors without their consent than a change could be made in like manner in the other pre-existing stipulations. The respondents might have been willing to contract with appellant, but not with the Ransome Concrete Machinery Company of New Jersey. They had the right to know, and to decide for themselves. Without their assent—and it is not claimed that any knowledge or acquiescence existed—a thing was wanting which was indispensable to the continuity of the contract. National Bank v. Hall, 101 U. S. 43, 51, 25 L. Ed. 822.

WOODSEND v. CHATOM et al. (Sac. 3375.)

1. Landlord and tenant 🔑323, 326(3), 330(1)—Partnership 🔑20—Agreement held to create relation of landlord and tenant, with common tenancy in crops.

A written agreement between a landowner and another, labeled a "lease," wherein the first party agreed "to lease," which provided for a definite term of three years' tenancy, with the privilege of two additional years, held to create the relation of landlord and tenant, rather than a cropping agreement or partnership, notwithstanding it provided, "The ranch shall run on a 50 per cent. basis to each party," and resulted in a tenancy in common in the crops grown under the contract, so that one who purchased the entire crop from the tenant, who had no permission to sell the whole, was liable to the landlord for conversion.

2. Estoppel 🔑75—Landlord held not estopped to recover share of crop unlawfully sold by tenant.

In an action for conversion by the owner of land, who by reason of the lease agreement was a tenant in common of the crop grown by the tenant, to recover his proportionate share from a purchaser of the whole crop, sold without authority by the tenant, where such tenant's occupancy was shown to be brief, and the lease under which he held was recorded for five months before the sale, and where plaintiff had never clothed his tenant with any authority to dispose of the crop, held, that the principle of estoppel could not apply, so as to defeat his right of recovery.

3. Sales 🔑234(3) — Purchaser of personal property acquires only title or estate of vendor.

A purchaser of personal property acquires only the title or estate of his vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by L. E. Woodsend against A. G. Chatom and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for appellants.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for respondent.

SEAWELL, J. This is an action in conversion. Judgment went for plaintiff, and defendants have appealed.

Respondent, as party of the first part, and H. B. Wyllie, as party of the second part, entered into a contract, agreement, or lease, the nature of which is a matter of dispute, whereby the party of the first part agreed to lease to the party of the second part 240 acres of land owned by the former and situate in Tulare county. The instrument provided for a term of 3 years with a renewal privilege of 2 years. By said instrument the party of the first part agreed to furnish certain seed for the first year's tenancy. Thereafter seed was to be furnished from the premises, or if not so furnished the expense of supplying the same was to be borne equally by the parties to the contract. It was the obligation of the party of the first part to furnish horses, plows, tools, and other equipment, in good and reasonable condition. A long list of personal property to be furnished by the said party of the first part is enumerated. The party of the first part agreed to pay one-half of the cost necessary to maintain pumps for irrigating purposes and also agreed to furnish material for fencing as it should become necessary; also to furnish and develop a reasonable amount of water necessary for conducting the enterprise as occasion should demand and as should be mutually agreed upon between the parties; to build within one year after the execution of the lease a five or six room house for the use of the party of the second part. He agreed further to buy a one-half interest in pigs and to purchase an undivided half interest in a certain number of calves. The party of the second part agreed to supply all labor necessary to work the land under the lease and to plant all land that could be reasonably planted during his first year's tenancy and thereafter to fertilize the soil as provided, and to do everything necessary to the soil to successfully produce crops. Said party agreed to furnish labor for fencing and to repair such small buildings as might be required from time to time; to provide feed for the horses, labor for planting the first year's crops, and to keep all tools, harness, wagons, and all implements in good repair, and in every way promote the best interest of the parties concerned; to pay one-half the water rent and to plant such crops as would prove most profitable and to be mutually agreed upon; to furnish one-half of the purchase price of hogs or other stock to be fed from crops produced on the premises; to buy an undivided half interest in 30 yearling calves on the premises at a price of $35 each, payment to be evidenced by note and mortgage at 5 per cent. interest. Both parties to the contract were equally interested in the chickens, turkeys, and such fowls that should be raised. It was agreed between the parties that the "ranch shall be run on 50 per cent. basis to each party." The party of the first part reserved the right to sell the said property, provided the equity of the second party was properly protected. It was "agreed that lessee is to take possession not later than December 10, 1918." The following forfeiture clause was inserted:

"Party of the second part agrees to forfeit all rights and titles to any interest he may have, covered by this lease, if he fails to comply with this agreement, if within his power to do so."

Under the foregoing lease a crop of red milo maize of the value of $1,822.34 was raised and sold by Wyllie to the defendants, who were warehousemen and grain buyers at Corcoran, Kings county. It appears without dispute that respondent let H. B. Wyllie into possession of said 240 acres of land and that during his occupancy said maize was sown, cultivated, reaped, and sold to appellants, who had no actual notice that the land upon which it was raised was owned by respondent or that Wyllie was not fully authorized to sell the same. The lease or contract was of record.

[1] The proposition to which counsel have devoted much attention is whether the instrument in question is in legal effect a lease of lands or a cropping lease or copartnership agreement, or established a relation of tenants in common. It is labeled "Lease." The first expression found with reference to the relations of the parties is that "the party of the first part agrees to lease," etc. It provides for a definite period of 3 years' tenancy with a privilege of two additional years. In its recitals the term "lessee" appears once. It contains a forfeiture clause. and provides that "the ranch shall be run on a 50 per cent. basis to each party." In the production of crops all labor is to be furnished by said Wyllie. It contains a number of covenants to be performed by both parties. It is the claim of respondent that the instrument in question is a cropping agreement and does not create the relation of landlord and tenant; but, conceding it to be a lease, nevertheless, the parties thereunder were tenants in common as to the particular crop raised and sold by said Wyllie, one-half of which is claimed to be the property of respondent.

Appellants' claim is that the instrument meets all the requirements of an ordinary lease, the rent payable in the products of the soil rather than in money, and that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties. Further, that if said writing was not a lease it constituted as between the parties a copartnership agreement, and that Wyllie had a right as a partner to make a valid sale of crops to appellants. Phrases common to articles of copartnership are intermingled with those essential to constitute a lease. Wyllie was let into possession, but he was not given absolute control as to the kind of crops to be raised. The instrument provides that such crops were to be planted as "will prove most profitable and be mutually agreed upon." (Italics ours.) Impliedly plaintiff would be required to enter the premises to comply with his covenants, and perhaps he would have the right of entry for the purpose of inspection and to enable him to advise as to the kind of crops to be planted, the acreage and locality, and the method of cultivation to be adopted. The instrument is somewhat unusual in some of its provisions. As an illustration, it provides that each party shall hold an "undivided half interest in calves." It bears also some of the features of a cropping contract.

We are of the opinion, however, upon an examination of its terms, that the relation of landlord and tenant as defined in Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, 182 Cal. 408, 188 Pac. 800, existed, and that by the instrument it was intended to create the relation of tenancy in common in the crop to be raised. One of the strong elements noted in that case, to wit, delivery to plaintiff of his share of the crops to be made off the premises, is lacking here. This, however, does not in the least weaken the contention that the parties to the agreement were to become owners of the crops as tenants in common in equal shares. This question did not enter into the consideration of Harrelson v. Miller & Lux, supra.

The rule announced in Clark et al. v. Cobb, 121 Cal. 595, 54 Pac. 74, is not disturbed by the conclusion we have arrived at in the instant case. It was expressly held in that case that the conventional relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties and that the grains and fruits to be delivered to the landlord when gathered and harvested was but the payment of rent. It is clearly pointed out in that case that the single difference differentiating the contracts there considered from ordinary leases was that the rent was to be paid in the products of the soil rather than in money. The Clark Case recognizes, however, that there is authority in this state holding that under certain conditions, even though a landlord and tenant be not co-tenants in the land, they may, nevertheless, be cotenants in the crops raised on the land, citing cases already referred to. See, also, Adams v. Thornton, 7 Cal. Unrep. 219, 82 Pac. 215. The landlord here, as in the case last cited, was to do more than merely receive a stipulated part of the crop as rent. The facts which sustain the conclusion in Clark v. Cobb, supra, are different in material respects to the covenants which exist in the contract of the parties to the present action.

The greater weight of authority and the better reasoning is to the effect that whether the relationship existing between Wyllie and respondent be that of landlord and tenant or a cropping relation, a tenancy in common in the crops was created by the terms of the contract. This principle was well recognized by this court in Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 541, 79 Am. Dec. 147; Henderson v. Allen, 23 Cal. 519; Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 60; Baughman v. Reed, 75 Cal. 319, 17 Pac. 222, 7 Am. St. Rep. 170; Jones v. Durrer, 96 Cal. 95, 30 Pac. 1027. Baughman v. Reed, supra, strongly supports the claim of cotenancy, which is the pivotal point in this case. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition (2d Ed.) § 100, states the reason of the rule thus:

> "Every form of agreement, by which land is let to one who is to cultivate the same and give the owner as compensation therefor a share of the produce, creates a tenancy in common in the crops. An arrangement to cultivate land on the shares is not a lease. Landlords, therefore, favor this mode of letting their lands, because they thereby acquire an interest in the produce of the land; whereas, if such an agreement constitute a complete lease, the title to the crop produced would vest in the occupier, and the landlord would have no claim upon it until a division was made, and then his share would come to him as rent. 'Where the reservation is of an undivided share the property of that share is always in the lessor by virtue of his reservation, while the property of the residue is always in the tenant by the implied grant of profits, and they are therefore tenants in common of the crop until division.' 'The true test seems to lie in the question, whether there be any provision, in whatever form, for dividing the specific products off the premises. If there be, a tenancy in common arises, at least in such products as are to be divided.'"

In discussing the same question here presented, the court in Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co., 64 Wash. 159, 116 Pac. 666, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89, said:

> "The weight of authority is that every contract, whereby use of land is given to a party to cultivate and return to the owner a specified portion of the crop produced, creates a tenancy in common in the crop, and that this is true whether the agreement between the parties is a lease or a mere cropping contract. The tendency of the courts is to hold that, whenever there is a provision in any form of contract for a specific division of crops produced, a tenancy in common arises therein. Freeman, Cotenancy and Partition (2d Ed.) § 100; Foote v. Colvin, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) 216, 3 Am. Dec. 478; Putnam v. Wise, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 234, 37 Am. Dec. 309; Aiken v. Smith, 21 Vt. 172; Smyth v. Tankersley, 20 Ala. 212, 56 Am. Dec. 193; Dinehart v. Wilson, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 595; Abernethy v. Uhlman, 52 Or. 359, 93 Pac. 936, 97 Pac. 540. In Smyth v. Tankersley, supra, the court said: 'In the case of Thompson v. Mawhinney [17 Ala. 362, 52 Am. Dec. 176], supra, it was decided by this court that a contract made with the owner of land, which the other party agreed to cultivate and to divide the products equally with him, was not, technically speaking, a lease, but that a tenancy in common was created in the products. In the contract under consideration, the mode of compensation adopted repels the conclusion that it could have been the intention of the parties that the land should not be cultivated, and thus assimilates its terms more closely to the contract in the case last cited. It is true, the phraseology adopted is that which is usual in leases, but the substance of the agreement is to be regarded, rather than the words (Putnam v. Wise, supra); and in contracts of this description, the true test seems to be, that wherever provision is made for dividing the specific products of the land, a tenancy in common results (Putnam v. Wise, supra, and authorities there cited).'"

The rule that, where a landlord leases land and receives a part of the crop as rent, the tenant cannot sell or dispose of the part so reserved, and the landlord and tenant are cotenants in relation to such crop, is so highly favored as to have become the settled law in at least some of the states. Cooper v. McGrew, 8 Or. 327, and cases cited; Abernethy v. Uhlman, 52 Or. 359, 93 Pac. 936, 97 Pac. 540.

Our conclusion is that the instrument before us possesses the indicia of a lease, and by its terms the parties thereto were made tenants in common in the crops to be raised. The claim that the parties to the writing were copartners is disposed of by the cases already cited, to which may be added the case of Smith v. Schultz, 89 Cal. 526, 26 Pac. 1087.

No mention is made in the instrument as to marketing or disposing of the crop after harvest and no authority was directed or impliedly given to Wyllie to act for respondent. In selling the whole of said crop the former acted without authority. As to what disposition respondent should make of his share of the crops was a matter for his determination alone. If he concluded it would be to his interest to dispose of them jointly with Wyllie, he might have done so; otherwise, he had a right to insist on a partition or division.

[2] Under the present settled state of the law governing sales of personal property, the principle of estoppel could not be applied to the facts of this case. The lease was executed December 14, 1918, and the crop in litigation was sold on December 23, 1919. Respondent was the owner of the land, and we are not advised that Wyllie owned said premises at any time or ever occupied them prior to December, 1918. His occupancy was brief. The lease had been of record for a period of five months before said sale. There is nothing before us to justify the conclusion that Wyllie had ever before the transaction in question made any sales of corn or other produce for respondent or was ever held out by him as being clothed with any such authority. Had appellants examined the records they would have at least been put on inquiry as to the ownership of the products of the premises owned by respondent.

[3] We find nothing to justify us in changing the general rule that a purchaser of personal property acquires only the title or estate of his vendor. California Cured Fruit Assn. v. Stelling, 141 Cal. 713, 75 Pac. 320; Pacific States Corp. v. Gill (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 489.

STEVENS v. SNOW et al. (L. A. 6688.)

1. Libel and slander 🔑71—That publication accused one of having done only that which he could legally do no defense.

It is not a sufficient answer to a charge of libel to show that the publication only accuses plaintiff of having done that which he may legally do.

2. Libel and slander 🔑6(1)—Publication exposing person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy libelous, if false and unprivileged; "libel."

"Libel" includes any publication which exposes a person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, if false and unprivileged, irrespective of whether it charges a violation of law, and this definition includes almost any language which upon its face has a natural tendency to injure a man's reputation, either generally or with respect to his occupation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Libel.]

3. Libel and slander 🔑19—Libelous character to be determined from natural effect on readers.

In determining whether newspaper readers understood the publication as charging plaintiff only with doing that which he had a right to do, the publication should be measured not so much by its effect when subjected to the critical analysis of a trained legal mind as by the question as to what would be its natural and probable effect upon the mind of the average lay reader.

4. Libel and slander 🔑6(2) — Publication charging crooked methods in procuring change in school district boundary libelous per se.

A newspaper article in effect charging plaintiff with procuring by crooked methods an unjust change in school district boundaries and by bad faith in so doing held libelous per se and without any elements in it negativing its defamatory imputations.

5. Libel and slander 🔑6(2)—Statement in libelous article held to imply plaintiff succeeded in imposing on public officers.

The statement in an alleged libelous publication charging plaintiff with procuring by crooked methods an unjust change in the boundaries of a school district, reading, "However, when we learn that S. worked the thing up and got it done, we do not so much blame the public officers who are involved in it," held clearly to imply that plaintiff succeeded in imposing upon the officers by some means.

6. Libel and slander 🔑93—Privilege not absolute must be pleaded specially.

The defense of privilege, to be available, must be specially pleaded; the exception that, when privilege appears upon the face of the complaint, it may be availed of by demurrer, being limited to cases of absolute privilege, under Civ. Code, § 47, subds. 1, 2.

7. Libel and slander 🔑101(4)—Defense of privilege one of confession and avoidance, and under it burden of proving absence of actual malice rests on defendant.

The defense of privilege in a libel action is essentially one of confession and avoidance, and under it the burden of proving absence of actual malice rests upon defendant.

8. Libel and slander 🔑107(1)—Admission of testimony of mental suffering of plaintiff's wife error.

In a libel action admission of testimony that plaintiff's wife was affected by the publication, that she cried and did not want to live in the same community where she and her husband were called pigs and hogs, and that she became sick and did not sleep, held erroneous.

9. Libel and slander 🔑124(5)—Instruction authorizing jury to consider plaintiff's mental suffering because members of his family suffered by publication erroneous.

Where plaintiff's testimony of the effect of the publication on his wife was erroneously admitted, an instruction permitting the jury to consider the mental suffering of plaintiff resulting from his consciousness that members of his family suffered by reason of the publication was erroneous as emphasizing the error in the admission of plaintiff's testimony.

10. Libel and slander 🔑121(1)—Verdict of $5,000 based in part upon incompetent evidence miscarriage of justice within Constitution so as to require reversal.

Verdict of $5,000 in a libel action held based in part upon erroneous admission of evidence of mental suffering of plaintiff's wife, resulting in miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring reversal, unless reduced one-half.

11. Appeal and error 🔑1140(1) — Appellate court powerless to determine what portion of verdict attributable to errors at trial.

The appellate court has no criterion by which to determine what portion of a verdict is attributable to errors in the admission of incompetent evidence and the giving of an erroneous instruction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Action by E. T. Stevens against Ernest Snow and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed unless plaintiff consents to remission of damages.

Ford & Bodkin, of Los Angeles, and G. H. Gould and Harry W. T. Ross, both of Santa Barbara (Leon R. Yankwich, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

John C. Benton, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

MYERS, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment for plaintiff upon a verdict in his favor in an action for damages for libel. The action was based upon the following publication in the form of a letter signed by the defendants, and published in the Santa Barbara Daily News (the plaintiff and defendants being residents of the Summerland district in the county, of which Santa Barbara is the county seat):

"Through no fault of our own we seem to be dragged into Summerland disputes. If there are factions in that town we are not interested in them. But we are interested in the crookedest deal in the shape of annexation of the territory of one school district to another that was ever put over on the quiet in the state of California. However, when we learn that E. P. Stevens—Ed. Stevens, well known to the readers of the Daily News—worked the thing up and got it done, we do not so much blame the public officers who are involved in it.

"What is it that causes a number of the people of Summerland to call us kickers and disturbers because we do not quietly submit to a form of legalized robbery? Let us show you and all fair-minded men and women what was done in November, 1917, without our knowledge and consent and of which we were not informed until we found it out by our tax statements. We cannot on this short notice furnish the Daily News with a plate from which to print a map; but that will be done later when it may do some good.

"This Ed. Stevens, with the help of some others in good faith, drew a description for a petition for annexation to Summerland school district of certain adjoining territory which looks as if it might properly belong to Summerland. The petition upon which the actual change was made was based upon a description altogether different from the original, and we do not know whether that change was made before or after the names were attached, but we do know that persons who assisted with the original description refused to sign the petition.

"Not knowing whether or not we can hope for fair play or a fair hearing in Summerland, we respectfully ask your readers in Santa Barbara, Montecito, and Carpinteria, who may have access to a map of East Montecito to trace out the description of Summerland school district as established two years ago. Here it is in brief: Beginning at the southeast corner of the Ortega rancho, and running thence north to the south line of section 11 (T. 4 N., R. 26 W., S. B. M.); thence east to the southeast corner of section 11; thence north to the northeast corner of section 2 near the summit of the Santa Ynez Mountains; thence west to the middle of the north line of section 3; thence south to the pueblo line; thence southeasterly along that line to a point north of lands of Allen S. Whiting; thence south to north line of lands of D. C. Williams, being now about one-fourth of a mile from the first line given herein; thence meandering gracefully southwesterly to the Pacific Ocean; and thence on the seashore to the place of beginning. It will be noticed that some one discovered that extreme tight lacing about the middle was about to prove fatal to the scheme, so the narrow connection along the Valley road is left for an example to the school children of an isthmus or a strait—but not of straight dealing. Will any person, kindly tracing this thing out on the map, let us know if in his opinion anybody not belonging to the species of animals from which we make pork will call it fair play or straight dealing or common decency.

"Now the boss down there in Summerland, Ed. Stevens, who owns the pool and card room on the corner, is in the background pulling wires to carry an election to vote bonds on us to help him build a schoolhouse—or something. If the people of Summerland love him and his pool room, we do not object. Let them have him. But why should we be called on to support him? We are not complaining of the extra taxation itself. But we do not belong to Summerland. We were unjustly taken from Ortega district without our knowledge. In order to reach Summerland, we pass immediately by the Ortega schoolhouse, down to the Coast highway, and over the Ortega hill, two miles beyond the Ortega school. Or we may pass through Ocean district, immediately by the schoolhouse, and go two miles further to Summerland. There are no other than those two roads.

"We need our funds for the district in which we rightfully belong; and we therefore appeal to the people of Summerland, if they do not approve of legalized robbery, not to vote their burdens upon us, but to give us a chance to undo the injustices done us in the past. After the present bond issue is defeated and we are permitted to pay our taxes into our own school funds, Summerland may tax herself to death for the benefit of her local bosses if she wants to. But please leave us out of it."

[1] Appellants complain that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that the publication was libelous per se, and they invoked the rule that "it is never libelous to accuse a person of having done that which he may legally and properly do." The validity of this rule may be conceded, but in its application the words "and properly" must not be ignored. It is not sufficient answer to a charge of libel to show that the publication only accuses the plaintiff of having done that which he may legally do. It has never been the law that a publication, to be libelous, must accuse a person of having committed a crime or otherwise violated some law.

[2] Libel, in this state, includes a publication "which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule or obloquy" (if false and unprivileged), irrespective of whether or not it charges a violation of law. "This definition is very broad, and includes almost any language which, upon its face has a natural tendency to injure a man's reputation, either generally or with respect to his occupation." Schonberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 224, 227, 64 Pac. 290, 291. If the publication above quoted, disregarding the attempted enlargement thereof by innuendo, is libelous at all, it is libelous per se. "Where there is a statutory definition, * * * language which is fairly included in such definition is libelous per se." 132 Cal. 227, 64 Pac. 291. Considering the publication herein, "as well from the expressions used as from the whole scope and apparent object of the writer" (Cooper v. Greeley, 1 Denio [N. Y.] 358), it in effect charges the plaintiff with procuring by crooked methods an unjust change in the boundaries of a school district and with being actuated by bad faith in so doing. So regarded, it cannot be doubted that the natural tendency thereof would be to expose the plaintiff to obloquy, which is the equivalent of censure, reproach, blame, or reprehension. Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 270, 11 Pac. 713; Tonini v. Cevasco, 114 Cal. 273, 46 Pac. 103.

Appellants urge that, conceding that some of the language used, if taken alone, would be libelous, nevertheless, when read in the light of the context, its defamatory character disappears, and it becomes apparent that the plaintiff is accused therein of only doing that which every citizen has a right to do under the law. They invoke the rule illustrated by the dictum that, "if a man be called a murderer, but it appears that the epithet was so applied to him because he unlawfully hunted on another's man's premises and killed several hares, there is no slander." They point out that the change of school district boundaries here referred to could only be made by action of the board of supervisors upon a proper petition therefor signed by the requisite number of heads of families, and that in acting upon such petition the supervisors have the authority under the law to change the boundaries therein proposed, as they actually did in this case upon the recommendation of the superintendent of schools. They point out that every citizen is accorded by law the right to prepare, circulate, file and urge the adoption of such a petition, and that all men are presumed to know the law. They submit that, when the publication herein is read in the light of these circumstances, it becomes apparent that it charges plaintiff only with doing that which he had a right to do under the law, that it should have been so understood by the readers, and that it is therefore not libelous.

[3-5] In the application of this rule, the publication should be measured not so much by its effect when subjected to the critical analysis of a mind trained in the law and in the application of the rules of pleading as by the question, "What would be its natural and probable effect upon the mind of the average lay reader of the newspaper?" We have no doubt that the latter would understand therefrom that the plaintiff was accused of bad faith and crooked dealing. But, even when carefully analyzed, we find nothing in the article which destroys or negatives its defamatory imputations. Giving full effect to all of the rules of law invoked by appellants, the fact still remains that the plaintiff could have corruptly changed the description in the petition after the same was signed, and that he could have procured the action of the supervisors by corrupt methods or by "crooked" practices. There is nothing in the article which negatives either of these inferences. On the contrary, the statement that, "However, when we learn that E. P. Stevens * * * worked the thing up and got it done, we do not so much blame the public officers who are involved in it," clearly implies that he succeeded in imposing upon the supervisors by some means. Each one of appellants' claims in this connection was urged upon this court with much force and with equal reason in behalf of appellants in Earl v. Times-Mirror Co., 185 Cal. 165, 192, 196 Pac. 57, and there rejected. We conclude that the trial court correctly instructed the jury that the publication was libelous per se.

[6, 7] The contention that the court erred in instructing the jurors that the publication was unprivileged is without merit because the defendants did not plead privilege. That instruction told the jurors, in effect, that the question of privilege was not an issue in the case, and it was not. In this state the defense of privilege, like that of justification, must be specially pleaded or it cannot be availed of. Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 606, 611, 44 Pac. 241; Swan v. Thompson, 124 Cal. 193, 200, 56 Pac. 878; Gosewisch v. Doran, 161 Cal. 511, 516, 119 Pac. 656, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 442; Riley v. Evening Post Pub. Co., 30 Cal. App. 294, 158 Pac. 225. The dictum to the contrary in Schomberg v. Walker, supra, 132 Cal. 229, 64 Pac. 290, was obiter for the reason that the defense of privilege was pleaded in that case. It is out of line with the settled course of decisions in this state and is not to be followed. It is true that under the early common law the defense of privilege was available under the general issue, but that is no longer the law of England, and has never been the law of this state. This defense is essentially one of confession and avoidance, and this is further evidenced by the circumstance that under it the burden of proving the absence of actual malice rests upon the defendant. Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 198 Pac. 1, 6; Longsworth v. Curson (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 779. The rule that privilege, to be available as a defense, must be pleaded, is subject to the single exception that when it appears upon the face of the complaint it may be availed of by demurrer. Gosewisch v. Doran, supra; Riley v. Evening Post Pub. Co., supra. But this exception is limited to cases of absolute privilege under subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 47, Civil Code, and manifestly this must be so, because of the fact that in cases of qualified privilege the burden is upon the defendant to prove the absence of malice. The only privilege which could possibly be claimed herein is a qualified privilege, and the defendants, having failed to tender this issue by their answer, cannot be heard to say that it should have been submitted to the jury.

[8] We come now to a serious claim of error, the validity of which must be conceded. The plaintiff upon the witness stand was asked by his counsel the following question:

> "I will ask you what effect if any, it [the publication complained of] had on your wife, so far as you were able to observe—not from what she told you, but from what you observed yourself?"

This was objected to "as irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent, as the feelings of the plaintiff's wife are not subject for damages in this action." The objection was overruled, and plaintiff answered:

> "I know it made her feel bad. She cried about it and did not want to live in a community where we were called hogs and pigs; insisted that I sell the home and get out of there. I know that she was sick for two or three days afterwards—worried over it, and did not sleep."

That the admission of this testimony was erroneous cannot be seriously doubted. Respondent makes a half-hearted effort to justify it under the rule in Cahill v. Murphy, 94 Cal. 29, 30 Pac. 195, 28 Am. St. Rep. 88, and cases there cited, wherein it was held proper to show of what members the plaintiff's family consisted, "and the damages consequently enhanced by the fact that the members of the plaintiff's family would suffer by reason of the disgrace visited upon [plaintiff] by the slanderous charge." But that rule has never been extended so as to render admissible evidence to prove that members of plaintiff's family actually did suffer in consequence of the publication. To do so would be to import into the case collateral issues upon which no logical limitations could be placed. Another vice inherent in the ruling is that it would serve to make an element of defendants' liability depend upon, not what would be the natural and probable effect of the wrong done by them, but upon what was its actual effect upon the particular mentality, temperament, and nervous constitution of an individual who was a stranger to the action. The case of Dennison v. Daily News Publishing Co., 82 Neb. 675, 118 N. W. 568, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 362, is on all fours with the instant case on this point, and it was there held that the admission of testimony of the precise character here under consideration was prejudicially erroneous.

In Earl v. Times-Mirror Co., supra (see 185 Cal. 170-172, 196 Pac. 60), the plaintiff was himself a newspaper publisher, and the claim of the defense was that the libel complained of was but a circumstance which "occurred in a prolonged newspaper controversy which nobody took very seriously, not even the newspapers themselves." Under these circumstances the plaintiff was permitted to testify that he did take the matter seriously, that he suffered greatly in consequence thereof, and that he believed that his wife also suffered likewise In that case the trial court "was careful to instruct the jury that they were not to consider the plaintiff's testimony as evidence of the fact that the wife was affected by the article." In the instant case the trial court instructed the jury, in effect, that they were to consider that testimony as evidence of such fact. This court held in the Earl Case that under the peculiar circumstances of that case there was no error in admitting the testimony there received, but in doing so it was careful to point out that "such testimony is not received to establish the actual effect upon the community or upon the members of his family, but to prove the effect upon himself." This court also took pains to point out that the plaintiff there "did not testify to the effect of the article upon his wife, or of her grief, if any, upon him." The rule of the Dennison Case, supra, was there considered and its validity, in effect, conceded. In short, the court there indicated, unmistakably, that the admission of such testimony as was here admitted would have been prejudicially erroneous. See, also, Smith v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 179 Cal. 611, 615, 178 Pac. 501.

[9] The trial court, at the request of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that—

> "You may take into consideration as an element of damage the mental suffering on the part of plaintiff, if any, growing out of the fact, if you find it to be a fact, that he was conscious that members of his family suffered by reason of the statements contained in the publication herein complained of."

This instruction adopted the theory which in the Earl Case was said to be "untenable." It emphasized and magnified the error in the admission of the testimony, as that was the only testimony in the case to which this instruction could have referred. It also, in effect, suggested to the jurors that they could base a finding of fact upon this testimony of conclusions which were incompetent, even if the subject-matter thereof had been otherwise admissible.

[10, 11] The admission of that testimony and the giving of this instruction were erroneous, and it remains only to consider whether these errors require a reversal of the judgment. Respondent calls attention to article 6, § 4½, of the Constitution, and suggests that they do not. The amount of the verdict was $5,000. Appellants make no claim that this was excessive, in the sense that it was so grossly disproportionate to the damages proved as to at once suggest the influence of prejudice or passion or improper motives. But it was sufficiently large, when considered in the light of the evidence produced, to give support to appellants' claim that it is attributable in part to the consideration by the jury of the evidence of the actual suffering of plaintiff's wife. There was no evidence as to the plaintiff's status in life, or as to the nature or extent of his business, social or political acquaintance, or associations. There was no evidence of the extent of the circulation of the newspaper in which the publication was made, and no evidence that it had any circulation at all in the community in which the plaintiff and defendants resided. There was no evidence and no claim that the plaintiff suffered any injury in respect to his business or occupation. The compensatory damages were thus limited to the injury to his reputation and his mental suffering, and the evidence as to the former was most meager. We are thus impelled to the conclusion that a very substantial portion of the award was based upon a consideration by the jury of the evidence which was improperly admitted and then unduly emphasized and called to the particular attention of the jury by the court's instruction, which referred to the mental suffering of the plaintiff's wife. To the extent to which the verdict was based thereon, it resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

We do not overlook the fact that under the pleadings and the evidence a portion of the amount awarded by the verdict may be attributed to punitive damages. But no evidence was produced of the wealth of either of the defendants which would justify the imposition of a very heavy penalty by way of punishment or example, and the verdict is still sufficiently large, in the light of the evidence, to suggest that it must have been based in part upon the evidence erroneously admitted. It is therefore our duty to reverse the judgment and remand the case for retrial. It may be that the respondent, rather than suffer the expense and delay incident to a retrial of the action, would prefer to consent to a very liberal reduction of the judgment. We are not disposed nor have we any criterion by which to determine what portion of the verdict is attributable to the errors in the admission of the evidence and the giving of the instruction. But, if the respondent should be willing to consent that the amount awarded him by the verdict should be reduced by one-half, it could not then be said that in the judgment as so modified there is any miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is therefore reversed, unless the plaintiff shall, within 30 days after the filing of the remittitur in the superior court, file with the clerk and give to the defendants a stipulation remitting from the judgment the sum of $2,500. If such stipulation be so filed and delivered, the superior court is directed to amend the judgment in conformity therewith, and thereupon the judgment shall stand affirmed; appellants to recover their costs of appeal.

LEE et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 10432.)

1. Prohibition 🔑10(1)—Lies to restrain assumption of jurisdiction of matter over which another court is exercising concurrent jurisdiction.

Prohibition will lie to restrain one court from assuming jurisdiction of a matter over which another, having concurrent jurisdiction, has assumed and is exercising jurisdiction.

2. Master and servant 🔑396—Court's jurisdiction to appoint guardian for dependent compensation claimants ousted by proceeding before Industrial Commission for appointment of trustee to administer award.

While the pendency of a proceeding before the Industrial Accident Commission, which has power, under Workmen's Compensation Act, §§ 11d, 14e, 28c, 55a, 57a(3), to appoint a trustee to receive and disburse an award by it for the benefit of a deceased employee's minor dependents, would not oust the probate court of jurisdiction to appoint a guardian to care for other property of such dependents, such court's jurisdiction is ousted where the estate consists merely of such award, though the commission's jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, in either case, is ousted by a prior proceeding in the probate court for the appointment of a guardian, who, however, must administer the award under the commission's orders.

3. Master and servant 🔑414—Appointment of trustee to administer compensation award held valid, as made in pending proceeding.

In view of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 20d, giving the commission continuing jurisdiction over its findings and awards for 245 weeks after the injury, and section 63a, giving it full power to do everything necessary or convenient in the exercise of its powers, an order appointing a trustee to administer an award some 8 months after the filing thereof is not a nullity.

4. Constitutional law 🔑24 — Constitutional amendment ratifying act may cure infirmities not impairing contract obligations or divesting vested rights.

A constitutional amendment ratifying and confirming a statute does not validate it, if it impairs contract obligations or divests vested rights, but may otherwise cure its infirmities.

5. Master and servant 🔑347—Compensation Act provision empowering commission to appoint trustee to administer awards constitutional.

In view of Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended in 1918 (see St. 1919, p. lxxv), vesting the Legislature with plenary power, unlimited by the Constitution, to create and enforce a workmen's compensation system, and ratifying and confirming the creation and existence of the Industrial Accident Commission, with all the functions vested therein by the Workmen's Compensation Act, the commission's power to appoint trustees to administer awards is within the Legislature's constitutional authority, though it trenches on the superior court's probate jurisdiction.

Application by Minnie Mae Lee and others for a writ of prohibition, directed to the Superior Court of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and others, to prevent further proceedings in a guardianship matter. Writ granted.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioners.

C. A. Linn and H. C. Kelsey, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition to prevent the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco from further proceeding in a certain guardianship matter, pending before that court, upon the ground of lack of jurisdiction. There is no dispute about the facts.

The petitioner, Minnie Mae Lee, an adult, Raymond R. Lee, Robert H. Lee, Herbert A. Lee, Edward T. Lee, and Howard G. Lee, minors, were the children of Robert S. Lee and Mittie Lee. In March, 1913, a decree of divorce was granted to Robert S. Lee from Mittie Lee. Prior to the commencement of any of the proceedings hereinafter mentioned, the children and Mrs. Lee resided in the state of Texas, and Mrs. Lee was duly appointed in that state the general guardian of said minors. The father of the above-mentioned minors and Minnie Mae Lee was killed August 2, 1920, in San Francisco, while in the employ of the Western Pacific Railroad Company. Thereafter an application was made to the Industrial Accident Commission for a death benefit on behalf of such minors. In that proceeding the children were represented by a firm of lawyers residing in Texas and by C. A. Linn, an attorney at law practicing in California. After a hearing the Industrial Accident Commission entered its decision awarding the children the sum of $4,900. In its decision it also fixed the amount of the fees to be paid to the said attorneys in the aggregate sum of $100, and directed the amount of the award to be paid in installments to Mittie Lee, as guardian and custodian of the minor applicants. No petition was filed in that proceeding for a rehearing, and the findings and award of the commission have been final since December 30, 1921.

At the first hearing of the case the referee of the commission, with the consent of C. A. Linn, attorney for the minors, appointed F. B. Lord as guardian ad litem and trustee for said minors. Through inadvertence no confirmation of this appointment was made by the commission until after its decision in the case, at about the time the present controversy arose in the superior court, to wit, August 12, 1922. In this order of confirmation the employer was directed to pay the installments of the death benefit to F. B. Lord, guardian ad litem and trustee, who, in turn, was to remit the payment to the Texas guardian for the support of the minors. The employment of said Texas firm of lawyers was for the purpose of representing the heirs of said Robert S. Lee in all proceedings arising out of his death. These lawyers, in turn, employed C. A. Linn to represent the Lees in California. Their employment was contingent, they to receive one-third of the amount recovered. The attorneys, being dissatisfied with the amount of the fees allowed them by the Industrial Accident Commission, assigned their claim to one Sidney Rhein, who commenced an action against the Lee minors for the sum of approximately $1,600. About the same time Linn, claiming to be a person interested in the estate of said minors, filed in the superior court, over their objection, a petition for the appointment of H. C. Kelsey as guardian of the estate of said minors, which appointment was in due course made. The proceeds of the award of the commission are now the subject of conflicting demands made upon the employer by Lord and Kelsey, each claiming the exclusive right to receive it—the first as trustee appointed by the commission; the second as guardian of said minors' estate.

[1] It is conceded that prohibition will lie to restrain one court from assuming jurisdiction over a matter when another tribunal having concurrent jurisdiction has assumed and is exercising it over the same matter. Dungan v. Superior Court, 149 Cal. 98, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119; 16 Corp. Jur. 1134 (6), § 583; Evans v. Evans, 154 Cal. 644, 98 Pac. 1044. That much being conceded, it is claimed by the petitioners, first, that the appointment on August 12, 1922, by the commission, of its trustee, F. B. Lord, ousted the superior court of jurisdiction to appoint a guardian of the estate of said minors, inasmuch as said estate consisted exclusively of the award in their favor by the commission, in the proceeding to obtain which the commission was empowered to appoint a trustee to carry out the terms of the award.

The Workmen's Compensation Act (Stats. 1917, c. 586), by section 11 (d), provides that a general guardian appointed by the superior court, or a guardian ad litem or trustee, may exercise before the commission any right given therein to any minor or incompetent, and the commission may appoint a trustee to receive and disburse compensation payments for the benefit of such minor or incompetent. Section 14 (e) of said act provides that an award or benefit granted by the commission to dependents of a deceased injured employee shall be paid to a trustee appointed by the commission or by a commissioner for the benefit of the person or persons entitled, and that the person to whom the benefit is paid shall apply the same in compliance with the findings and directions of the commission, and, further, that the commission may set apart or reassign the award to any one or more of the dependents, in accordance with their respective needs and as may seem just and equitable, and may order payment to a dependent subsequent in right or not otherwise entered. Section 28 (c) provides that the commission may order the award to be paid directly to the injured employee or his dependents, or deposited with any savings bank or trust company authorized to transact business within this state, or may order it deposited with the state compensation insurance fund, and that payments from such fund when so deposited shall be made by the trustee only in the amounts and at the times fixed by the order of the commission.

Section 55 (a), establishing the jurisdiction of the commission, provides, among other things, that all proceedings for obtaining any order which by the act the commission is authorized to make, "or for the determination of any other matter, jurisdiction over which is vested by this act in the commission, shall be instituted before the commission, and not elsewhere, except as otherwise in this act provided, and the commission is hereby vested with full power, authority and jurisdiction to try and finally determine all such matters," subject only to review by the Supreme Court or District Courts of Appeal; and section 57 (a) again provides that the commission shall have full power and authority:

> "(3) To appoint a trustee or guardian ad litem to appear for and represent any such minor or incompetent * * * and such guardian or trustee shall not be discharged from liability until he shall have filed an account with the commission or with the probate court and such account shall have been approved. The trustee or guardian shall be entitled to receive such compensation for his services as shall be fixed and allowed by the commission or by the probate court."

[2] It appears from a consideration of the foregoing provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act that the Legislature has conferred upon the Industrial Accident Commission jurisdiction to appoint a person, designated a trustee, to receive and disburse an award made by it for the benefit of the dependents of a deceased employee—functions which, in the absence of this legislation would, in the case of minors or incompetents, devolve upon the guardian of their estate, appointed either by will or by the probate court. This jurisdiction is evidently not so extensive as that of the probate court, since it is limited to that portion of the ward's estate which consists of the award of compensation; it does not extend to any other property owned by the ward. The pendency of a proceeding before the commission, therefore, in which the commission has power to appoint such trustee would not oust the probate court of jurisdiction to appoint a guardian to care for such other property. But where the estate consists merely of the claim for compensation, or an award based thereon, the power and duty to administer which are conferred upon the commission, the jurisdiction of the probate court with regard thereto is, we think, ousted by the commencement, before the power of the probate court is invoked, of the proceeding before the commission by which it acquires jurisdiction to make and administer it. Conversely, the jurisdiction of the commission to appoint its own trustee is ousted by a prior proceeding in the probate court for the appointment of a guardian for the minor or incompetent, whether the estate consists of the claim for compensation or the resultant award only, or includes additional property. It is to be noted, however, that, when the award is being administered by a guardian appointed by the probate court, he must administer the same under the orders of the commission, since that body is granted powers in relation to the award which the probate court does not possess. Workmen's Compensation Act, § 14 (e).

[3] It is objected by the respondents that the order of the commission appointing F. B. Lord trustee is a nullity, for the reason that the proceeding in which the appointment was made was no longer pending before the commission; this contention referring to the fact that such appointment was made some eight months after the filing of the award. But section 20 (d) of the act gives to the commission continuing jurisdiction over its findings and awards for 245 weeks after the date of the injury giving rise to the proceeding; and section 63 (a) vests the commission with full power and authority "to do and perform any and all things, whether herein specifically designated, or in addition thereto, which are necessary or convenient in the exercise of any power, authority or jurisdiction conferred upon it under this act." The powers thus conferred are certainly ample to uphold the order of the commission appointing a trustee to carry out the terms of its award where, by the terms of the award itself, it has omitted to do so.

[4, 5] An objection is raised by the respondent to the appointment of a trustee by the commission, upon the ground that the duties of such trustee relate to matters of probate, and that the Constitution of the state vests probate jurisdiction exclusively in the superior court. Whatever merit there might have been in this contention when the act was originally passed, it has ceased to exist since the amendment of 1918 (see St. 1919, p. lxxv) to article 20, § 21, of the Constitution, whereby the power of the Legislature to create an Industrial Accident Commission and to confer upon it governmental powers was considerably broadened, and the act theretofore passed by it expressly ratified and confirmed. That section, as amended, reads (in part):

> "The Legislature is hereby expressly vested with plenary power, unlimited by any provision of this Constitution, to create and enforce a complete system of workmen's compensation, by appropriate legislation" including "full provision for vesting power, authority and jurisdiction in an administrative body with all the requisite governmental functions to determine any dispute or matter arising under such legislation, to the end that the administration of such legislation shall accomplish substantial justice in all cases expeditiously, inexpensively, and without incumbrance of any character. * * * Nothing contained herein shall be taken or construed to impair or render ineffectual in any measure the creation and existence of the Industrial Accident Commission of this state * * * the creation and existence of which, with all the functions vested in them, are hereby ratified and confirmed."

Following this amendment, the Legislature, at its session of 1919 (St. 1919, p. 910), amended and re-enacted certain sections of the act of 1917, including the section authorizing the commission to appoint trustees for the collection and disbursement of awards made by it. While an amendment to a state Constitution ratifying and confirming an act of its Legislature is ineffectual to validate that act, if it impair the obligations of a contract or divest vested rights, still such an amendment may otherwise cure the infirmities of an act, and to that extent the act is thenceforth to be regarded as constitutional. 12 Corp. Jur. 1092. It follows that the power conferred upon the commission to appoint such trustees for the purpose indicated, even though it trenches upon the probate jurisdiction of the superior court, is within the constitutional authority of the Legislature.

In view of the conclusions reached upon the matters discussed, it is not necessary to consider other questions raised by the respondents. The superior court, for the reasons stated, was without jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for the nonresident minors and dependents of Robert S. Lee, deceased, and the writ of prohibition prayed for in the present proceeding should issue.

It is so ordered.

O'MEARA v. SWORTFIGUER.
(S. F. 10051.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(8)—Instruction that automobile driver was negligent if he violated ordinance held ground for reversal in view of conflicting statutes.

In an action for injuries sustained when struck by defendant's automobile at street intersection, in which there was evidence that defendant was driving more than 10 miles but less than 15 miles an hour with obstructed view of street traffic, instruction that defendant was negligent if he violated ordinance prohibiting the driving of an automobile at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles an hour, where driver's view of street traffic is obstructed, held ground for reversal, in view of St. 1919, p 220, § 22, subd. a, fixing the speed limit at a street intersection at 15 miles per hour.

2. Appeal and error 🔑930(1)—The appellate court must assume that jury accepted view most favorable to respondent.

In determining whether or not a verdict is supported by the evidence, the Supreme Court must assume that the jury accepted the view most favorable to the respondent.

3. Appeal and error 🔑928(1)—Supreme Court must assume that jury might have believed evidence on which refused instruction was predicated.

In determining whether or not the instructions given are correct, the Supreme Court must assume that the jury might have believed the evidence on which the instruction favorable to the losing party was predicated, and that if a correct instruction had been given the jury might have rendered a verdict in favor of the losing party.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Contributory negligence of plaintiff struck by defendant's automobile while running to board street car held for jury.

In action for injuries sustained when struck by defendant's automobile while running from one street car to board another which had been traveling in front of and in same direction as defendant's automobile, the question of whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence held for the jury.

5. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction that automobile driver was negligent if he failed to keep as near to curb as possible in violation of an ordinance held ground for reversal.

In an action for injuries sustained when struck by defendant's automobile in which there was evidence that defendant was not driving as near the curb as possible, instruction that defendant was negligent if he had not kept as near the curb as possible, in violation of an ordinance requiring him to so do, held error.

6. Trial 🔑194(16)—Instruction as to automobile driver's duty in passing street car held erroneous in view of evidence.

In an action for injuries sustained when struck by defendant's automobile, as plaintiff was running from one street car to board other car which had been traveling in front of and in same direction as defendant's automobile, where the uncontradicted evidence showed that the street car in front of the automobile did not stop until it had turned off into other street, and that the automobile either proceeded directly forward, as defendant himself testified, or swerved to the left to pass around the rear end of the car as it turned, as other witnesses testified, instruction concerning the defendant's duty in passing a street car, which was stopping for the purpose of taking on or discharging passengers under an ordinance and Motor Vehicle Act of 1919, held erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Bertha O'Meara against Thomas Q. Swortfiguer. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. S. Bell, of Oakland, for appellant.

L. T. Jacks, of San Francisco (Horatio Alling, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action to recover for personal injuries resulting to the plaintiff by reason of a collision between her and an automobile operated by the defendant at the intersection of Jones and O'Farrell streets, in the city of San Francisco, on the 6th day of September, 1919. The defendant was proceeding westerly along O'Farrell street and the plaintiff had alighted from a north-bound Jones street car to transfer to a north-bound cable car which turned into Jones street northerly from O'Farrell street. Defendant's automobile had been following the O'Farrell street car which turned from O'Farrell street to Jones street. The testimony as to how the accident occurred varied from that of the defendant to the effect that his automobile was standing still at the time of the collision and that the plaintiff heedlessly ran into its side, and the testimony on behalf of the plaintiff that the automobile operated by the defendant suddenly swerved to the left from behind the O'Farrell street car, which was turning from O'Farrell to Jones street, and, passing beyond the center line of O'Farrell street, struck her when she was about in the middle of the street intersection. The testimony also varied as to the speed at which the defendant was operating his machine at the time of the accident, from 15 miles per hour, to his own testimony to the effect that he was at a standstill at the time of the collision.

[1] The plaintiff offered in evidence certain ordinances of the city and county of San Francisco regulating street traffic, and the court instructed the jury upon the theory that these ordinances established the law of San Francisco with relation to such street traffic, and that if the defendant violated the terms of the ordinance he was guilty of negligence. The case of Ex parte Daniels, 183 Cal. 636, 192 Pac. 442, 21 A. L. R. 1172, had not been decided at the time of the trial of the action, which occurred July 26, 1920. By that decision it was determined that an ordinance of a county, city, or city and county in conflict with the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 397, as amended by St. 1917, p. 382), was void in the particulars where the conflict existed. There was testimony to the effect that the defendant was traveling more than 10 miles and less than 15 miles an hour. If, under the law, it was permissible for him to travel 15 miles per hour, under the circumstances the instruction was erroneous. It is contended by the respondent, however, that the instruction limits the speed of 10 miles an hour to those occasions where the view was obstructed and that defendant's testimony shows that his view was not obstructed. On the other hand, there is the evidence of the plaintiff that she looked towards the direction from which the automobile was approaching and did not see it, and there was other evidence to the effect that the automobile was following the street car, and plaintiff's explanation of the accident seems to be that the defendant suddenly swerved out from behind the street car and almost immediately struck her. Under these circumstances the instruction was erroneous.

[2-4] It is claimed, however, that this instruction was not prejudicial. The same contention is made with reference to the instruction to the effect that it was the duty of the defendant to travel as near the north curb line of the street as possible. In order to maintain this proposition the respondent sets out in her brief the two possible versions of the accident, the one most favorable to the respondent, the other the extreme view favorable to the appellant, and then asserts that the jury accepted the view most favorable to the respondent. It is true that in determining whether or not a verdict is supported by the evidence, we must assume that the jury accepted the view most favorable to the respondent. However, in determining whether or not the instructions given are correct, we must assume that the jury might have believed the evidence upon which the instruction favorable to the losing party was predicated, and that if the correct instruction had been given upon that subject the jury might have rendered a verdict in favor of the losing party. Any instruction applicable to the case which is clearly erroneous may and usually does result in a miscarriage of justice where the facts are as complicated as those involved in a collision upon the public streets of a populous city. The appellant relies upon the proposition that the evidence shows without conflict that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. It is sufficient to say in this respect that the question was for the trial jury. Burgesser et al. v. Bullock's et al., 214 Pac. 649.

[5] The jury were instructed that there was an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco "requiring every person riding, driving, propelling, or in charge of any automobile to on all occasions travel on the right-hand side of such street, as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible," and that if the jury believed that the defendant "violated said ordinance by driving said automobile upon and along the southerly or left-hand side of said O'Farrell street in a westerly direction, and not as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible, then you are instructed in that behalf that you will find as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of negligence in violating said ordinance." In this connection it should be stated that the defendant testified that his automobile was straddling the north rail of the north street car tracks up to the time of the accident, and consequently was not as near the north curb of the street as possible. He denied swerving his car to the left of the center of the street, as testified to by some of the witnesses. The jury were also instructed that the defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law if he "drove his automobile at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles an hour where his view of the street traffic was obstructed, either upon approaching an intersecting street or in traversing a crossing or intersection of ways, or in approaching or traversing across an intersection of ways, then you are instructed in that behalf that you will find as a matter of law that the defendant was guilty of negligence in violating said ordinance." It is difficult to determine from this instruction whether the defendant was guilty of negligence as a matter of law in traversing the street intersection at a speed greater than 10 miles an hour, or whether he was negligent in so doing only in the event that his view was obstructed. The Motor Vehicle Act as amended in 1919 fixes the speed limit at a street intersection at 15 miles per hour. Stats. 1919, § 22, subd. a, p. 220.

If the jury believed from the evidence in this case that the defendant was traveling in excess of 10 miles an hour in approaching the intersection and that the accident resulted from this rate of speed, they may readily have determined under the instructions that the rate of 10 miles per hour applied to the circumstances shown in the evidence and have based their verdict upon this rate of speed. We cannot say that they did not do so. With reference to the instruction concerning the duty of the defendant to travel as near the north curb line of the street as possible, it is contended that although the court instructed the jury that the law required the defendant to travel as near as possible to the north curb line, and although the defendant himself testified that he was not doing so, that the instruction did not direct a finding of negligence unless it appeared to the jury that the defendant crossed over to the south side of the street. It is true that the instruction was apparently framed upon this theory, but the jury were repeatedly told the terms of the ordinance, the ordinance was introduced in evidence, and it was repeatedly stated in the instruction that a violation of the ordinance in certain particulars was negligence. We doubt if it can be said with any degree of assurance that the jury were impressed by the instructions with the fact that it was only permissible for them to find negligence as a result of the violation of the provision of the ordinance where the defendant passed beyond the center line of O'Farrell street. It is clear, we think, from the instructions as a whole, that the jury understood that if the defendant violated the municipal ordinance in any respect he was guilty of negligence in that regard, and that if such negligence was a proximate cause of the injury the verdict should be for the plaintiff.

[6] The jury were also instructed at length concerning the duty of the defendant in passing a street car which was stopping for the purpose of taking on or discharging passengers, and the defendant's duties with reference to passing the car at a distance of at least 6 feet from the lower step was stated to the jury, and a violation thereof was declared to be negligence as a matter of law. The evidence is uncontradicted that the street car which the defendant was following did not stop until it turned completely off of O'Farrell street on to Jones street in a right angle position to that which it had occupied while defendant was following it. He did not pass alongside the street car at all, but either proceeded directly forward, as he testified, or swerved to the left to pass around the rear end of the car, as other witnesses testified. Neither the ordinance nor the statute (Motor Vehicle Act of 1919, Stats. 1919, § 20, subd. o, pp. 192, 217) applied to the situation as disclosed by the evidence, and this instruction should not have been given. The jury may have inferred from this instruction that if the defendant passed the street car within four feet, either while proceeding directly forward, as he claimed, or swerving to the left, as other witnesses claimed, that he was negligent, and they may have concluded that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. From the foregoing it is evident that the jury was erroneously instructed. We have no means of ascertaining the exact conclusions of the jury upon the facts. There were no special findings, and we cannot for that reason say whether the jury, if properly instructed, would have rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff or the defendant. The parties were entitled to have a jury determine the facts. The failure of the jury to pass upon and determine the facts is, of itself, a miscarriage of justice, unless, under the facts that are admitted as proved beyond controversy, this court can say that the defendant was liable for the injury. In this case we need not inquire to what extent this court may weigh the evidence in determining whether or not there has been a miscarriage of justice, for it is clear that the ascertainment of fact in this case should have been left to the jury.

Judgment reversed.

HORNBLOWER (EDWARDS et al., Interveners) v. MASONIC CEMETERY ASS'N OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 10200.)

1. Cemeteries 🔑15—Conveyance of cemetery lot passes interest, not fee.

Conveyance by cemetery corporation of a cemetery lot does not pass any title or estate, but merely an interest, and the fee remains in the grantor, subject to the grantee's right to the exclusive use thereof for burial purposes.

2. Cemeteries 🔑15—Rights of lot owner stated.

The right of a purchaser of a cemetery lot, whether denominated an easement, license, or privilege, is a right of property, cognizable at least in courts of equity, and entitled to protection from invasion whether it be by a mere trespasser or from the unauthorized and illegal acts of the directors of the cemetery corporation itself, and is not a mere license or privilege revocable at the will of the corporation.

3. Cemeteries 🔑14—Morris Act does not permit cemetery corporation to abandon cemetery contrary to wishes of lot owners.

The Morris Act (St. 1921, p. 199), permitting certain cemetery associations by resolution ratified by majority of lot owners to abandon all or a part of the cemeteries and remove the remains interred therein, is merely an enabling act, expressing the consent of the state that the public use, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1238, subd. 14, section 1963, subd. 38, St. 1854, p. 20, § 4, Pol. Code, §§ 3105, 3109, be abandoned, and leaves private rights and obligations as between lot owner and a cemetery association unimpaired, and hence does not permit a cemetery association to abandon its cemetery and remove the remains interred therein against the objection of an owner of a lot therein which has been used for burial purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by William B. Hornblower against the Masonic Cemetery Association of the City and County of San Francisco, in which F. E. Edwards and another intervened. From judgment for defendant, the named intervener appeals. Reversed and remanded with instructions.

Geo. Clark Sargent, of San Francisco (Sumner Hurd, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Frank E. Powers, of San Francisco, for William B. Hornblower.

Byron C. Parker and Thos. P. Wickes, both of San Francisco, for Martin Kelly.

R. M. J. Armstrong and Charles L. Patton, both of San Francisco, for Masonic Cemetery Ass'n.

Francis J. Sullivan, Edgar D. Peixotto, James P. Langhorne, Harry S. Young, and George Lull, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

MYERS, J. This is a suit to enjoin the respondent cemetery association from carrying out its announced intention to abandon its cemetery within the city and county of San Francisco, and to remove the bodies therefrom and reinter them in another cemetery in an adjoining county. The respondent association was incorporated in 1864 under the provisions of the Rural Cemetery Act (Stats. 1859, p. 281). This act provides that any number of residents of the state, not less than seven, may form a cemetery association in the manner therein prescribed enumerates the power of such association, provides for the acquisition by it of the necessary lands and the platting and subdivision thereof into lots, for the sale and conveyance of such lots, for the annual election of trustees for the management and conduct of the business of the association, and that the proprietor or proprietors of any lot therein, not less than 200 square feet in area, shall have one vote at such election; provides that the land and property of such association shall be exempt from all public taxes, rates, and assessments and shall not be liable to be sold on execution or to be applied in payment of debts due from any individual proprietor; and provides (section 11) that whenever a cemetery lot shall be transferred to individual holders, after there shall have been an interment therein such lot "shall be forever thereafter inalienable, and shall upon the death of the holder or proprietor thereof, descend to the heirs at law of such holder or proprietor, and to their heirs at law forever; provided, nevertheless, that any one or more of such heirs at law may release, to any other of the said heirs at law, his, her, or their interest in the same, on such conditions as shall be agreed on and specified in such release. * * *" In 1866 the ancestor of intervener Edwards purchased from respondent a cemetery lot exceeding 200 square feet in area for a valuable consideration, and received from respondent a deed of grant, bargain, and sale thereto, purporting to convey the fee, with a habendum clause "unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever, but to be held, owned, used and disposed of by said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns subject to the provisions of section 11" [of the Rural Cemetery Act above referred to] "and also subject to and in accordance with such rules, regulations and by-laws as are hereunto annexed and such as may be hereafter adopted by the trustees of said cemetery association for the management of said cemetery." The regulations attached to the deed and those thereafter adopted, so far as appears from the record, all deal entirely with the management of the cemetery as such. Several bodies have been interred in this lot and are still there, and the intervener Edwards is the sole descendant and sole heir of said original grantee. In 1900 the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco passed an ordinance reciting that "the burial of the dead within the city and county of San Francisco is dangerous to life and detrimental to health" and forbidding the same from and after August 1, 1901. The validity of this ordinance has since been affirmed by this court (Odd Fellows' Cemetery Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987; Laurel Hill Cemetery v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 464, 93 Pac. 70, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 260, 14 Ann. Cas. 1080), and by the Supreme Court of the United States (Laurel Hill Cemetery v. San Francisco, 216 U. S. 358, 30 Sup. Ct. 301, 54 L. Ed. 515). In 1904 the respondent elected to continue its existence under the provisions of the Civil Code, by unaminous vote of its trustees, in the manner prescribed in section 287 thereof. In December, 1912, by resolution of its board of trustees, ratified by a vote of the lot holders, at a meeting called for that purpose, it elected to continue its existence for a period of 50 years from and after the date of such extension, pursuant to the provisions of article 12, § 7, of the Constitution. In 1921 the Legislature passed a law, referred to by counsel, and to which we shall for convenience refer as the Morris Act (Stats. 1921, p. 199). It provides that any cemetery association owning a cemetery within the boundaries of an incorporated city or city and county having a population not less than 100,000, wherein burials shall have been prohibited for more than 15 years, may, by resolution of its governing body, ratified by a majority vote of its lot owners as are entitled to vote at corporate elections, at a regular meeting or special meeting called for the purpose, declare for the abandonment of the whole or a part of the cemetery and for the removal of the remains interred therein to another cemetery without the boundaries of such city; provides for the fixing of a date for the removal of the remains, and the publication of a declaration of abandonment specifying such date, which shall be not less than 10 months after the first publication; provides that after completion of the required publication the association shall have power to remove all remains and reinter them in such other cemetery or deposit them in a mausoleum or columbarium; specifies the manner of such removals; provides for the voluntary removal prior to such time by the lot owners; provides that if the improvements on the lot are not removed by the lot owners within a given time they may be removed and disposed of by the association, and no one shall thereafter be allowed to assert any claim or maintain any action with relation thereto; provides that whenever a cemetery or a portion thereof shall have been abandoned and the remains removed in the manner specified, the land from which such remains have been removed may be sold by the cemetery corporation, or mortgaged or pledged as security for loans, without order of court, provided that such sales must be confirmed by the superior court; authorizes the association to employ any money in its treasury to defray the expenses of such removal and reinterment, and that the surplus funds thereafter remaining shall be devoted to the perpetual care of the places of reinterment. Pursuant to the provisions of this act, the trustees of respondent adopted a resolution in August, 1921, for the abandonment of its cemetery and the removal of the remains therein, which was thereafter submitted to a meeting of the members and ratified by the vote of more than a majority thereof. This action was thereupon commenced to enjoin respondent from so proceeding. Appellant Edwards and others intervened therein, the case was submitted to the trial court for decision upon an agreed statement of facts, judgment rendered for defendant, from which intervener Edwards prosecutes this appeal.

[1] Respondent rests its right to proceed upon the provisions of the Morris Act. Appellant contends that if this act be construed as authorizing respondent to abandon its cemetery, remove the remains, and sell the land without his consent, it must be held unconstitutional as impairing the obligation of a contract, depriving him of his property without compensation and without due process, and denying him the equal protection of the law. Appellant claims to be the owner in fee of his cemetery lot subject only to a limitation of the use thereof to burial purposes. He further claims that if the cemetery shall be lawfully abandoned he will thereupon own the absolute fee, freed from that limitation. Respondent contends that its deed to the cemetery lot, though in form a grant purporting to convey the fee, in legal effect passed no title or estate, but merely a right to the exclusive use thereof for burial purposes; that the entire title and estate remains in it, subject only to this use; and that if the cemetery shall be lawfully abandoned appellant's rights therein will be thereby terminated and it will own the land freed from all claims of appellant. The question thus raised, of the nature and extent of the estate or interest conveyed by a deed of a cemetery lot, has never been passed upon in this state so far as we are advised. The decisions thereon in other states are many and various. The interest thus conveyed has been variously held to be "a fee with limited use," "a base fee," "a qualified fee," "an easement," "a license," "a qualified and usufructuary right," and "a privilege." The great majority of the cases, however, do agree in the conclusion that such a conveyance does not pass any title or estate, but merely an interest, and that the fee remains in the grantor, subject to the right of the grantee to the exclusive use thereof for burial purposes. It remains to consider the extent and the limitations of this right of the lot owner.

[2] Counsel for respondent define the rights of a purchaser of a cemetery lot as follows:

> "He becomes a member of the corporation; he gains the right to bury in the lot so long as burials are not prohibited by competent authority; and he also gains the right to maintain the bodies buried in the lot so long as no lawful authority enforces the removal of them."

This definition seems to accord, both with reason and with the preponderant authority, and for the purposes of this decision we shall accept it as correct. It matters not, for the purposes hereof, whether we denominate this right an easement, or a license, or a privilege. The cases all agree, either expressly or by implication, in recognizing it as a right of property, cognizable at least in courts of equity, and entitled to protection from invasion whether it be by a mere trespasser or from the unauthorized and illegal acts of the directors of the corporation itself. See, for example, Hertle v. Riddell, 127 Ky. 623, 106 S. W. 282, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 477, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 796, 128 Am. St. Rep. 364; Brown v. Hill, 284 Ill. 286, 119 N. E. 977; Anderson v. Acheson, 132 Iowa, 744, 110 N. W. 335, 9 L. R. A. (N. S.) 217; Gowen v. Bessey, 94 Me. 114, 46 Atl. 792; note in 67 L. R. A. 118 et seq. The interest of appellant in the instant case must be something more than a mere license or privilege revocable at the will of respondent, because it was granted upon a valuable consideration and because it is expressly recognized by the law as a heritable right or property. In the case of Chew v. First Presbyterian Church (D. C.) 237 Fed. 219, a great many of the decided cases were reviewed, and the court there said:

> "Language has been employed in some of the decisions touching the relations between cemetery companies or religious societies owning burying grounds, and persons holding burial lots therein, which if applied to this case would be palpably inaccurate and unsound. It has been said that such lot holders possess only a mere license or privilege to use and maintain their lots during the continuance of the cemetery or burial ground as such. But such a doctrine is wholly inapplicable to the relation between the corporation defendant and the holders of lots in its cemetery. They have much more than a mere license or privilege to use the lots appropriated or assigned to them. Were it otherwise their right to continue in the possession of burial lots would be revocable and determinable at any time at the whim or pleasure of the corporation defendant. A mere license or personal privilege to enter upon and occupy land is not only revocable and terminable at any moment, but is nonassignable and nondescendible. If not earlier ended it terminates with the death of the licensee. In De Haro v. United States, 5 Wall. 599, 627 (18 L. Ed. 681), the court said:
> " 'There is a clear distinction between the effect of a license to enter lands, uncoupled with an interest, and a grant. A grant passes some estate of greater or less degree, must be in writing, and is irrevocable, unless it contains words of revocation; whereas a license is a personal privilege, can be conferred by parol or in writing, conveys no estate or interest, and is revocable at the pleasure of the party making it. There are also other incidents attaching to a license. It is an authority to do a lawful act, which, without it, would be unlawful, and while it remains unrevoked is a justification for the acts which it authorizes to be done. It ceases with the death of either party, and cannot be transferred or alienated by the licensee, because it is a personal matter, and is limited to the original parties to it. A sale of the lands by the owner instantly works its revocation, and in no sense is it properly descendible to heirs. These are familiar and well-established principles of law, hardly requiring a citation of authorities for their vindication.'
> "But if what would otherwise be a mere license has for its object the permanent occupation of land, and its accomplishment involves the expenditure by the person to whom granted of money upon or in connection with the land, and the circumstances attending and surrounding the grant clearly evince an understanding and intention by both parties that its operation shall be permanent and not confined to the lifetime of the person to whom granted, and money be expended accordingly, there is presented the case of a license so executed as to constitute in equity, if not at law, an irrevocable contract good as against the original parties and their heirs or successors."

That case is not directly in point here because the question of the effect of a statute such as the Morris Act was not there involved. It is cited rather for the clarity of its reasoning and its comprehensive investigation of the authorities.

We conclude that prior to the passage of the Morris Act appellant had a right, cognizable in equity, to the continued and undisturbed use of his cemetery lot, which the respondent was bound by its contract to respect. Undoubtedly the Legislature had the power to terminate this right of appellant's by the enactment of a statute in the proper exercise of its police power. If the Legislature should find and determine that the continued maintenance of cemeteries in cities of the class described in the Morris Act will be dangerous or detrimental to the health of the citizens, it could compel the removal of the bodies and the abandonment of the cemeteries, and thus terminate the right of the lot owners to their continued maintenance. But the power to thus invade property rights exists only to the extent to which its exercise is reasonably necessary to protect the health, safety or welfare of the people. The question whether or not such necessity exists is for the Legislature, and its determination thereof is conclusive upon the courts if there is any basis in reason therefor. But it is clear that the Legislature has not found or determined that the continued existence of these cemeteries in any way threatens or endangers the health or welfare of the people, because it has provided, in effect, that they may continue to be maintained without let or hindrance as long as their trustees desire to do so.

The maintenance of a cemetery is a public use (Code Civ. Proc., § 1238, subd. 14), to which the land here in question has been dedicated. (Stats. 1854, p. 20, § 4; Code Civ. Proc., § 1963, subd. 38; Pol. Code, §§ 3105, 3109). The state, therefore, has an interest in its maintenance, and the Morris Act should be considered as expressing the consent of the state to the abandonment of the public use, leaving the private rights and obligations as between the lot owners and the cemetery association unimpaired. The holding in Stockton v. Weber, 98 Cal. 433, 33 Pac. 332, that the Legislature may enact a general law under which cemeteries may be lawfully abandoned and the bodies lawfully removed therefrom, went no further than this. There were no contract rights of lot owners involved in that case, the burials having been made under a mere verbal license from the owner of the land without any contract. It is not practicable to discuss in detail the many cases from other states which have been cited in the briefs. Some of them are in conflict with the conclusions here expressed, others are distinguishable from the instant case, and others are in accord herewith. We are of the opinion that the learned trial judge erred in concluding that the Morris Act empowered the respondent to proceed in disregard of its contract obligations to the appellant. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the other points made by appellant in his briefs.

The judgment is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to the trial court to enter its judgment upon the findings, enjoining the defendant from abandoning its said cemetery or from in any way interfering with the remains now buried in the lot of intervener against his will or consent.

Ex parte MATHEWS. (Cr. 2515.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑605—City's power to make police regulations to suppress nuisances not limited to suppression of nuisances per se within statute.

A city has power to pass general police regulations to prevent nuisances, which power is not limited to the suppression of those things which are nuisances per se within the meaning of Pen. Code, § 370, and Civ. Code, §§ 3479, 3480.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑604—Keeping animals subject to municipal police regulations.

The keeping of animals is a proper subject of municipal police regulation, which regulation may limit the number of such animals that may be kept.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑604—Board of directors sole judges of expediency of ordinance regulating keeping of animals.

The board of directors of a municipality are the sole judges of the expediency of an ordinance regulating the keeping of animals within its limits.

4. Evidence 🔑13—Matter of common observation that herding together of animals may result in annoyance to persons residing near by.

It is a matter of common observation that the herding together of even the least offensive animals within a city may be conducive to noise, foul odors, and insect life, and may be a source of annoyance to persons residing in the vicinity.

5. Municipal corporations 🔑625—Ordinance regulating keeping of goats within city limits held not unreasonable.

An ordinance limiting the number of goats which may be kept within the city within certain distances of a residence, enacted under authority of Const. art. 11, § 11, held not unreasonable.

6. Municipal corporations 🔑626—Ordinance regulating right to keep goats held not invalid because not based on division of city into districts.

An ordinance declaring it to be a nuisance and unlawful to keep or maintain any goat within 50 feet or two goats within 100 feet or three goats within 300 feet or five goats within 1,000 feet of any dwelling house held not invalid because it makes each dwelling house the center of a zone within which an excessive number of goats may not be kept, rather than dividing the city into definite areas in which they might or might not be kept.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑625—Ordinance regulating keeping of goats not invalid because number permitted disproportionate to limits prescribed.

An ordinance limiting the number of goats which may be kept within certain distances from a dwelling house is not invalid because the number of goats permitted to be kept is entirely disproportionate to the distances or area prescribed.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑626—Ordinance precluding keeping of goats within certain distance of dwelling house not invalid because keeper's house excepted.

An ordinance precluding the keeping of goats within certain distances of a dwelling house is not invalid because it exempts the keeper's own house.

9. Municipal corporations 🔑120—In giving effect to ordinance, intention of board of directors must be considered.

In giving effect to a municipal ordinance, the intentions of the board of directors must be considered.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑604—"Person" as used in ordinance relating to keeping of goats held to include plural.

The word "person" as used in an ordinance declaring it a nuisance and unlawful "for any person, firm, or corporation to keep or maintain a goat within * * *" held to include the plural, and preclude several persons jointly from keeping more than the permitted number of goats within the areas prescribed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Person.]

11. Municipal corporations 🔑604—Ordinance relating to keeping of goats held not invalid because circumstance defeating its purpose might arise.

An ordinance declaring it unlawful for a person to keep certain numbers of goats within certain distances of a dwelling house held not invalid because under it a circumstance might arise where the number of goats permitted might be kept on each side of a dwelling by different persons, thus giving a total number within the area greater than could be kept by one person, and defeat the purpose of the ordinance.

Application by Mrs. Frank Mathews for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the Chief of Police of the City of Pasadena. Writ discharged.

See, also, 209 Pac. 220.

J. G. Rossiter and B. M. Marble, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

James H. Howard, City Atty., of Los Angeles, and Leonard L. Riccardi, City Pros. Atty., of Pasadena, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Petitioner, Mrs. Frank Mathews, was convicted of a violation of section 14 (c) of Ordinance No. 1940 of the city of Pasadena, entitled, "An ordinance of the city of Pasadena defining nuisances ad prohibiting their maintenance." Section 14 (c) provides:

> "It is hereby declared to be a nuisance and it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to keep or maintain any goat within fifty (50) feet of any dwelling house other than that occupied by him or it, or more than two (2) goats within one hundred (100) feet of any dwelling house other than that occupied by him or it, or more than four goats within three hundred (300) feet of any dwelling house other than that occupied by him or it, or more than five (5) goats within one thousand (1000) feet of any dwelling house other than that occupied by him or it.
> "(cc) It shall be unlawful to keep or maintain any male goat exceeding the age of six months within the limits of the city of Pasadena."

Petitioner's alleged offense consisted of keeping more than five goats within 1,000 feet of a dwelling house other than her own. Pursuant to her application therefor, a writ of habeas corpus was issued. directed to the chief of police of the city of Pasadena, and it is now claimed the section of the ordinance under which she was convicted is invalid.

Section 11, art. 11, of the Constitution provides that—

> "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

The ordinance involved was obviously adopted under the authority conferred by this section, as it also prohibits within the city limits the maintenance of such places as slaughter houses, filthy stables or yards, laundries unconnected with sewers, the pollution of water, and regulates the removal of garbage, the operation of rock crushers, and the keeping of fowls and animals, including dogs and cats kept for breeding purposes, rabbits, cattle, horses, and hogs. Section 5 provides for the regular cleaning and care of premises where stock, including goats, is kept, and section 21 (a) forbids the keeping of any noisy fowls or animals.

[1] Petitioner first contends that the ordinance conflicts with the state law. She points out that by section 370 of the Penal Code and sections 3479 and 3480 of the Civil Code certain things have been declared to be nuisances, they being, in so far as is material here, anything which is injurious to the health, indecent, offensive to the senses, or which interferes with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property by any community, neighborhood, or considerable number of persons. It is insisted that a municipality is without authority to determine that a specific act is within the Code definitions, such a question being a judicial and not a legislative one, and that the city of Pasadena, by providing regulations on the subject of keeping goats, has recognized that, when so kept, they are not a nuisance; that by the ordinance, which is designated as an act to define nuisances and prohibit their maintenance, it is attempted to bring the keeping of goats within the definition of a nuisance. A city clearly has power to pass general police regulations to prevent nuisances, and such power is not limited to the suppression of those things which are nuisances per se within the meaning of the Code sections. In Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 231, 73 Pac. 987, 988, it is said that—

> "The exercise of this [police] power is not limited to the regulation of such things as have already become nuisances or have been declared to be such by the judgment of a court. * * * The decisions of this court show that ordinances have been upheld in many cases prohibiting things which could not be said to be nuisances per se, and which had not been declared to be such by any court. * * * Whenever a thing or act is of such a nature that it may become a nuisance, or may be injurious to the public health, if not suppressed or regulated, the legislative body may, in the exercise of its police powers, make and enforce ordinances to regulate or prohibit such act or thing, although it may never have been offensive or injurious in the past."

In Ex parte Shrader, 33 Cal. 279, 284, it is said that—

> "The power to regulate or prohibit conferred upon the board of supervisors not only includes nuisances, but extends to everything 'expedient for the preservation of the public health and the prevention of contagious diseases.'"

See, also, In re Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93.

The mere fact that in the ordinance the subject-matter is referred to as a nuisance cannot invalidate the enactment if the city had the power to pass it (Ex parte Johnson, 47 Cal. App. 465, 190 Pac. 852), and, in our opinion, it is to be regarded as a provision that the keeping of goats at any point within the city limits is inimical to the public welfare unless the sanitary regulations provided are complied with, and, under section 14 (c), that, even when kept as required by the ordinance, they may be obnoxious if kept within the stated distances of dwelling houses.

The question presented here is whether the keeping of goats is a proper subject of municipal regulation, and, if so, whether the regulation in question is a reasonable one. In Boyd v. City of Sierra Madre, 41 Cal. App. 520, 527, 183 Pac. 230, 233, with respect to the power of a city to pass police regulations, it is declared:

> "Primarily, it is for the city's legislative body, clothed with police power by direct grant from the Constitution, to determine when and what regulations are essential; and its determination in this regard, in view of its better knowledge of all the circumstances and the presumption that it is acting with due regard for the rights of all parties, will not be disturbed by the courts, unless it plainly can be seen that the regulation has no relation to the protection of health, safety, comfort, or well-being of the community, but is a clear invasion of personal or property rights under the guise of police regulation."

[2, 3] That the keeping of animals may be a proper subject of municipal regulation, and that by such regulation the number of animals which may be kept may be limited, does not admit of question. In re Linehan, 72 Cal. 114, 13 Pac. 170. The board of directors of the city of Pasadena have deemed the presence of all male goats and the unrestricted keeping of herds of female goats in the city injurious to the welfare of the residents. Petitioner alleges that the keeping of milk goats is a large, growing, and profitable industry; that such goats are not noisy, are not offensive to the senses, and do not at all interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property. In support of these contentions petitioner in her brief refers to many treatises on goats, which would be proper subjects of consideration by the board of directors, who are the sole judges of the expediency of the ordinance. No answer to the petition was filed, but respondent in its brief takes issue with these claims, stating that—

> "The offensiveness of the goat lies in its persistent and nerve-racking bleat and in the foul odors which emanate from the animal and its abode, as ordinarily kept."

In our opinion petitioner's allegations are not conclusive of the question, in view of the strong presumption in favor of the validity of the ordinance. It was said in Odd Fellows' Cemetery Association v. San Francisco, supra, 140 Cal. 233, 73 Pac. 989, that—

> "There are some allegations in the complaint intended to show that this particular ordinance is unreasonable. It is well settled, however, that, except where the court can see, in the light of facts properly brought to its knowledge, that a given police regulation has no just relation to the object which it purports to carry out, and no reasonable tendency to preserve or protect the public safety, health, comfort, or morals, the decision of the legislative body as to the necessity or reasonableness of the regulation in question is conclusive."

See, also, Vanderhurst v. Tholcke, 113 Cal. 147, 45 Pac. 266, 35 L. R. A. 267.

[4, 5] It is a matter of common observation that the herding together of even the least offensive animals within a city may be conducive to noise, foul odors, and insect life, and may be a source of great annoyance and discomfort to persons residing in the vicinity. Assuming it to be a fact of which we may take judicial notice that female goats are, as claimed by petitioner, animals of high qualities, whose merits are underestimated by the public at large, still they might not be entirely free from all the characteristics which make other barnyard animals the proper subject of municipal regulation. We cannot say that when kept in numbers in a city they are so incapable of offending the senses and affecting the health and comfort of the residents, and, in the instance before us, are so unlikely to interfere with the public welfare, that they are beyond the power of regulation of a city government.

[6] Petitioner emphasizes the fact that the goat-keeping industry is increasing, and is as yet undeveloped in this part of the country. If this is so, and the animals tend to interfere with the comfort and health of the community, it is a stronger reason why municipal authorities should regulate their maintenance before they become too numerous, if for no other reason than to prevent the growth within the city of an industry which may subsequently become a nuisance and necessarily be suppressed. The regulation, in our opinion, is not unreasonable. Petitioner's most serious objection is to its plan, which in effect makes each dwelling house the center of a zone within which an excessive number of goats may not be kept. We see no objection to this method of determining what shall constitute such areas. A similar system was held valid in State v. Hord, 122 N. C. 1092, 29 S. E. 952, 65 Am. St. Rep. 743, which decision upheld an ordinance providing that no person should keep a hog pen with a hog in it within 100 yards of another's dwelling. See, also, In re Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93. In any city such a regulation would insure equal protection against the evil to all within its limits, and in a city built up irregularly, with a population unevenly scattered, a greater freedom would be accorded the inhabitants in the matter of keeping animals than by a general ordinance dividing the territory into business and residential districts, or by attempting to divide the city into definite areas in which goats might or might not be kept.

[7] It is claimed by petitioner that the regulation in this instance is unreasonable in that the distances prescribed in the ordinance are entirely disproportionate to the number of goats kept. Thus it is pointed out that the distances provided in the case of six goats is three times that provided for the keeping of five. The objection to six goats may be but little greater than that to five, but in a regulation such as this some definite number must be fixed where a division is to be made. The ordinance may not be held invalid unless the distances are clearly unreasonable, the question of reasonableness being primarily one for the legislative body. We cannot say that the distances up to 300 feet for the keeping of five goats are excessive, nor that they are unreasonable because they do not increase in direct ratio with the number of goats. Many things might enter into such a regulation, for example, the greater difficulty of properly caring for a larger number of goats. Petitioner especially objects to the distance of 1,000 feet for six or more goats. Such an ordinance might have the effect of prohibiting the keeping of that number within the limits of the city, and certainly would within any but a sparsely settled neighborhood. Such an objection is not tenable, for the city has the right to suppress as well as to regulate objectionable conditions in the community. Fischer v. St. Louis, 194 U. S. 361, 24 Sup. Ct. 673, 48 L. Ed. 1018. The same result was held not to invalidate the ordinance in State v. Hord, supra.

[8] Nor does the fact that the ordinance does not preclude the goat owner from keeping the animals within the stated distance of his own home impair its uniformity or reasonableness. In State v. Hord, supra, it was said:

> "The object of the ordinance is not to prevent a man from injuring himself by keeping his hog pen too near his own house, for that is a matter he can remedy at will, but to protect the public against a nuisance which they have no power to prevent except through the authority of a town ordinance acting on the offender.
> "A nuisance is to the public, or to others, and not an injury or annoyance which a person causes to himself and family. It is an anomaly that the defendant, who has disobeyed the ordinance forbidding him to commit a nuisance upon the public, should be complaining that the town did not go further and forbid him being a nuisance to himself. He could refrain from that without official help."

[9] Finally, it is objected, first, that, while it is made unlawful for one person to keep goats within the prescribed distance of another's dwelling, there is no objection if they are kept by several persons; and, second, that the operation of the law may also be defeated when an allowable number of goats are kept within a certain distance on one side of a given person's dwelling and an allowable number within the same distance on the other side, but the total number within the area is more than could be kept by one person. Considering the first objection, we are of the opinion the ordinance may be held to cover a case where the goats are owned by several persons in common. In giving effect to the ordinance, the intention of the board of directors must necessarily be considered, and it was their evident intention to prevent the keeping of the prescribed number of goats in close proximity to dwelling houses. Although the ordinance only refers to "any person, firm or corporation," it is entirely immaterial, so far as securing the desired result is concerned, whether the goats are owned by one person or by several.

[10] In the Codes of this state the word "person" includes "persons," for it is expressly declared that the singular shall include the plural. Civ. Code, § 14; Code Civ. Proc. § 17; Pen. Code, § 7; Pol. Code, § 17. No such definition is contained in the ordinance in question. When used in a statute, it would appear from the decisions that, in the absence of an express declaration that it shall include the plural, "person" may or may not include "persons," according to the context. Thus in People v. Croton Aqueduct Board, 26 Barb. (N. Y.) 240, it was held the singular included the plural as used in a municipal ordinance requiring a certain estimate to contain the name and place of residence of the person making it, where more than one person joined in making the estimate. In Dixon v. Ricketts, 26 Utah, 215, 72 Pac. 947, 949, the singular was construed as implying the plural in a statute imposing an inheritance tax upon any property passing by will or inheritance to any person in trust or otherwise. But in Denny v. Smith, 18 N. Y. 567, 568, "person" was held not to include "persons" in a statute suspending the running of the statute of limitations as against any person out of the state, so that both of two joint debtors must reside out of the state the length of time required to avoid the statute.

The ordinance involved herein would be entirely ineffectual, if not discriminatory, if it made the keeping of goats lawful when done by several persons and unlawful when done by one. Construing the word "person" as including the singular only, the intention of the Legislature would be defeated and an absurd result reached. We are therefore of the opinion it should be read as including the plural, and, in view of this conclusion, petitioner's contention fails.

[11] With reference to the second objection, even if the ordinance is defective in not providing for such a possibility, it is not to be held invalid for that reason, as the board of directors cannot be expected to have guarded against every contingency. The likelihood of such a situation arising may be very remote, and the reasonableness of a police regulation is not to be tested by its possible application to extreme cases. Commonwealth v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 382, 19 N. E. 224, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566 The means adopted in the ordinance are appreciably related to the end sought to be accomplished, which is all that is required. Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S. 133, 14 Sup. Ct. 499, 38 L. Ed. 385.

The writ is discharged.

LAWLOR, J. This is a companion case to In re Mathews (Cr. 2515) 214 Pac. 981, this day filed. Petitioner, Vada Lusher, was convicted of the offense of violating section 14(c) of ordinance No. 1940 of the city of Pasadena, the violation consisting of keeping more than four goats within 300 feet of another person's dwelling house. Upon her petition a writ of habeas corpus was issued, the briefs and arguments being identical with those in Re Mathews, supra, with the exception hereinafter considered. Upon the authority of that decision we hold that, the ordinance being a valid and reasonable exercise of the police power, petitioner is not entitled to her release upon any of the considerations urged therein. In the case at bar, however, petitioner alleges that two of the six goats which she kept were kids under the age of six months, and insists they should not be subject to the provisions of the ordinance. It is pointed out that all the authorities on goats refer to the progeny of goats under six months of age as kids. No other facts are presented to show wherein kids so differ in nature from goats that they should not be subject to such an ordinance as that involved herein. It is our opinion that, in view of the nature of the regulation, kids should be held to be included within it. A kid is "a young goat." Webster's Dictionary. The ordinance expressly recognizes the difference between kids and goats in the case of males. No objection is made to the keeping in the city of male goats under six months of age, and, in view of their generally recognized characteristics, the reason for such a distinction is readily discernible. No such distinction is made in the case of females, and no reason appears why we should draw it. If, as petitioner suggests, the female is free from the peculiar odor of the male, the reason of the ordinance would appear to be the noise made by the animals, the odors attendant upon the keeping of them, and the difficulty of maintaining such a condition of sanitation that they will not be offensive. In these respects the young may well be as great, if not a greater, source of discomfort than the more mature. Moreover, although the age of six months is accepted by petitioner as the time when a kid becomes a goat, we cannot say it is invariably true, as it appears from the Encyclopædia Britannica that at least in the case of Angora goats the age of maturity is less than among other breeds. Volume 12, p. 162. In view of these considerations we cannot hold that the age of the goats is a matter of defense under the ordinance.

The writ is discharged.

ROHAN v. PROCTOR. (Civ. 4461.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 19, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1923.)

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Essentials of memorandum of agreement for lease stated.

To satisfy the statute, a written memorandum of agreement for lease must contain the essential parts of the lease to be executed thereafter according to its terms, and particularly a definite agreement as to the extent and boundary of the property to be leased, a definite and agreed term, and a definite and agreed rental and the time and manner of its payment.

2. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Memorandum of agreement for lease should state when term is to begin.

A memorandum of agreement for lease should define when the term of tenancy is to begin.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Agreement for lease to begin on completion of alterations not invalid for failure to state beginning of term.

A memorandum of agreement for a lease held not invalid because the term was to begin on the completion of alterations and improvements rather than at a fixed date.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Memorandum of agreement for a lease not invalid because conditional.

A memorandum of agreement to lease was not invalid as uncertain because contingent on the landlord's making alterations and constructing improvements, where the agreement was in the form of an offer to lease provided the landlord would agree to so alter and improve, since, by the landlord's acceptance of the offer, he agreed to make such alterations and improvements, and, by so doing, made the promise unconditional.

5. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Agreement for a lease not invalid for uncertainty as to alterations and improvements where parties had an understanding as to them.

A memorandum of agreement to lease provided the landlord made certain alterations and improvements, "these improvements to be subject to our mutual approval," was not invalid as failing to define the alterations and improvements, for the uncertainty was one removable by oral evidence as to the kind and character of the alterations and improvements which were, at the time of making the memorandum, within the contemplation and understanding of the parties; such an agreement being collateral and supplemental to the written contract, so that parol evidence thereof would not alter the contract.

6. Frauds, statute of 🔑106(2)—Memorandum of agreement for lease was invalid for uncertainty as to alterations where they were left to subsequent agreement.

A memorandum of agreement for a lease by which the landlord was to make alterations and improvements "to be subject to our mutual approval" was invalid for uncertainty where the oral agreement and understanding between the parties as to the kind and character of improvements was not entered into between the parties until several months after the written agreement was made, since a subsequent oral agreement would render the whole contract between the parties oral, contrary to the statute, and would show that the minds of the parties had not met at the time of execution of the written agreement as to the essential feature when term of the lease was to begin.

7. Frauds, statute of ⚷129(5)—Payment under invalid memorandum of agreement for lease held not to validate the agreement.

A memorandum of agreement for lease under which the landlord was to make alterations and improvements "to be subject to our mutual approval," which was invalid because the alterations and improvements were not agreed upon except by oral agreement subsequent to the execution of the written memorandum, was not validated by the receipt of a substantial sum from the contemplated lessee after the making of the subsequent oral agreement, since the consideration for such payment was not the making of the subsequent oral agreement, but the acceptance of the written offer, and the acceptance of money under an agreement void under the statute of frauds would not validate it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Joseph S. Koford, Judge.

Action by James G. Rohan against Frank H. Proctor. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Chapman, Trefethen & Chapman and Nusbaumer & Bingaman, all of Oakland, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This appeal is presented upon the judgment roll and is from a judgment in favor of the defendant after an order sustaining his demurrer to the plaintiff's last amended complaint; the latter having declined to further amend his pleading. The action is one for damages in a large sum alleged to have been caused by the defendant's breach of an agreement to execute a lease to certain premises in the city of Oakland. The agreement, which is in the form of a written offer to lease said premises on certain terms, which offer the defendant accepted upon its face, reads as follows:

"Oakland, California, July 17, 1919.

"Mr. Frank H. Proctor, Union Savings Bank Building, Oakland, California—Dear Sir: I am prepared to make you the following proposal of lease on the ground floor of the property now known as No. 1728–1744 Broadway and the abutting land running through to Franklin street approximately an area of one hundred (100) feet on Broadway by three hundred (300) feet deep to Franklin street with a frontage on Franklin street of one hundred (100) feet on the following basis of rental: First year, $1,000.00 per month; second year, $1,250.00 per month; third year, $1,500.00 per month; fourth year, $1,750.00 per month; fifth year, $2,000.00 per month; next five years $2,250.00 per month—and with an option of renewal for another ten-year period of $2,500.00 per month, providing that you alter the present ground floor space in the Broadway building and construct a suitable building on the Franklin street property for my uses; these improvements to be subject to our mutual approval.

"I am prepared to furnish you with a cash bond of twenty thousand ($20,000.00) dollars as evidence of good faith of my fulfilling the terms and conditions of the lease to be drawn which would contain the usual safeguards and covenants.

"Kindly advise me immediately if the above offer is acceptable. If so I will deposit two thousand ($2,000.00) dollars with you as evidence of good faith on my part.

"As to the conditions of the other payments and the like, these are to be made according to the verbal arrangements that we have discussed.

"Yours very truly, Jas. G. Rohan.

"Accepted by Frank H. Proctor."

The plaintiff alleges in his said complaint that, as to the provision of said agreement that the lease to be executed "would contain the usual safeguards and covenants," these were to be in accordance with the custom and usage prevailing in the city of Oakland at the time said agreement was made, and were to cover and provide for the payment of rent in advance, for re-entry in case of tenant's default, for the surrender of the premises at the expiration of the term or of any renewal thereof in as good state and condition as reasonable use and wear thereof permitted, and for the further covenant that the lessee would not assign said lease without the written consent of the lessor. The plaintiff further alleged that some time after the offer and acceptance of said agreement the parties thereto came to an oral agreement as to the alterations to be made upon the ground floor of the building then upon said premises and also as to the building to be constructed by the lessor for the use of the lessee upon that portion of the premises fronting upon Franklin street. The plaintiff further alleged that, after the kind and character of said improvements had been thus orally agreed upon and the plans therefor approved by the parties, he deposited with the defendant the sum of $1,500 on account of the sum of $2.000 to be deposited by him as evidence of his good faith, which sum the defendant accepted, and that thereafter he tendered to the defendant the sum of $500 as the balance of said deposit, but the defendant refused and has ever since refused to accept the same. The plaintiff further alleged that prior to July 17, 1919, the date of said agreement for a lease, the plaintiff had discussed the matter of the cash bond provided for therein and the payments to be made on account thereof with defendant and had come to an oral understanding and agreement with relation thereto, which agreement the plaintiff proceeded to set forth at length in his complaint, and which he alleged himself to be at all times ready, willing, and able to perform. He then proceeded to allege that the defendant on February 17, 1920, repudiated said agreement and notified plaintiff of his intention not to perform the same nor the terms and conditions thereof, nor to execute said lease, to the plaintiff's damage in the sum of $500,000, no part of which had been paid. The defendant demurred to said last amended complaint upon the general ground and also upon the ground specifically that it appeared upon the face of said complaint that the agreement alleged to have been breached by the defendant was oral, and was therefore void under the statute of frauds. The court sustained said demurrer, and from the judgment which followed the plaintiff's declination to further amend this appeal has been taken.

[1-3] At the outset of this discussion it may be stated as settled law that a memorandum of agreement for a lease which is required to be in writing, in order to satisfy the statute of frauds, must contain all of the essential and material parts of the lease which is to be executed thereafter according to its terms, and particularly must contain three essentials in order to its validity under the statute of frauds. These are: First, a definite agreement as to the extent and boundary of the property to be leased; second, a definite and agreed term; and third, a definite and agreed rental and the time and manner of its payment. Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 137a; Dodd v. Pasch, 5 Cal. App. 686, 91 Pac. 166; Levin v. Saroff (Cal. App.) 201 Pac. 961. It may also be taken to be well settled that as to the second of the above essentials the agreement for a lease should define when the term of the tenancy is to begin. Taylor on Landlord and Tenant (9th Ed.) § 70; Manufacturing Co. v. Hobbs, 128 N. C. 46, 38 S. E. 26, 83 Am. St. Rep. 661. The respondent contends that the agreement in question is fatally defective in the second of these essentials in that it contains no agreement as to the beginning of the term of the lease to be executed thereunder. It would seem to be true that the said agreement does not state when the term of the lease is to begin, but the question remains as to whether this omission is fatal to its validity under the statute of frauds. The lease to be executed under said agreement was to be for a term of 10 years at a certain increasing rental for the first 5 years and with an option of renewal for an additional period of 10 years at a fixed rental specified therein. Its only uncertainty in this regard was as to the time when said term was to begin. This uncertainty arose primarily out of the fact that alterations and improvements were to be made by the landlord before the tenant could enter into the occupation and beneficial use of the premises, and that the writing did not contain a definite description of what said improvements were to consist of nor did it contain a fixed date when such improvements were to be completed. This, however, is not such an uncertainty as would render void a lease or an agreement to enter into one. It frequently occurs that changes and improvements are to be made in premises prior to the entry of the tenant into the possession and beneficial use thereof, and that the time when such changes and improvements are to be completed is of necessity uncertain. As that uncertainty is one which will be made certain by the completion of such improvements according to the agreement and understanding of the parties at the time, it will not have the effect of rendering void the lease or the agreement to enter into the same. In Jones on Landlord and Tenant, § 113, the rule is thus stated:

> "If a lease has a certain appointment of the number of years, although the commencement or the end of it is certainly appointed upon an uncertain time, yet such lease shall be good as a lease for years. When a lease is to run for a certain term of years, it is not rendered invalid by the circumstance that it is to begin upon the completion of an unfinished building."

The cases cited by the learned text-writer in support of this rule are quite similar as to their facts with the case at bar. In the case of McClain v. Abshire, 72 Mo. App. 390, the lease was for a term of five years beginning when the rooms in a certain building were ready for occupation. It was held a good lease. In the case of Noyes v. Loughead, 9 Wash. 325, 37 Pac. 452, it was held that a lease for a building for five years after completion was a good lease and was to be presumed to be a lease the term of which should begin from the completion of the structure. It was also held in Billings v. Canney, 57 Mich. 425, 24 N. W. 159, and in Clarke v. Spaulding, 20 N. H. 313. In Hammond v. Barton, 93 Wis. 183, 67 N. W. 412, the court upheld a written lease of a room in a building under construction for five years, the court holding that the element of certainty in the commencement of the term was satisfied by the completion of the building. The same principle was applied by the same court in the case of Colclough v. Carpeles, 89 Wis. 239, 61 N. W. 836.

[4] The respondent, however, contends that this agreement to enter into a lease is fatally uncertain because it is contingent upon the following proviso:

> "Providing that you alter the present ground floor space in the Broadway building and construct a suitable building on the Franklin street property for my uses; these improvements to be subject to our mutual approval."

It is the respondent's insistence that this proviso leaves it entirely to the whim of the landlord as to whether or not he will make the improvements in question and thus fulfill the condition upon which the future leasing of the premises depends. We do not so construe this proviso. The agreement here is in the form of an offer to lease the premises, provided the landlord will agree to make alterations and improvements. By the landlord's acceptance of the offer he agreed to make such alterations and improvements, and by so doing put an end to that portion of the proviso. The agreement as thus consummated was an agreement on the part of the landlord to make alterations and improvements upon the premises and an agreement on the part of the tenant to lease said premises when such alterations and improvements were completed.

[5] The respondent, however, further insists that this proviso, even as thus construed, is fatally uncertain in that it does not define what alterations and improvements the landlord has thus agreed to make, and that this uncertainty cannot be supplied by parol without taking said agreement out of the statute of frauds. It must be conceded that the foregoing proviso in said agreement is uncertain in this regard, but it does not follow therefrom that this is such an uncertainty as would have the effect of avoiding the agreement to enter into a lease. The landlord having agreed to make alterations and improvements in the premises for the tenant's uses, without specifying in the writing what those alterations and improvements were to consist of, the uncertainty in that respect was one which might have been removed by oral evidence as to the kind and character of the alterations and improvements which were within the contemplation and understanding of the parties to the written agreement at the time it was made. The case of Blahnik v. Small Farms Imp. Co., 181 Cal. 379, 184 Pac. 661, is an instructive case upon this point; for, while the facts differ somewhat from those of the case at bar, the principle involved is the same. In that case the parties had entered into a contract of sale of certain real estate which contained the following stipulation:

> "The seller agrees that it will have the roads in said division R [of which the land in question was a subdivision] constructed during the fall of 1913 after the rains or when the ground is able to be worked, and construct the necessary bridges."

The action was against the seller of the land for damages for breach of the agreement of sale. Objection was made to the sufficiency of the complaint in failing to describe the kind and character of the work to be done by the seller under the contract and to the sufficiency of the contract itself; it being silent in that respect. The trial court refused to permit the introduction of the oral evidence for the purpose of showing what the agreement of the parties was in that regard. In holding this to be error the Supreme Court said:

> "This ruling was erroneous. The contract was altogether silent in regard to the character and kind of work that was to be done upon the roads. If there was any agreement on that subject, or any plan relating thereto adopted by the defendant and acquiesced in by the plaintiffs, it was not set forth in the contract. So far as appears, it was in parol only. Such an agreement would be collateral and supplemental to the contract contained in the writing, and, as parol evidence thereof would not be inconsistent with the contract and would not alter it in any respect, evidence thereof would be admissible if material to the issues. Sivers v. Sivers, 97 Cal. 521, 32 Pac. 571; Daly v. Rudell, 137 Cal. 676, 70 Pac. 784."

It is to be noted that in the case above cited the oral evidence offered for the purpose of explaining away the uncertainty in the writing as to the kind and character of the roads to be constructed was in the form of conversations between parties to the writing prior to or at the time of its execution.

[6] The respondent contends that the plaintiff's last amended complaint is fatally defective in this very particular, since it appears upon the face of said agreement that the parties thereto had not, either prior to or contemporaneous with the making of such written agreement, come to any agreement or understanding, either written or oral, as to the kind or character of the alterations and improvements to be made by the landlord upon the premises in question, but that, on the contrary, it affirmatively appears both upon the face of said complaint and of said agreement that the parties to said agreement for a lease had not theretofore arrived at any agreement or understanding as to the detail of said improvements, and that they did not do so until several months after the date of said agreement, and that such later understanding and agreement between the parties was oral. It must be conceded that both the agreement and the complaint show this to be the fact. In the proviso in said agreement above quoted it is expressly stated that "these improvements are to be subject to our mutual approval," while in the plaintiff's complaint it is expressly alleged that the oral agreement and understanding between the parties as to the kind and character of said improvements was not entered into between the parties until several months after the written agreement was made. The plaintiff in thus interpreting the writing and in thus alleging that the kind and character of said improvements was to be and was a matter of subsequent oral understanding between the parties to said written agreement has failed to state a cause of action. In order to the validity of the written agreement for a lease it must either be in itself certain as to the kind and character of the improvements to be made upon the premises, the completion of which would fix the beginning of the term, or it must be susceptible of being made certain by oral evidence showing the prior or contemporaneous understanding of the parties in that regard. But, if the parties have come to no such understanding at the time the written agreement is made, the uncertainty of the writing in that regard is fatal, since it is an uncertainty in a respect essential to its validity which no amount of oral evidence as to a later understanding could remove. The effect of such evidence would merely be to create an additional oral agreement touching a vital and omitted essential of the writing, and thus render the entire contract between the parties oral, and hence of necessity obnoxious to the statute of frauds. Fly v. Cline et al., 49 Cal. App. 414, 193 Pac. 615; Dillingham v. Dahlgren, 52 Cal. App. 322, 198 Pac. 832; Haviland v. Sammis, 62 Conn. 44, 25 Atl. 394, 36 Am. St. Rep. 330; Mentz v. Newwitter, 122 N. Y. 491, 25 N. E. 1044, 11 L. R. A. 97, 19 Am. St. Rep. 514; Norris v. Blair, 39 Ind. 90, 10 Am. Rep. 135. The further effect of such evidence would be that of showing conclusively that the minds of the parties had not met at the time of the execution of such written agreement as to a matter essential to the validity of such agreement, viz. as to when the term of the lease was to begin. The plaintiff in the instant case, in pleading that the details of the alterations and improvements of the premises was a matter which was left to the subsequent agreement of the parties, and that such subsequent agreement was oral, has pleaded himself out of court.

[7] The fact alleged in the plaintiff's last amended complaint that the defendant received the sum of $1,500 from the plaintiff after the oral agreement as to the details of the improvements had been arrived at could not serve to validate the otherwise void agreement for a lease for two reasons: First, that the consideration of said payment was not the making of the subsequent oral agreement, but was the acceptance of the original written offer, according to its express terms; second, the acceptance of money under an agreement void under the statute of frauds would not validate such agreement so as to permit a recovery thereon in an action at law for damages for its breach.

As to the appellant's averment that the defendant in repudiating said agreement for a lease was actuated by bad faith, it will suffice to say that no right of recovery could be based upon a defendant's bad faith in refusing to carry into effect a void agreement.

We do not deem a discussion of the other points urged by respective counsel necessary to the determination of this appeal.

Judgment affirmed.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; ST. SURE, J.

61 Cal. App. 488

WRIGHT et al. v. WESTERN STATES LIFE INS. CO. (Civ. 4468.)

1. Insurance ⟹629(1)—Pleading mailing of notice by insured of exercise of option as to payment held sufficient.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 452, and section 1963, subd. 24, providing that pleadings should be construed with liberality, and the presumption that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail, where an insurance policy permitted the insured, by written notice to the company at its home office, to elect that the net commuted value of the sums otherwise payable under the policy at insured's death should be paid in cash, held, in an action on the policy, that an allegation that insured, by written notice deposited in the mails, notified insurer of such election, was sufficient allegation of giving of such notice, although not alleging that insurer received it.

2. Pleading ⟹7—Presumptions of law need not be pleaded.

Presumptions of law need not be pleaded.

3. Insurance ⟹523½, New, vol. 17A Key-No. Series—Right of election under payment options held absolute in insured, and effectual without consent of insurer.

Under an income protection policy, providing that insured, by written notice to the company, could elect that the net commuted value of the sum otherwise payable at insured's death should be paid in cash, held, that insured's right of election was an absolute, irrevocable right in insured, election under which could not alter or vary the policy, and was effectual, though not consented to or agreed to in writing by insurer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Annie Louise Wright and another against the Western States Life Insurance Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Gerald C. Halsey and Frederic T. Leo, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

T. G. Crothers, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This is an action to recover $4,325 from the defendant upon a life insurance policy issued upon the life of one William Edgerton Wright. The policy conforms to the plan known to life insurance companies as an "income protection policy," whereby, in consideration of the payment of an annual premium for a period of years, or until the death of the insured, an income is provided of $25 per month for 20 years from and after the death of insured, with a provision for the payment to the insured of a life income of $25 per month beginning March 13, 1954, in case he then be living, and also a further provision for a life income for the insured in case of total disability. The policy provided for various options, one of which, the chief subject of dispute here, reads as follows:

> "Options at the Death of the Insured. (Available during the insurance period as specified under provisions [1] and [h], on the reverse side hereof.)
> "The insured, by written notice to the company, at its home office, * * * may elect that the net commuted value of the sums payable under this policy at the death of the insured (see general provisions, par. [h] on the reverse side hereof) shall be payable either in cash or as follows."

Paragraph (h), referred to above, fixes the commuted value of the policy at $4,325.

The real estate firm of which the insured was a member was first designated as the beneficiary, and thereafter plaintiffs were designated. The insured died July 3, 1921. Proofs of death were presented. Defendant acknowledged liability under the terms of the policy, and issued its check to the beneficiaries for the first monthly payment. The beneficiaries returned the check, refused to accept the monthly payments, and demanded cash payment of the net commuted value of the policy. The demand of plaintiffs being refused, this action followed. Plaintiffs' amended complaint alleges, among other things, the following:

> "That on the 4th day of May, 1917, at said city and county, said William Edgerton Wright, by a written notice to defendant at its home office in said city and county, which said notice was deposited in the United States post office on said day in a sealed envelope addressed to defendant at its said office, and the postage thereon prepaid, stated to and notified defendant in writing that he elected that the net commuted value of the sums payable under said policy at his death should be payable in cash."

A general demurrer to the amended complaint was interposed. The trial court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend, and judgment was entered against plaintiffs and in favor of defendant, from which judgment plaintiffs appeal.

The defendant, in support of the judgment, makes three points, as follows:

> "(1) That, even admitting the allegations of the complaint, the insured did not give notice either in the manner or form specified in the policy, of his election to change the terms of the policy; (2) that the policy should have been presented for indorsement of the change; or, (3) in lieu of such indorsement, the insured should have obtained the written agreement or assent of the company, signed by the president or secretary."

[1] Defendant's first point is that it is nowhere pleaded in the complaint that the alleged notice of the insured's election to change the mode of payment was ever given to or received by the defendant; that plaintiffs merely pleaded mailing of a notice, and depend upon the presumption of law that it was received. Under our system courts are told to construe pleadings with liberality. Code Civ. Proc. § 452. Pleadings are no longer to be strictly construed against the pleader, but are to be liberally construed with a view to promoting justice. Buriam v. Los Angeles Café Co., 173 Cal. 625, 627, 161 Pac. 4.

Defendant cites 20 R. C. L. § 5, p. 344, to the effect that—

> "Where a contract requires notice, but does not specify the manner in which the notice is to be given, mere mailing of the notice is not sufficient unless it is received."

Kavanaugh v. Security Trust & Life Insurance Co., 117 Tenn. 33, 96 S. W. 499, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 253, 10 Ann. Cas. 680, and Wheeler v. McStay, 160 Iowa 745, 141 N. W. 404, L. R. A. 1915B, 181, also cited, state the same rule.

[2] The policy under consideration does not specify the manner in which notice is to be given, and we known of no law which inhibited plaintiffs from giving notice by mail. This being so, by grace of the presumption established by subdivision 24 of section 1963, Code of Civil Procedure, the pleading comes within the rule cited by defendant. For the mailing of the notice raises the presumption of receipt. Stockton, etc., Works v. Houser, 109 Cal. 1, 41 Pac. 809. And presumptions of law need not be pleaded. Cuthill v. Peabody, 19 Cal. App. 304, 125 Pac. 926, and cases cited therein. Of course, the presumption is not conclusive, but, upon such issue made and tried, evidence may be received for the purpose of establishing the fact of both the mailing and the receipt of the notice. It would seem that the defendant's objection to the pleading is completely overcome by the provisions of our statute and the rule making it unnecessary to plead presumptions of law.

[3] Summarized, defendant's remaining contentions amount to this: The conceded right of election given to the insured contemplates a change in the policy, and is wholly ineffectual unless consented to or agreed to in writing by the insurer. Plaintiffs argue, in reply, that, as the right of election is expressly provided for by the terms of the policy itself, it is therefore unnecessary to secure the consent of the insurer in any form. Defendant calls our attention to several instances wherein the policy gives to the insured absolute rights or options, and insists that the exercise of any one of these options involves a change in the policy, and requires written request or notice and written consent or indorsement by the insurer. An examination of the policy shows that the provision converting the policy from a life policy to a disability policy provides that "the company will agree by endorsement in writing on this contract," etc. The provision relating to loans reads, in part: "The company will advance on the execution of a proper loan agreement and upon proper assignment and delivery of this policy," etc. The provision relating to "cash value" provides that "*upon written request * * * and on surrender of this policy the company will,*" etc. And "change of beneficiary" may be made "by filing written notice thereof at the home office of the company, accompanied by the policy for suitable indorsement thereon," etc. The policy further provides that "no assignment hereof shall be binding upon the company unless made by an instrument in writing indorsed upon his policy or attached hereto," etc. There is also a general provision, upon which stress is laid by defendant, that "no agent can make, alter, or discharge this policy or extend the time for payment of premiums, nor can the policy be varied or altered or its conditions waived or extended in any respect except by the written agreement of the company, signed by the president or secretary." On the back of the policy is printed "Options at Death of Insured," from which we have hereinbefore quoted, and which forms the basis of plaintiffs' claim. There also appears on the reverse side of the policy the caption, "Register of Change of Beneficiary," and thereunder the words: "Note.—No change, designation or declaration shall take effect until indorsed on this policy by the company at the home office."

We think it significant that in the several provisions from which we have quoted and italicized clauses, the policy makes explicit requirements for "indorsement in writing," "execution of proper agreement and proper assignment and delivery," "surrender of policy," etc. In each instance the language used is apt and free from ambiguity. If it had been the intention of the insurer that the option giving the right to prefer payment of the commuted value should be inoperative without consent or approval or agreement by indorsement or otherwise, it would have been a simple matter to have said so. In the absence of any such particular provision or requirement, and considering that a contract of insurance is to be interpreted by the same rules as are other contracts (Schroeder v. Imperial Insurance Co., 132 Cal. 18, 63 Pac. 1074, 84 Am. St. Rep. 17); that the option was an absolute, irrevocable right in the insured's favor which he could claim or not as he pleased; that the option was created when the contract was executed, and that the insured's election under same neither could nor did alter, change, or vary the policy—we are led to the inevitable conclusion that the defendant's contention is wholly without merit. We adopt plaintiffs' view as to the paragraph on the reverse side of the policy appearing under the caption "Register of Change of Beneficiary." We think it should be given no effect beyond the subject-matter of the heading to which it is appended as a note.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the defendant's demurrer and require it to answer.

ROMER v. WEHNER. (Civ. 4473.)

1. Pleading 🔑129(2)—By failure to deny allegations of cross-complaint held admitted.

Where cross-defendant failed to deny cross-plaintiff's allegation that by the terms of an agreement cross-defendant was to furnish boxes for delivery of grapes and barrels for grape juice, cross-defendant admitted those allegations.

2. Trial 🔑396(3)—Finding unsupported by pleadings and evidence to be disregarded.

Where the pleadings were framed upon the theory that one single contract was made involving the sale of grapes and grape juice, and the evidence supported such pleadings, the finding that a single contract was made for the sale of the grapes alone held not within the issues and to be disregarded, since, under Code Civ. Proc. § 462, the trial court is bound by the pleadings.

3. Trial 🔑396(7)—Finding contrary to admitted allegation is beyond issues.

When the allegations are admitted, a finding contrary to such admission is beyond the issues of the controversy and will not support a judgment.

4. Customs and usages 🔑19(3)—Evidence held not to support finding as to custom of payment on final delivery among producers and buyers of grapes and grape juice.

Evidence that, when producers of grapes and grape juice came from the outside, or that when the grapes were to be exported, the uniform custom was that payment should be made before delivery or upon delivery of each installment, held not to support a finding that there was a general, uniform, and recognized custom among producers that payment was to be made after final and complete delivery.

5. Sales 🔑82(4)—Payment due upon delivery of installments in absence of contrary agreement.

When an agreement is silent as to the terms of payment, payment is fixed as of the time of delivery under Civ. Code, § 1784, and hence, where fruit or farm products are to be delivered in installments, payment is due upon delivery of each installment, unless otherwise agreed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; F. B. Brown, Judge.

Action by Robert Romer, doing business under the name of Robert Romer & Co., against William Wehner. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. M. Free and F. H. Bloomingdale, both of San Jose, and Courtney L. Moore, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Louis Oneal and Wm. F. James, both of San Jose, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for the breach of a contract for the sale of grapes and grape juice. The defendant answered and filed a cross-complaint seeking the recovery of damages from plaintiff for his breach of the same contract. In his amended complaint the plaintiff alleged:

> That "said defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff, and plaintiff agreed to buy, 200 tons of black grapes of the crop of 1919 * * * for the sum of $35.00 per ton, and also 25,000 gallons of unfermented black grape juice * * * for the price of 45 cents per gallon: that by the terms of said agreement all of said personalty was to be paid for when delivered. * * *
> "That plaintiff is, and has at all times been, ready, willing, and able to receive and pay for the said grapes and grape juice, according to said agreement, and to otherwise perform all of the terms of said agreement on his part to be done or performed. * * *
> "That said personal property so agreed to be sold, and remaining undelivered, if the same had been delivered according to said agreement, would be now, and when delivered, of the value to plaintiff of $21,706.01."

The execution of the agreement as alleged in the amended pleading was admitted by the defendant in his answer, but some of its terms were controverted, such as place of delivery of the grapes, color of the grape juice, and the time of payment for both the grapes and the grape juice. In the cross-complaint the defendant alleged:

> That the cross-plaintiff and cross-defendant "entered into an agreement whereby cross-plaintiff agreed to sell to said cross-defendant, and said cross-defendant agreed to purchase from cross-plaintiff, 200 tons of grapes of the crop of 1919, at the agreed price of $35 per ton and 25,000 gallons of grape juice at the agreed price of 45 cents per gallon; said cross-defendant to furnish and provide the boxes for delivery of said grapes, and the barrels for delivery of said grape juice, and said grape juice to be taken from a stock of grape juice which had theretofore been manufactured by cross-plaintiff, and which was then being stored by cross-plaintiff upon his premises."

It was further alleged that the parties expressly agreed that both the grapes and the grape juice were to be delivered in installments as harvested or prepared for delivery, and that payment therefor was to be made upon the delivery of each installment; that various installments of the grapes were delivered to the cross-defendant and accepted and paid for by him; but that cross-defendant, though often requested to do so, had failed and refused to pay for certain installments thereof, the agreed price of which amounted to $1,516.84. As a second cause for cross-complaint it was alleged that the cross-defendant, though often requested to do so, had failed to deliver to cross-plaintiff, any barrels for the shipment of the grape juice, and had refused to receive, accept, or pay for any of the grape juice, to the damage of the cross-plaintiff in the sum of $3,750.

[1] In the answer to this cross-complaint the plaintiff and cross-defendant "admits that said parties entered into an agreement whereby cross-plaintiff agreed to sell to cross-defendant, and cross-defendant agreed to purchase from cross-plaintiff, 200 tons of grapes of the crop of 1919 at the agreed price of $35 per ton, and 25,000 gallons of grape juice at the agreed price of 45 cents per gallon." By failing to deny, the cross-defendant admitted the allegation in the cross-complaint that by the terms of said agreement he was to furnish and provide the boxes for the delivery of said grapes and the barrels for the delivery of the grape juice. He did deny that said grape juice was to be taken from the stock theretofore manufactured by the cross-plaintiff and which had been stored upon his premises, and alleged that such grape juice was to be "unfermented black grape juice."

Upon the issues so framed the parties went to trial, and the trial court found that the parties executed an agreement whereby the plaintiff agreed to buy 200 tons of black grapes to be delivered by said defendant as said grapes were ripened, gathered, and harvested for the sum of $35 per ton, and that by the terms of said agreement all said personalty was to be paid for when delivered; that it was not true that at the time said agreement was made there was a general or uniform or recognized custom among producers in the locality where said agreement was to be performed that, when such products were to be delivered in installments, payment was to be made for each installment upon delivery thereof, but that the custom among such producers was that in such cases payment therefor was to be made after final and complete delivery; that there was no express agreement between these parties that each installment was to be paid for upon delivery thereof; and that the payments made by plaintiff were not made in accordance with the terms of the said contract, but were merely advancements made by plaintiff to defendant on account thereof. It was further found that there was never any contract or agreement between said parties for the sale of 25,000 gallons or any other quantity of grape juice; that there were negotiations between said parties tending to such a contract; but that because of their failure to agree upon the color and quality of such grape juice no contract was made between them. Deliveries under the contract were made of approximately 109 tons, and the damage suffered by the plaintiff for the failure to deliver the remaining 90 tons was found to be $2,273.34. As against this plaintiff had an offset of $1,426.84, the unpaid balance on the amount of grapes which had been delivered. Plaintiff was awarded a judgment for the difference, amounting to $846.50, and from this judgment defendant prosecutes the appeal.

The grounds of appeal urged by the appellant are: (1) That there is a fatal variance between the pleadings, findings, and proof, the parties having admitted and proved one contract, and the court having found an entirely different contract; (2) that the conclusion of the trial court that the appellant breached the contract is unsupported by the evidence.

[2] 1. The first point raised by appellant as to the variance between the pleadings, findings, and proof must be sustained and requires a reversal of the judgment. The pleadings were all framed upon the theory that one single contract was made involving the sale of grapes and grape juice. The evidence unmistakably proves that a single contract was made. The answer, the cross-complaint, and the answer to the cross-complaint all admitted this fact. The finding that a separate contract was made for the sale of the grapes alone was not within the issues and was not supported by the evidence. All the evidence went to prove that the arrangements for the sale of the grapes and the grape juice were all made at the same time, in the same conversation, and as a part of the same transaction; but, notwithstanding the evidence, the trial court was bound by the pleadings, and its finding of a separate contract must be disregarded. This is the unquestioned rule of a long line of decisions. In the first place, section 462, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "Every material allegation of the complaint, not controverted by the answer, must, for the purposes of the action, be taken as true."

In Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 468, 474, the Supreme Court said:

> "The finding should be confined to the facts in issue. The province of the court in respect to facts is to determine, but not to raise, the issue. It is insisted on the other side that it will be presumed the court found the fact in question from competent evidence. The answer is, it will not be presumed that evidence was introduced to contradict the admission of record."

In White v. Douglass, 71 Cal. 115, 119, 11 Pac. 860, 862, the Supreme Court said:

> "Where a complaint in an action contains an allegation of fact which is distinctly and unqualifiedly admitted by the answer, there is no issue as to the fact. The allegation of the fact being admitted is conclusive. A finding against the admission is therefore outside the issues, and a judgment based upon such a finding, or upon a finding, which is not justified by or is contrary to the evidence, cannot be sustained."

In the Matter of Doyle, 73 Cal. 564, 570, 571, 15 Pac. 125, 128, the same court said:

> "When a trial is had by the court without a jury, a fact admitted by the pleadings should be treated as 'found.' * * * If the court does find adversely to the admission, such finding should be disregarded in determining the question whether the proper conclusion of law was drawn from the facts found and admitted by the pleadings. * * * In such case the facts alleged must be assumed to exist. Any finding adverse to the admitted facts drops from the record, and any legal conclusion which is not upheld by the admitted facts is erroneous."

[3] The foregoing authorities were all cited with approval in Welch v. Alcott, 185 Cal. 731, 754, 198 Pac. 626, and it therefore may be taken as the settled rule in this state that, when the allegations in a pleading are admitted, a finding contrary to such admission is beyond the issues of the controversy and will not support a judgment. In this case, as has been said, the respondent up to the time of judgment was insisting upon an entire and indivisible contract for the sale of grapes and grape juice, and was demanding damages for the failure to deliver both. On the other hand, the appellant was conceding a contract for the sale of grapes and grape juice, but disputed respondent's claim regarding the color of the grape juice and other minor details of the contract, but both parties at all times treated the transaction as an entirety; and if, as found by the trial court, their minds did not meet on the grape juice, it is obvious that the contract which was pleaded was not proved.

[4] 2. As to the second point, little need be said. In the amended complaint it was alleged that by the terms of the agreement "all of said personalty was to be paid for when delivered." The trial court found that this allegation was true. Respondent himself testified that it was not true. There was no evidence to support the finding. The trial court also found that there was a general, uniform, and recognized custom among the producers in the locality where the agreement was to be performed that payment therefor was to be made after final and complete delivery. The only evidence on this issue was to the effect that when the producers came from the outside or that when the grapes were to be exported (both of which conditions applied to respondent's case), the uniform custom was that payment should be made either before delivery or upon delivery of each installment. There was therefore no evidence to support the finding of the trial court relating to the custom of payment. On the other hand, the allegation in the answer that it was the general, uniform, and recognized custom "that, where such products were to be delivered in installments, payment was to be made for each installment upon delivery thereof," finds support in the evidence and in the action of the parties. Proof was made that deliveries began on October 15, 1919, and continued until November 14th; that three payments were made, to wit, on October 25th, November 1st, and November 7th; that on November 1st respondent wrote to appellant asking him to send weight tags upon each delivery and added:

> "Then it won't even be necessary for you to make out a bill. We will mail the check on receipt of the weight tags."

Thereafter three other deliveries were made, the price of which the court found to be $1,426.84. Payment of this sum was demanded of the respondent, and he was notified that unless payment was made further deliveries would be refused. His only answer was the commencement of this action.

[5] When the agreement is silent as to time of payment, the law fixes it as of the time of delivery. Section 1784, Civ. Code. And where fruit or farm products are contracted to be delivered in installments as they ripen or are harvested, payment is due upon delivery of each installment unless otherwise fixed in the contract. FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] This is an action to recover damages for an alleged malicious prosecution of plaintiff by defendant, who, in an affidavit sworn to by him and filed in the justice's court of San Diego township, charged that plaintiff, in violation of section 476a of the Penal Code, willfully and with the intent to defraud defendant, drew and delivered to the latter his check on a San Diego bank, knowing that he had not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check upon its presentation. After his preliminary examination before the justice, plaintiff was discharged, and the criminal proceeding against him was dismissed upon the ground that there was no sufficient cause to believe him guilty. Thereafter plaintiff brought this action for alleged malicious prosecution. The case was tried by the court without a jury. The trial court found that defendant instituted the criminal proceeding against plaintiff without probable cause and with malice, and gave judgment for plaintiff accordingly. Defendant appeals from the judgment and likewise from an order denying him a new trial. The order denying a new trial is not appealable, and for that reason the attempted appeal therefrom must be dismissed.

[2, 3] In an action of this character the burden rests upon the plaintiff to prove want of probable cause, which has been defined to be "a suspicion founded upon circumstances sufficiently strong to warrant a reasonable man in the belief that the charge is true." Lee v. Levison, 173 Cal. 169, 159 Pac. 440. What facts, or whether particular facts, constitute probable cause is a question of law for the court. Davis v. Pacific Telephone, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 319, 57 Pac. 764, 59 Pac. 698. With these elementary principles in view we deem it unnecessary to go beyond an examination of the question of probable cause for the prosecution.

The evidence introduced by plaintiff discloses the following: Plaintiff, who had been employed as a chauffeur in the operation of automobiles on a stage route running out of San Diego, on May 29, 1921, at the city of San Diego, drew his check on a bank of that city for $109.70, and delivered it to defendant. The sum for which it was drawn was the amount due by plaintiff to defendant as the latter's share of the proceeds of the sale of certain tires which plaintiff had sold for defendant. At the time when the check was drawn, plaintiff was likewise indebted to defendant in about $400 for automobile accessories theretofore sold to him by defendant.

Defendant deposited the check in a bank at San Diego in which he kept his account. In due time that bank presented it to the drawee bank. Payment was refused by the latter institution, upon the ground that plaintiff did not have sufficient funds. On June 4, 1921, defendant's bank mailed him a written notice that plaintiff's check had been returned unpaid for lack of funds. A few days later defendant met plaintiff on the street in San Diego and informed the latter that his check had been returned for want of sufficient funds to pay it.

Plaintiff, testifying as a witness in his own behalf, upon being asked by his counsel what he did when defendant informed him that the bank had refused payment on the check, testified as follows:

> "When he [defendant] told me there was not enough money for the check I couldn't understand it. I thought there was something wrong, so I went up and checked over my account, and I saw I had made a $50 mistake in my check stubs, and he didn't put the check in, it was several days after I gave it to him, and there was only $60, or something like that, in the bank."

It will be noted that, while plaintiff said that he "could not understand it" and that he "thought" there was something wrong, he did not testify that he told defendant that he could not understand why the check was returned or that he told defendant that he thought something was wrong. Nowhere in his testimony does he say that he ever informed defendant of the mistake which he claimed to have made in his figures on the check stubs. When he was met on the street by defendant and told that the check had been returned for lack of sufficient funds to meet it, a situation presented itself which called for candor and frankness on plaintiff's part. If he did indeed make an error in his calculations, as he claimed that he had, it would be but natural for him to explain the matter fully to defendant at the first opportunity after his examination of his check stubs. If a mistake had been made, and if plaintiff did in fact draw the check in ignorance of the exact state of his checking account, defendant, who met plaintiff often during the ensuing six weeks, might well have expected that he would be given some sort of a satisfactory explanation by plaintiff. But no explanation was offered. At any rate there is no evidence that any ever was given. Plaintiff simply testified that, when informed by defendant that the bank had refused to pay the check, he "thought" there was something wrong, and that he later discovered how he had made the mistake. The record is barren of any fact from which it might be inferred that he ever explained the matter to defendant before the latter instituted the criminal prosecution.

A week or so after the return of the check unpaid, the debt evidenced by that instrument still remaining unsatisfied and plaintiff still being indebted for the other sums which were due to defendant for automobile accessories previously sold by the latter to plaintiff, the two entered into an agreement whereby two automobiles which had been operated by plaintiff on a stage line running out of San Diego were turned over to defendant, with the understanding that the former would continue to drive one of his automobiles and that all of the net profits arising out of the operation of the two cars should be applied on plaintiff's total indebtedness to defendant—including the $109.70 for which the check had been drawn. The automobiles were incumbered with liens to secure debts due third parties.

The arrangement whereby plaintiff thus undertook to "work out" his indebtedness to defendant continued for about a month, when, without previous notice to defendant, plaintiff left San Diego and went to Taft, in Kern county, to seek employment there. According to plaintiff's testimony, which on this appeal must be accepted as true, he mailed a letter to defendant about three days after leaving San Diego. He testified that he mailed it at San Bernardino while on his way to Taft, and that in it he notified defendant of his departure. Defendant testified that he never received the letter.

When plaintiff left for Taft the amount of the check and a considerable part, if not all, of his orginal indebtedness to defendant remained unpaid. Plaintiff took with him one of the two automobiles which he previously had delivered to defendant under the arrangement whereby he had agreed to "work out" his indebtedness.

On July 19, 1921, which was shortly after learning that plaintiff had left San Diego and gone to Taft, defendant called upon the district attorney of San Diego county and narrated all of the facts connected with the giving of the check, but he failed to tell about the subsequent arrangement which he had entered into with plaintiff to enable the latter to "work out" his indebtedness. Upon the strength of the facts thus related to him, the district attorney advised defendant that there was probable cause for plaintiff's prosecution, and thereupon the criminal proceeding was inaugurated, resulting finally in plaintiff's discharge, as already mentioned.

[4] Upon these facts, unexplained, it is manifest that appellant did have probable cause for the prosecution. The facts and circumstances of which he had knowledge were such as would naturally excite the belief in a reasonable mind that respondent had committed the crime denounced by section 476a of the Penal Code—that is, that respondent gave the check knowing that he had not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet it in full upon its presentation, and that he gave it with the intent to defraud appellant.

Not only was the check returned unpaid for want of funds, but it never was paid, although some days elapsed between the time when appellant notified respondent of the return of the check unpaid and the time when the parties entered into the arrangement whereby respondent was to "work out" his obligation. This fact, unexplained, was sufficient to arouse in the mind of a reasonable man the belief that there were not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check upon its presentation. And the fact that respondent never vouchsafed any explanation for the lack of sufficient funds in the bank—the fact that he never told appellant how it was that he made a miscalculation in his check stubs—although the situation was one which would naturally call for an explanation, if any there were, warranted a reasonable man in believing that, when respondent gave the check, he knew that he had not sufficient funds in the bank to meet it. And if respondent gave the check knowing that he had not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank, the inference was but natural that he drew it and gave it to appellant with the intent to defraud the latter. People v. Kawano, 38 Cal. App. 612, 177 Pac. 174. Moreover, respondent's subsequent behavior, his surreptitious departure from San Diego, for example, was such as naturally would tend to strengthen the belief that he was a man who could not be trusted—a man who might give a check fraudulently, knowing that there were not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet it when presented.

From certain remarks made by the learned judge of the court below during the course of the trial, we opine that the case was decided in that court upon the theory that the subsequent arrangement, whereby respondent undertook to "work out" all of his indebtedness to appellant, amounted to a settlement and satisfaction of the debt for which the check had been drawn and that for that reason respondent's crime, if he was guilty of any public offense, had been extinguished, and he no longer was subject to prosecution. There is no valid basis for any such theory.

The record is barren of any fact tending to show that appellant ever agreed not to prosecute respondent. Had such an agreement been made, it would have constituted the compounding of a felony—a crime denounced by the Penal Code. The crime defined by section 476a is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison. It is true that it also is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail. But when a crime is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or by imprisonment in the county jail, in the discretion of the court, it must be deemed to be a felony for all purposes until after a judgment imposing a punishment by imprisonment in the county jail. Pen. Code, § 17; People v. War, 20 Cal. 117. A felony may not be compromised by leave of court. Pen. Code, §§ 1377–1379. Every person who, for a consideration, agrees to abstain from the prosecution of a crime which may not be compromised by leave of court is guilty of compounding a crime. Pen. Code, § 153. There is no direct evidence that appellant ever agreed not to prosecute respondent; and, since appellant would have been guilty of compounding a crime had he made any such agreement for a consideration, the presumption of innocence compels the rejection of any ill-founded inference that there ever was an agreement not to prosecute.

A compromise arrangement, entered into solely for the purpose of enabling a creditor ultimately to recover the money due to him from his criminal debtor, will not suffice, of itself, to bar a criminal prosecution or furnish evidence of a want of probable cause. Appellant had the legal right to the money evidenced by the check. Having such right, he had the legal right to make such arrangement for the payment of the debt as the parties might voluntarily agree to, provided, of course, there was no attempt at the compounding of a felony.

> "The defendant," said the New York Court of Appeals in Fagnan v. Knox, 66 N. Y. 532, "had a legal right to settle with the plaintiff, and receive payment for the amount abstracted as and for a debt upon an implied contract, and such settlement was no bar to a criminal prosecution, nor did it furnish evidence that the defendant did not believe that the money had been embezzled. The mere fact of settlement had no legitimate bearing on that question, certainly not against the defendant, and was equally consistent with a belief of guilt or innocence."

The Michigan Supreme Court states the rule thus:

> "When a plaintiff is shown to have taken and appropriated to his own use property belonging to his employer, proof of an attempt by the defendant to settle the matter and obtain his own does not of itself tend to show a want of criminal intent upon the part of such plaintiff, or belief in his innocence upon the part of the defendant." Harris v. Woodford, 98 Mich. 147, 57 N. W. 96.

See, also, Rankin v. Crane, 104 Mich. 6, 61 N. W. 1007.

The showing made by respondent at the trial in the court below failed to disclose a want of probable cause for his prosecution.

The appeal from the order denying a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is reversed.

Opinion in Case No. 3714.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1, 2] This is an action to recover moneys which plaintiff had paid to defendant as part of the agreed purchase price under a written contract of sale whereby defendant had agreed to convey and plaintiff had agreed to purchase a certain parcel of land in Los Angeles county. Subsequent to the contract and to the payment of the moneys sought to be recovered, a condemnation action was commenced by the Los Angeles flood control district to condemn the land for flood control purposes. In its contract to convey defendant covenanted to deliver to plaintiff, upon payment of the agreed purchase price, "a good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale to said property, and also a certificate of title, showing title to the same vested in the grantor or grantors in said deed." This covenant calls for a good title to the land, unincumbered and free from defect. Haynes v. White, 55 Cal. 38; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 314, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123. The pendency of the condemnation action is an incumbrance upon the title. Block v. Citizens' Trust, etc., Bank (Cal. App.) 207 Pac. 510. Subsequent to the commencement of the condemnation suit and prior to bringing this action, plaintiff rescinded his contract to purchase upon the ground that defendant, by reason of the condemnation suit, could not give the title which it had obligated itself to convey. He likewise demanded repayment of the moneys already paid by him on the purchase price. Defendant refused to repay; hence this action. Plaintiff recovered judgment in the court below, and defendant appeals.

[3] An executory contract to convey has the effect of vesting the equitable estate in the vendee, leaving in the vendor the naked legal title. As the equitable owner of the land, the vendee is entitled to any award which may be made on condemnation of the property. Wherefore appellant contends that respondent can look to the flood control district for compensation, that the money he thus is entitled to receive from that source will stand in lieu of the real property which appellant covenanted to convey to him, and that therefore there was no warrant for the rescission of the contract. The contention lacks merit. The fact that upon the execution of the contract respondent became the equitable owner of the property, and as such would be entitled to any award which might be made on condemnation of the land did not deprive him of the benefit of appellant's covenant to convey to him the legal title to the land clear of all incumbrances. The equitable ownership of a vendee under an executory contract neither satisfies nor releases his vendor's covenant to convey to him the legal title free from incumbrance. The covenant refers to title to land, not title to personal property. Therefore if, by reason of a subsequently commenced condemnation suit, the vendor, at the time when he should execute the deed, is not able to give that title to the land which he covenanted to grant, his vendee may rescind the executory contract and sue for the return of any purchase money which may have been paid by him before the condemnation suit was instituted. Kares v. Covell, 180 Mass. 206, 62 N. E. 244, 91 Am. St. Rep. 271. Nixon v. Marr, 190 Fed. 913, 111 C. C. A. 503, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1067, is not in point. There the vendee did not rescind. He sought to recover damages. For that reason the prevailing opinion differentiates that case from Kares v. Covell, supra. For the same reason it may be differentiated from the present case.

Appellant claims that the commencement of the condemnation action excused it from performing its contract to convey an unincumbered title to the land. Even so, appellant is not entitled to retain moneys which it accepted as the consideration for that good and unincumbered title which it expressly obligated itself to convey.

Opinion in Cases Nos. 3713 and 3715.

PER CURIAM. The facts are substantially the same as those involved in Hunt v Inner Harbor Co., Civil No. 3714, this day decided. For the reasons stated in the opinion in that case, the judgment in this case is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [4, 5] The petitions for transfer to this court are denied upon the ground that it appears from the judgment roll that the property has actually been condemned by the Los Angeles County flood control district by judgment entered September 22, 1920; that possession of the property was taken May 15, 1919, and presumably the defendant has received full compensation for the property; and for the further reason that the defendant by its answer herein concedes its inability to comply with the contract and alleges that the contract is at an end, and this, in effect, is a consent to the rescission of the contract by the plaintiffs.

The applications for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 2, are denied.

RADICH v. GAK. (Civ. 2577.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹1012(2)—Finding of trial court, if supported by testimony of one witness, may not be disturbed.

Appellate courts cannot interfere with the finding of the trial court, if it is supported by the testimony of one witness, unless such testimony is inherently improbable, the only exception being in a criminal case of perjury or of treason wherein the testimony of two witnesses or of one witness and corroborating circumstances must be shown, under Code of Civ. Proc. § 1844.

2. Money lent ⟹7(3)—Evidence held to support finding defendant became indebted to plaintiff for money loaned.

Evidence, in an action to recover money lent, held to support finding that defendant became indebted to plaintiff on account of loans made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by John Radich against Mike Gak. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Peter J. Wilkie and Donald McKisick, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Evan J. Hughes, of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] The action was brought to recover the sum of $560, the balance due, according to the claim of plaintiff, on the loan of $810 which he had made to defendant. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $560, and the appeal is from said judgment. The only point made is that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court "that, at various times between the 1st day of January, 1920, and the 1st day of April, 1920, the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $810 on account loaned by the plaintiff to the defendant." Strange to say, however, appellant admits that, as to this material finding, there is a conflict in the evidence. Appellant seems to be of the opinion that this court must hold that it was necessary for the testimony of the plaintiff to be corroborated in order to justify the finding. Of course such contention is utterly untenable. The proposition is so elementary and well established that appellate courts cannot interfere with the finding of the trial court if it is supported by the testimony of one witness unless such testimony appears inherently improbable that the citation of authority is not needed. The only exception to the rule, manifestly, is in the criminal case of perjury and of treason, wherein the testimony of two witnesses or of one witness and corroborating circumstances must be shown. Section 1844, Code Civ. Proc.

[2] To show that the testimony of plaintiff is abundantly sufficient to support the said finding of the trial court, we may quote from his testimony, shown by the record, as follows:

"That he (witness) and his brother, Nick, and his uncle, Jos. Widowich, were partners, and had rented a ranch, near Mather Field, in the county of Sacramento, state of California. That some time in the month of January, 1920, the defendant, Mike Gak, came to witness, in the said county of Sacramento, and that said Gak stated to witness that he (Gak) was without funds, that he had been in trouble in the state of Oregon, and that he had been compelled to leave there. That he (Gak) had requested witness to permit him (said Gak) to come onto the ranch of witness, and stay with witness, until he (Gak) could find something to do, and that when he got work he would then pay witness for his board and lodgings. Plaintiff and defendant are Slavonians, and had known each other before coming to the United States. That witness granted defendant's request, and let defendant stay and board with witness. That upon various occasions, between the latter part of January, 1920, and the 1st day of April, 1920, witness loaned to said defendant various sums of money; the dates and amounts of each being specified by witness, the whole of said loans amounting to $810.00, and which sums, witness testified, defendant had personally received from witness. That the largest of said loans, so made, was as follows: On or about the 5th day of March, 1920, in the house, on the aforesaid ranch, in the presence of 'Nick Radich.' Defendant had requested that witness loan to him (said Gak) the sum of $500; said Gak explaining to witness, that he (Gak) wanted to purchase an automobile with which to start in business; whereupon witness asked 'Nick Radich,' his brother, and partner, to get said sum of $500. That while witness and defendant remained in the house, Nick Radich procured said sum of $500 from a can, which was hidden in the barn, and gave said money to witness. That witness then gave to said Gak the sum of $500, and loaned said sum to said defendant at the request of said defendant. That no payments have been made on said loans, except the sum of $250."

We may add that there was even corroboration of this by plaintiff's brother, and the testimony of defendant to the contrary was greatly discredited by his cross-examination.

The case involving not the least shadow of a disputable proposition should never have been appealed.

The judgment is affirmed.

MONAHAN v. WATSON et al. (Civ. 4029.)

1. Fraud 🔑35—Waived by maker's asking extension of note.

Where defendant, maker of note, after discovering all the particulars of plaintiff payee's alleged fraud, requested an extension of the note and induced the attorney for plaintiff to refrain from carrying out his instructions to collect the note as soon as it fell due, defendant thereby waived the alleged fraud.

2. Evidence 🔑441(9)—Contract of sale not to be varied by parol warranty.

A written contract of sale could not be varied by evidence of a parol express warranty.

3. Sales 🔑270—No implied warrant of merchantability where buyer assisted in inventorying goods.

Civ. Code, § 1771, as to implied warranty of merchantability of merchandise inaccessible to buyer's examination, cannot apply to a case where buyer assisted in taking an inventory of the goods.

4. Bills and notes 🔑443(2)—Payee held proper party plaintiff.

The payee of a note, in possession thereof, is presumed to own it, although indorsed by him to another, and in his suit thereon his title cannot be inquired into except for defendant's protection or to let in a defense which he seeks to make; so that, where the only defense made is one available only as against the payee, the contention that the payee is not the real party in interest is without merit.

5. Bills and notes 🔑56, 489(3)—Delay in affixing revenue stamps to notes held no defense.

In an action by payee of a note against makers thereof, delay in affixing revenue stamps to the note was not an available defense where not pleaded by defendant; and, in any event, the note, even if not regularly stamped, was not void, as Congress is without power to legislate concerning rules of evidence administered in state courts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by J. J. Monahan against Jessie F. Watson and G. Mitchell Hopkins. From judgment for plaintiff, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. W. Fourl, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton K. Young, Lyndol L. Young, William K. Young, and Forrest F. Murray, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action on a promissory note executed by both defendants to plaintiff as the payee. The defendant Watson was not served with summons and did not appear. The defendant Hopkins filed an answer and a cross-complaint wherein he alleged that the note, which had been given for a part of the purchase price of certain personal property in the city of Los Angeles purchased by defendants from plaintiff, was procured by fraud in that plaintiff made certain alleged false and fraudulent representations respecting the property. Hopkins claimed to have been damaged in the sum of $20,000 by reason of the alleged fraud. The action was tried before a jury. Plaintiff recovered a verdict, and from the judgment entered thereon the defendant Hopkins appeals.

Appellant urges as grounds for reversal: (1) That the court erroneously excluded certain evidence which it is claimed would have established not alone the alleged false and fraudulent representations, but also certain express warranties; (2) that the evidence shows that plaintiff was not the owner or holder of the note; and (3) that all of the requisite United States revenue stamps were not placed on the note at the date of its execution, and that therefore that instrument was void and should not have been admitted in evidence.

Upon the uncontradicted testimony of one of respondent's witnesses the trial court held that appellant had waived the fraud alleged by him as a defense in his answer and as a cause of cross-action in his cross-complaint. Because of such waiver the trial court excluded all evidence offered by appellant to prove his averments of deceit. In this there was no reversible error. It seems that respondent, who resided in the east, had instructed his attorney at Los Angeles to collect the note as soon as it fell due. Some three or four days before the maturity of that instrument, appellant called upon respondent's attorney and requested him to telegraph to his client for an extension of 30 days within which to pay the note. When making this request for an extension of time, appellant told respondent's attorney that the stock of goods which had been sold to defendants, and for which the note had been given, would remain where it then was and thus could be readily levied upon in the event that any action should be brought on the note and a writ of attachment issued. In acceding to appellant's request the attorney told him that in view of the former's statement that the goods would be allowed to remain where they were he would wire his client for the requested extension. Thereupon the attorney wrote or telegraphed to his client advising him of appellant's request. Some days later he received a telegram in reply notifying him that if appellant would pay one-half of the amount due on the note the requested extension would be granted as to the balance. Upon receipt of his client's telegram the attorney communicated its contents to appellant. In the meantime the attorney, upon his own responsibility, had personally extended the due date of the note. This he did upon the strength of appellant's assurance that the stock of goods would remain where it was and thus be subject to attachment in the event that it should be necessary to bring suit on the note. Appellant not only did not accept respondent's counter proposal to pay one-half of the note as a condition to any further extension of time, but, shortly after being informed of the latter's telegraphic reply to his request for an extension, sold his entire stock of goods, thus making it impossible for respondent to attach it.

[1] Appellant's conduct was a waiver of any fraud of which respondent may have been guilty when he sold the personal property to defendants. From the averments of the answer and cross-complaint it is evident that at the time when appellant requested the extension of time and induced respondent's attorney to refrain from carrying out his instructions to collect the note as soon as it fell due, appellant had discovered all the particulars of the alleged fraud. This brings the case fairly within the rule announced in Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 267, 48 Pac. 54, where it was said that, after discovering the deceit, the party defrauded "must stand toward the other party at arm's length; he must comply with the terms of the contract on his part, must not ask favors of the other party, or offer to perform the contract on conditions which he has no right to exact, and must not make any new agreement or engagement respecting it; otherwise he waives the alleged fraud." To the same effect is Tucker v. Beneke, 180 Cal. 588, 594–595, 182 Pac. 299. Having waived the deceit, if any there was, appellant is not in a position to complain that the trial court took the issue of fraud from the jury and refused to allow him to introduce evidence in support of his averments of misrepresentation.

[2] There is no merit in appellant's claim that the representations which are set up in his pleadings constituted warranties which it was permissible to prove by parol. The contract of sale was reduced to writing. It was not competent, therefore, to show any express warranty by parol evidence. No rule is better settled than that where there is a complete written contract, oral representations or warranties, and implied warranties, and all oral negotiations, are merged in the written contract, and by its terms the parties must be bound. Kullman, etc., Co. v. Sugar, etc., Co., 163 Cal. 725, 731–732, 96 Pac. 369, and authorities there cited.

[3] Nor can we perceive that appellant's position is bettered by the invocation of the sections of the Civil Code respecting implied warranties. Section 1767 is to the effect merely that one who sells personal property, knowing that the buyer relies upon his advice or judgment, warrants to the buyer that the seller does not know of the existence of any fact concerning the thing sold which would to his knowledge destroy the buyer's inducement to buy. No pleading touches this section of the Code. Section 1771 is to the effect that one who sells or agrees to sell merchandise inaccessible to the examination of the buyer thereby warrants it sound and merchantable—a provision which by no possibility can be held applicable to the case at bar, since appellant assisted in taking an inventory of the goods which were the subject of the sale.

[4] There is no merit in the point that the action was not brought by the real party in interest. Respondent, the payee of the note, was a trustee under a written declaration of trust in which two corporations were named as the beneficiaries. One of these was the Standard Tire Company. The property for which the note was given was sold by respondent under his authority as such trustee, and the note was made payable to him as trustee. The following indorsement appears on the note: "For deposit to the account of the Standard Tire Company. J. J. Monahan, Trustee." Wherefore it is claimed that the evidence shows that, when the action was brought, the Standard Tire Company, and not respondent, was the real party in interest. The note was sent by mail to the attorney who brought the action. He was the attorney of J. J. Monahan, in whose name, as trustee, the action was brought. It matters not whether the note was mailed to the attorney by his client or by the Standard Tire Company. In either event, the attorney's possession was his client's possession. And the payee's possession overcame any inference which might have been drawn from the indorsement on the note. The payee of a promissory note, in possession of the same, is presumed to own it, although his indorsement thereon, in full or in blank, may stand uncanceled. He may sue upon such note, and his title to the same cannot be inquired into unless it be necessary for the protection of the defendant or to let in a defense which he seeks to make. Bomar v. Equitable Mortgage Co., 111 Ga.

143, 36 S. E. 601. Here the only defense pleaded was one which, if available at all, could be set up to defeat an action brought by the payee.

[5] The note was dated July 17, 1920. It is claimed that it bears evidence on its face that one of the stamps required by the United States revenue law was not affixed until July 28, 1920. Wherefore it is urged that the instrument is void. Appellant's pleadings do not present any issue respecting the validity of the note on account of delay in affixing the stamps. He is therefore is no position to take advantage of any dereliction in stamping the instrument. Oviatt v. Wojcicky, 95 Conn. 562, 111 Atl. 837. Moreover, while Congress may lay an excise tax upon business operations and may collect such tax by means of stamps, and to enforce observance of the law may provide penalties for its nonobservance, it is without power to legislate concerning the rules of evidence administered in the state courts. Duffy v. Hobson, 40 Cal. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 617; Thomasson v. Wood, 42 Cal. 416. The note, even if not regularly stamped, was not void. Moore v. Moore, 47 N. Y. 467; Thomas v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 562, 51 S. W. 242, 46 L. R. A. 454, 76 Am. St. Rep. 740.

PEOPLE v. FRENCH. (Cr. 679.)

1. Escape 🔑1—Prisoner held "committed" to prison to which he was transferred.

Where one sentenced to imprisonment in particular state prison was transferred to another prison, and was a prisoner therein prior to being taken to a road camp, from which he escaped, he was "committed" to the second prison within Pen. Code, § 106, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Committed.]

2. Criminal law 🔑806(1)—Court not required to repeat instructions substantially given.

On a trial for escape, the court was not required to repeat an instruction as to necessity of intent to escape when once substantially given.

3. Statutes 🔑118(6)—Provision as to escape held within title of amendatory act, referring to attempts to escape.

Pen. Code, § 106, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77, so far as it applies to escapes, is not unconstitutional as not within the title of the amendatory act, which recites that it is an act to amend such section "relating to attempts of prisoners to escape."

4. Statutes 🔑105(1)—Constitutional provision as to titles to be construed liberally and not to embarrass legislation by construction which is unnecessary.

The constitutional provision relative to the titles of acts is intended to guard against the passage of bills, the titles of which give no intimation of their contents, and is to be construed liberally, rather than to embarrass legislation by construction, which is unnecessary to its beneficial purposes.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

L. B. French was convicted of escaping from prison guards, and he appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. Affirmed.

Charles A. Bliss, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. While a prisoner in the state prison at Folsom, the defendant was taken out to work under guard on a highway in Trinity county. The information charges him with the crime of escaping from the surviellance of his guards in that county. He was duly convicted of the crime charged, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment of conviction and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

On his arraignment the defendant entered a plea of not guilty. Thereafter he moved the court for permission to withdraw his plea in order to interpose a demurrer to the information. The motion was denied. After conviction, the defendant's motion in arrest of judgment was denied. These rulings need not be specifically considered because the questions of law involved are the same as those raised by other contentions hereinafter noticed.

[1] It is contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict, in that, while the defendant was committed to the state prison at San Quentin, he was taken from the prison at Folsom to the road camp in Trinity county. The defendant was sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison of the state of California, and the sheriff was directed, as the law requires, to deliver the prisoner to the warden of the state prison at San Quentin. When thereafter the defendant was transferred to Folsom prison he was committed to that prison in the sense in which the word "committed" is used in section 106 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77, under which he was charged. The evidence shows that the defendant was a prisoner in Folsom prison at and prior to the time he was taken therefrom to the road camp. That fact is sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute.

[2] Complaint is made of the court's refusal to instruct the jury that, if the defendant believed he had permission to leave camp and, so believing, went and remained beyond the limits thereof he is not guilty of escape, unless, at the time of leaving or while away, he had or formed the intention of escaping, and that such intention must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. At defendant's request, the court instructed the jury that—

> "Before you can find the defendant guilty in this case, you must be satisfied in your own mind, beyond all reasonable doubt, that he intended to escape from confinement, and you are further instructed that, even though the defendant might have gone beyond the limits of the road camp, he is not guilty of escape unless he went or remained away with the intent to escape."

A court is not required to repeat an instruction which has been once given.

[3, 4] It is contended that section 106 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1921, is unconstitutional in that the provision of the act making it a crime to escape is not embraced within the title, "relating to attempt of prisoners to escape." The amending act reads as follows:

> "An act to amend section one hundred six of the Penal Code, relating to attempt of prisoners to escape.
> "The people of the state of California do enact as follows:
> "Section 1. Section one hundred six of the Penal Code is hereby amended.
> "106. Every prisoner committed to a state prison for a term less than for life, who escapes or attempts to escape while being conveyed to or from or while confined within such prison or while at work outside such prison under the surveillance of prison guards is guilty of a felony and on conviction thereof the term of imprisonment therefor shall commence from the time such convict would otherwise have been discharged from said prison."

Sections 105 and 106 of the Penal Code were amended in the year 1880 by a single act (St. 1880, p. 42) entitled: "An act to amend sections one hundred and five and one hundred and six of the Penal Code, relating to escapes and attempts to escape from state prison." "An act to amend section 106 of the Penal Code" would have been a sufficient title for the amendment of 1921. Had such title been adopted, the subject of the act of 1921 would be ascertained by reference to the act of 1880, the title of which embraced both escapes and attempts to escape. In discussing a similar question it was said:

> "Under the decision of this court, the title of the act would have been sufficient if it had read simply: 'An act to amend section 61 of the Civil Code.' * * * The addition of further descriptive words cannot vitiate this sufficient title, unless such further words indicate a subject not really related to the matters covered by the body of the bill." Estate of Elliott, 165 Cal. 339, 345, 132 Pac. 439, 441.

It would hardly be contended that the crimes of escaping and attempting to escape might not properly be included in a single act, under an appropriate title, or that both might not be included in an act under a title "relating to escapes." No reason suggests itself why both may not be included under a title "relating to attempts to escape." The constitutional provision is intended—> "to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which give no intimation to the members of the Legislature or to the people of the matters contained therein." Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 636, 29 Pac. 251, 252.

It is to be construed—

> "liberally, rather than to embarrass legislation by a construction which is unnecessary to the accomplishment of the beneficial purposes for which the provision was adopted." Beach v. Von Detten, 139 Cal. 462, 465, 73 Pac. 187, 188.
> "Where the title suggests to the mind the field of legislation which the text of the act includes, the title will not be held misleading or insufficient, or the act restricted in its operation." People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 394, 156 Pac. 451, 453.
> "The objections should be grave, and the conflict between the statute and the Constitution palpable, before the judiciary should disregard a legislative enactment." Inhabitants, etc., of Montclair v. Ramsdell, 107 U. S. 147, 2 Sup. Ct. 391, 27 L. Ed. 431.
> "It is not essential that the best or even an accurate title be employed, if it be suggestive in any sense of the legislative purpose. The remedy to be secured and mischief avoided is the best test of a sufficient title which is to prevent it from being made a cloak or artifice to distract attention from the substance of the act." State v. Board of Control, 85 Minn. 165, 88 N. W. 533.

See, also, Ex parte Wilson, 85 Tex. Cr. R. 554, 213 S. W. 984; Burton v. Commonwealth, 122 Va. 847, 94 S. E. 923.

PEOPLE v. LEWIS. (Cr. 676.)

1. Escape 🔑1—Statute does not use "surveillance" as meaning close watch on one not in custody.

Pen. Code, § 106, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77, making it a felony for prisoner at work outside prison, under "surveillance" of prison guards, to escape, does not use "surveillance" as meaning oversight or close watch of one not in custody.

2. Indictment and information 🔑110(14)—Information for escape in language of statute held sufficient; "surveillance."

Information charging in language of Pen. Code, § 106, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77, that defendant, while at work outside prison under surveillance of prison guards, escaped from such surveillance, did not use "surveillance" as meaning oversight or close watch of one not in custody, and was sufficient.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Henry Lewis was convicted of the crime of escape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. V. Cowan, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. The information in this case charges that the defendant was—

"a prisoner lawfully committed to the state prison, and as such lawfully confined in the state prison at Folsom, county of Sacramento, * * * for a term less than life; and the said Henry Lewis, while at work outside such prison under the surveillance of prison guards, to wit, in the county of Trinity did then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously escape from the surveillance of said prison guards."

The defendant was duly convicted, and he prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

[1, 2] It is contended that the information does not state a public offense. It is argued that to escape from the surveillance of the guards is not the equivalent of escaping from the custody of the guards; that the word "surveillance" means "oversight or close watch"; that "frequently a suspected criminal is under surveillance without being in custody or even detained or deprived of his liberty." It is very plain that the word is not used in such limited sense either in section 106 of the Penal Code, as amended by St. 1921, p. 77, or in the information. The lexicographer's definition of a word must yield to the plain meaning of the word as gathered from the context of the statute in which it is used. The information follows the language of the statute, and must be held sufficient.

It is urged that section 106 is unconstitutional on the grounds considered in the case of People v. French (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 1003, this day decided. On the authority of that case the objection to the validity of the statute is held untenable.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PIMENTEL. (Cr. 677.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Frank Pimentel was convicted of escaping from prison guards, and he appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Wahrhaftig, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. While a prisoner in the state prison, the defendant was taken outside thereof to work. He was convicted of the crime of escaping from the surveillance of his guards while so outside. The defendant gave notice of appeal from the judgment of conviction, but no brief has been filed in his behalf nor was any appearance made for him at the time set for oral argument. No error appears in the record. The information is substantially the same as those in the cases of People v. French (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 1003, and People v. Lewis (Cal. FLAGLER v. KROONEN et al. (Civ. 2568.)

1. Vendor and purchaser 🔑78—Time held not of essence of contract.

Time held not of the essence of a contract providing that vendors should perfect their title within a year, but that, if they failed, the time for making deferred payments might be extended for another year at vendee's option, notwithstanding a provision for recovery of the amounts paid by vendee if vendors failed to perfect title "as above stated."

2. Contracts 🔑211—Intent to make time of essence must be clearly shown.

To make time of the essence of an obligation, it need not be declared so in the words of the statute, but such intent must be clearly, unequivocally, and unmistakably shown.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑143—Purchaser held to have waived vendor's failure to perfect title in time allowed.

A purchaser having an option to extend the time for making deferred payments if vendors failed to perfect their title within a certain time held to have waived vendors' default by not declaring his intention to take advantage thereof for over a year, with knowledge that vendors, believing that he intended to take the property, were refusing to negotiate with others for the sale thereof.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑335—Purchaser in default cannot recover money paid on vendors' subsequent default.

A purchaser in default in payment of interest on deferred payments and making no offer to pay cannot recover money paid on the purchase price, on vendors' subsequent failure to perfect their title within the time set.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by John H. Flagler against Leo Kroonen and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Milton K. Young and Frank L. Stobbs, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Carnahan & Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The parties entered into a contract dated June 16, 1916, by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendants an undivided two-thirds interest in certain mining claims, consisting of clay beds, for $33,333.32, $3,000 cash on execution of the contract, $2,000 six months from date thereof, and installments of $7,083.33 a year until the whole purchase price was paid, the first of such installments to be paid one year after the date of the contract, "deferred payments to draw interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, interest payable semiannually." The contract contained the following:

"Provided, however, that said first parties (defendants) shall proceed with due diligence to perfect and acquire title to all of the above-described property from the United States government and obtain patent thereof, or acquire title to that portion of said property located in section 9 from the Southern Pacific Railway Company, all to be acquired within one year from date hereof, and all to be done at the sole expense of said first parties except as otherwise herein provided.

"In case said first parties shall fail to perfect or acquire title to said property within one year from date hereof, then at the option of second party, the time of the said deferred payments * * * may each be extended one year from the time they become due as hereinbefore stated, and the deferred payments * * * shall not draw interest for the length of time said first parties have been unable to procure and perfect title beyond the year above given, but said deferred payments * * * shall draw interest in such case from the time said first parties perfect and acquire title to said property as herein provided. And in case said first parties shall fail to perfect and acquire title as herein provided, then * * * said second party shall be released from all obligations in law or equity to pay said indebtedness, * * * or any portion thereof.

"The perfection of said title as aforesaid shall be evidenced by the certificate of Geo. R. Freeman, attorney at law, of Corona, California, stating that the title to said property is free and clear of incumbrances and free from any defect, in the name of Leo Kroonen, before the first payment of $7,083.33 is made by said second party.

"In the event of the failure of the said first parties to perfect title as above stated, then the amount paid by said second party shall be repaid by first parties to said second party * * * and this contract shall be at an end.

"And the said parties of the first part on receiving such payments aforesaid * * * agree * * * to execute and deliver to said second party, or assigns, a good and sufficient deed * * * and furnish and deliver to second party an abstract of title or a certificate of title (at the option of the second party) from a reliable abstract company, * * * said title to be passed upon and certified to by said Geo. R. Freeman as aforesaid.

"It is agreed between the parties hereto that from and after the date of this instrument all expense for obtaining patent of said mines from the United States government and development work that shall be done upon said > mines, or either of them, shall be done at the expense of the parties hereto in the following proportions, to wit: Said first parties one-third of said expense, and second party two-thirds of such expense. * * *

> "It is mutually agreed that the parties hereto may do such development work upon said mines from time to time as they may mutually agree upon."

Plaintiff paid the sum of $3,000 on the execution of the contract and $2,000 in the month of January, 1917. The court gave judgment in favor of plaintiff for the recovery of the $5,000 so paid by him on the ground that defendants had not perfected title within one year after the date of the contract. From this judgment the defendants appeal.

At the time the contract was executed the plaintiff knew that Kroonen's right to a patent was being contested; that the local land office had decided the contest in favor of Kroonen; that the general land office had affirmed the decision; and that the contestant had appealed to the Secretary of the Interior, and within a few weeks after the execution of the contract plaintiff was notified by his attorney that the Secretary of the Interior had affirmed the decision. June 9, 1917, the local land office issued to Kroonen its final receipt for the purchase price of the property described in the contract. On account of an error on the part of the local land office in allowing a homestead entry to overlap on one of Kroonen's claims, and which was not cleared up until some time prior to September 22, 1917, Kroonen's patent was not issued until December 10, 1917. Plaintiff failed to make the first deferred payment of $2,000 when it became due, but paid the same in the following January. He failed at any time, however, to pay interest on the $2,000 as provided in the contract, although Kroonen requested him to pay it at the time the $2,000 was paid. Neither did the plaintiff make payment at any time of the interest which fell due December 16, 1916, on the other deferred installments. At different times after the patent was issued Kroonen requested payment of two-thirds of the moneys expended by him in obtaining the patent and developing the property as well as other sums due under the terms of the contract. While such payments were not made as requested, the plaintiff at no time prior to November 29, 1918, intimated to Kroonen that he did not intend to complete the purchase or that he would make the claim that Kroonen was in default in failing to perfect title within the time provided in the contract. On the contrary, the letters passing between plaintiff and his attorney indicate a purpose to conceal from Kroonen the knowledge that any such course was even contemplated. Such letters further indicate that plaintiff had not decided definitely, even in his own mind, prior to November 29, 1918, to take advantage of Kroonen's alleged default.

Freeman had been attorney for plaintiff for a number of years, and continued to act as such in all the transactions between the parties. He acted as attorney for both parties in drawing the contract. He was attorney for Kroonen in procuring the patent. In all other matters he represented the plaintiff only. To hold otherwise would be to impute to the attorney, as will hereinafter appear, a course of unprofessional conduct which the evidence does not warrant. The plaintiff owned other properties in California, but resided in the city of New York. Mr. McCully, mentioned in some of the letters, was general manager of all of plaintiff's properties in this state and conducted, under plaintiff's direction, the negotiations leading up to the execution of the contract. July 18, 1917, Freeman wrote plaintiff as follows:

> "In re Kroonen Mines. I have just received a letter from Gladding, McBean & Co. of San Francisco, relative to joining in the construction and operation of a plant here as I discussed with you while you were here. They are desirous of testing these clays and want me to ship them 50 pounds each of the different kinds of clay. * * * I deem it advisable not to take the matter up with Mr. Kroonen at this time, and I thought if you would write me a letter requesting me to get 50 pounds of the different clays suitable for the purpose of making a test, Mr. Kroonen would comply with that request without asking any questions.
> "Mr. Kroonen spoke to Mr. McCully the other night and thought the contract should be closed up. Mr. McCully told him he thought the contract did not warrant his conclusion in that regard in as much as I was to pass upon the title after the patent was obtained. He also told Mr. McCully he had an offer from Gladding & McBean to go in with him, but he did not disclose what the offer was. * * * From another source of information coming from Gladding & McBean, I had heard, but I do not think the proposition was of any definite character. When Mr. Gladding was here at my office, he asked about Kroonen and his clays, and stated to another party in my presence he did not think it was necessary to get any of Kroonen's clays, as no deal could be made with him. I assumed, taking his remark to Mr. McCully and his remark in my presence, that Mr. Kroonen had told him that his mines were tied up and it would be of no use to negotiate a sale of his clays."

August 10, 1917, plaintiff wrote Freeman:

> "I think Gladding & McBean are quite right not to want to do anything with regard to this property, or a deal with us without first testing out the class of clays we have to offer them.
> "On further consideration how would it place me towards Kroonen on this matter should I write a letter now at this date, asking Kroonen to get 50 lbs. of the different clays for the purpose as suggested in your letter. Would it not have the effect from my standpoint that I admit the whole contract with Kroonen as being yet in existence? Whereas, Kroonen not getting out title according with his agreement made it a debatable question whether I am in duty bound or in any way obliged to carry out a further deal with him on this clay bank.

"If you think it advisable, possibly Mr. McCully might get this clay, and so send it forward on his own responsibility, rather than commit me in any way as furnishing this clay to the Gladding & McBean Co. Think this over, and let me know further.

"Don't say anything to McCully in regard to the position that I take in this matter, as, of course, you understand Kroonen having failed to carry out his part of the contract on account of the long delay, etc., gives me the opportunity to withdraw, but you don't want to discuss this question of mine with McCully."

January 3, 1918, Freeman wrote plaintiff that Kroonen had received his patent and stated:

"I presume he will now be ready and is ready to have the title to these mines examined and passed upon, and is ready to take the matter up with you."

February 1, 1918, Kroonen sent Freeman a statement of the amount due him under the contract and stated:

"Mr. Flagler could, if he desired to, put off the payment of the original payment until June, but I do not think that he will take advantage of this."

Feb. 12, 1918, Freeman forwarded Kroonen's letter and statement of amount due him to plaintiff and wrote:

"Kindly advise what you wish to be done in the matter. Mr. Kroonen has spoken to me several times in regard to this matter, and he has been in hopes you would come to California and take this matter up personally. I just learned yesterday that the Los Angeles Pressed Brick Company had a ten-year lease on the Elsinore clay beds, and that these clay beds were playing out, and that they were hard pressed to get the proper kind of clay. * * * I am of the opinion that eventually the Kroonen clay beds will be the principal clay beds in Southern California as both to quantity and quality."

February 19, 1918, plaintiff wrote Freeman:

"In yours of the 12th inst. regarding Kroonen claim, I mentioned to you some time since when in California in regard to Mr. Kroonen's delay and failing to produce proper and clear title that I didn't propose to go any further in connection with this subject with Mr. Kroonen, * * * and I had supposed that you had mentioned the matter more or less to him long ere this. I recognize what you say with reference to the Elsinore clay beds. If this is true as alleged it would seem to me, by approaching these people in connection with the Kroonen bed, that something may be made of it, wherein I would get back my $5,000 that I advanced to Mr. Kroonen. When I visit California I will confer further with you on the subject-matter."

February 26, 1918, Freeman wrote plaintiff:

"I note what you say about the Kroonen matter. Mr. Kroonen has spoken to me several times as to what you proposed to do in regard to the matter. I always told him that you would not do anything until the title was perfected as per agreement. As soon as patent was received he began to urge the closing of the deal as per contract. I told him I had no authority to act in the matter for you as to what you would do in regard to the matter. He then sent to me the statement and the letter which I sent you on the 12th of February."

Thereafter, on May 7th, Kroonen sent Freeman a statement of the amount which would be due June 16th and requested that the same be paid promptly when due. July 30th and again on October 23d Kroonen sent plaintiff similar statements and demands for payment. In November, 1917, plaintiff paid Kroonen $1,100, for services rendered in preparing plans and specifications for a chemical plant, without any suggestion that Kroonen was indebted to plaintiff. Had plaintiff then considered the contract sued on at an end and that Kroonen was indebted to him in the sum of $5,000, he naturally would have made such claim. With full knowledge of the foregoing facts and knowing that Kroonen believed that the contract was in full force as to both parties, the plaintiff maintained silence until November 29, 1918, when, for the first time, he denied liability under the contract and claimed the right to recover the purchase money which had been paid. The only fair inference from the plaintiff's conduct is that he was endeavoring to maintain a position which would enable him to complete the purchase or take advantage of Kroonen's alleged default as might finally appear to be most advantageous.

[1, 2] Giving due consideration to all of the terms of the contract, and viewing it in the light of the known circumstances under which it was executed, it cannot be held that the parties intended to make time of the essence thereof. The contract shows on its face that the parties contemplated that more than a year might be required to perfect the title, for the plaintiff was given the option to extend the time of payment if the title was not perfected within that time. Plaintiff's own attorney conducted the proceedings to secure the patent, and failure to issue it at an earlier time seems to have been due to delays in the land office department, over which the defendants had no control. Plaintiff relied for recovery upon the fourth quoted paragraph of the contract, providing for a recovery of the amounts paid by plaintiff "in the event of the failure of the said first parties to perfect title as above stated." The contract was drafted by an experienced attorney, and, in view of the other provisions thereof, if the parties intended to make time of its essence, it is strange that they did not expressly so declare or make plaintiff's right of recovery dependent upon defendants' failure to perfect title within the "time" stated in the contract instead of "as above stated," since the latter term is equally applicable to more than one provision.

> "We do not think it is necessary, in order to make time of the essence of the obligation, that it should be declared to be so in the words of the statute; but the intent to make it of the essence of the contract must be clearly, unequivocally, and unmistakably shown." Miller v. Cox, 96 Cal. 339, 344, 31 Pac. 161, 163.

[3] If it be conceded that the defendants were obligated to perfect the title within a year, under penalty of losing their bargain, their default did not ipso facto terminate the contract, but they continued bound by its terms, at the option of the plaintiff, until he declared his intention to take advantage of the default. The plaintiff could not indefinitely so hold the defendants bound without waiving his right to rely upon the default. Knowing that Kroonen was refusing to negotiate with other persons for the sale of the property, in the belief that he was bound by the contract and that plaintiff intended to take the property, the plaintiff, by his conduct and the reasons given by his attorney to Kroonen for not completing the transaction at the times requested, confirmed the latter's belief that plaintiff would complete the purchase. Under such circumstances it would be inequitable to permit plaintiff to take advantage of the alleged default, but he must be held to have waived it by the course of conduct he pursued.

[4] Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the theory that defendants made default in the performance of the contract, and that, by reason of such breach, the plaintiff had the right to treat the agreement of sale as abandoned and to sue on the other terms of the contract for recovery of the moneys paid thereon. There is no pretense that plaintiff ever demanded or that defendants refused performance or that title was not perfected by the 10th of December, 1917, at the latest. All defects in the title had been cleared up at some time prior to September 22, 1917, the exact time not appearing from the record, and nothing remained to be done thereafter, but the mere formality of issuing the patent. Plaintiff, however, was himself first in default and continuously so thereafter. He defaulted in payment of the interest falling due December 16, 1916, although Kroonen demanded payment of the interest on the $2,000 installment when that installment was paid, which was long before defendants' alleged default. No offer of payment was made by plaintiff in his complaint or otherwise, and the judgment does not require such payment to be made. Being himself so in default, plaintiff was not in a position to maintain an action based on the alleged subsequent default of the defendants. Rosenthal v. Silveira, 42 Cal. App. 637, 184 Pac. 58.

HOWATT et al. v. HUMBOLDT MILLING CO. et al. (Civ. 4476.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 12, 1923. Rehearing Denied April 10, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court, May 7, 1923.)

1. Boundaries 🔑37(3)—Court's finding as to location of boundary between adjoining lands sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support the court's finding as to the location of a boundary line between adjoining lands.

2. Boundaries 🔑37(5)—Evidence sufficient to sustain finding that parties agreeing on boundary line were uncertain as to true location.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain court's finding that the parties' predecessors in interest were uncertain as to the location of the boundary line between their properties, and agreed on the line claimed by plaintiffs.

3. Boundaries 🔑46(3)—Rule stated as to when line agreed on becomes true line by acquiescence, regardless of accuracy.

When landowners, being uncertain as to the true boundary between their lands, agree on its location, mark it on the ground, build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place fixed, and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to that prescribed by the statute of limitations or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by changing its position, such line becomes the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of its accuracy as shown by subsequent measurements.

4. Boundaries 🔑46(1)—Actual dispute as to location of boundary line not necessary to invoke agreed boundary rule.

To invoke the agreed boundary rule, it is not necessary that there be an actual dispute as to the location of the true line, it being sufficient that the line is doubtful or uncertain.

5. Adverse possession 🔑114(1)—Finding quieting title by adverse possession sustained.

Evidence held sufficient to support a finding quieting title on the ground of adverse possession.

6. Boundaries 🔑46(3)—Proof of agreed boundary and occupation in accordance therewith renders proof of title by adverse possession unnecessary.

In an action to quiet title, proof that the parties' predecessors in interest had agreed to and defined the boundary line between their respective properties and occupied the premises in accordance, renders pleading and proof of title by adverse possession unnecessary; the description in their respective patents carrying title up to the agreed line, regardless of its accuracy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Suit by Una Logan Howatt and others against the Humboldt Milling Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Irwin T. Quinn, Puter & Quinn, and A. J. Monroe, all of Eureka, for appellants.

Mahan & Mahan, H. C. Nelson, and L. M. Burnell, all of Eureka, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff sued to quiet title to the south half of the southeast quarter of section 34, township 2 south, range 3 east, Humboldt meridian, and to recover damages from the defendants caused by their cutting and removing trees, timber, and bark therefrom. The complaint was framed in three separate causes of action, the first alleging that the plaintiffs were the owners in fee and entitled to the possession of the premises; the second alleging that the predecessors in interest of the parties plaintiff and defendant, who were the owners respectively of the south half of the southeast quarter of section 34, township 2, and of the north half of the northeast quarter of section 3, township 3, were uncertain as to the location of the true line between their said properties, and with intent to establish such line agreed upon a line commencing at the section corner common to sections 34 and 35 of township 2 and to sections 2 and 3 of township 3 as established, marked, and designated on the ground by John M. Ingalls in the year 1872, and running thence west a distance of 2,960 feet in a straight line which, if extended, would intersect the section corner common to sections 33 and 34 of township 2 and sections 3 and 4 of township 3, as established by S. W. Foreman in the year 1875. It was also alleged that, in accord with said agreement, the respective parties hereto, and their predecessors in interest, continuously acquiesced in and abided by said line as the true line between their respective properties for a period of more than 30 years prior to the 1st of April, 1920, and occupied, used, and erected improvements upon their respective lands up to the common boundary line which was then established; the third alleging that between the 1st day of April, 1920, to the commencement of the action the defendants, without the consent of the plaintiffs, entered upon a portion of the land claimed by plaintiffs and cut and removed therefrom trees, timber, and bark growing thereon to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $10,000. The answer to the first cause of action was a general denial based upon a want of information and belief. To the second cause of action the defendants interposed a defense that the boundary line, as claimed by the plaintiffs, is not the true line established by the United States government; that the survey made by Ingalls in 1872 was merely for the purpose of establishing the exterior lines of township 2 and that said survey was not approved by the United States Surveyor General until after a survey by S. W. Foreman covering both township and section lines had been made, filed and approved; that the true boundary line between the properties of the respective parties is the line established by said Foreman in 1874, in accordance with the survey made by him, in which the corner common to sections 34, 35, 2, and 3 is different from the corner known as the Ingalls corner; that the boundary line claimed by the plaintiffs ran some 400 feet south of the township line surveyed and established by said Foreman. The answer also denied that the predecessors of the parties at any time agreed upon the common boundary line or that they acquiesced in the line claimed by the plaintiffs. The defendants did not deny the allegation relating to entry upon the premises and the cutting and removing of timber therefrom, but did deny that the plaintiffs were damaged by any act of theirs.

On the issues so joined, the trial court found that all the allegations contained in plaintiffs' complaint were true, except as to the amount of damages sustained by plaintiffs and that the amount of damages was $4,692.85. Special findings were made to the effect that the subdivisional survey of township 2 south of range 3 east, Humboldt meridian, and the official plan of said township, approved January 11, 1876, and filed in the local land office at Eureka, Cal., January 18, 1876, and by reference to which the land in said township was sold, were based on the survey of the south line of said township made by Ingalls in 1872, and that said survey was the last approved and accepted survey of the south line of said township. It was also found that at all times mentioned in the complaint plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest were the owners in fee and entitled to the possession of the lands described in the complaint, and that the true line or boundary between the premises of the respective parties is the township line established by Ingalls in 1872, commencing at the corner of sections 34, 35, 2, and 3, and running in a straight line westerly, which, if continued, would intersect the section corner common to sections 33, 34, 3, and 4 as established by Foreman in 1874, as shown upon plaintiffs' exhibits 1, 3, and 4. Judgment followed in favor of plaintiffs, quieting their title to the lands described in their complaint and awarding them damages in the sum of $4,692.85. From this judgment the defendants appeal on a bill of exceptions.

On this appeal appellants attack the judgment upon the ground that the findings of fact made by the trial court were not supported by the evidence. The grounds presented on the appeal may be stated as follows: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the finding as to the true location of the township or boundary line dividing the lands of the respective parties, (2) that the evidence is insufficient to show an agreement between the parties establishing such boundary line, and (3) that the evidence is insufficient to show that the respondents acquired title to the land in dispute by adverse possession.

[1] The controversy arises over a strip of land approximately seven chains in width and a quarter section in length. The dividing line claimed by respondents is the southern line of section 34 of township 2, and also the southern line of said township. This section line commences at a fir tree common to sections 34, 35, 2, and 3 and runs directly west to a post which is a common section corner of 33, 34, 3, and 4. The fir tree is the corner marked by Ingalls in his survey of 1872 and lies 6.87 chains south of the point which appellants claim to be the true corner post. The post on the west at 33, 34, 3, and 4 is the common corner accepted by both Ingalls and Foreman and extends 6.93 chains south of the point from which a straight line would pass if extended west from the post at 34, 35, 2, and 3, as claimed by appellants. A diagram is attached to page 5 of appellants' brief, but it is full of inaccuracies and is of little assistance. The case depends upon the evidence in the record, and from an examination of this we conclude that it is sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the township and section line is the line commencing at the so-called Ingalls fir tree corner, running thence westerly to the agreed Foreman corner, and being approximately 7 chains south of the line for which the appellants contend. It is true that there is some conflict in the evidence, but the witnesses A. J. Logan, French, Shaw, and Sanford all accepted the Ingalls corner, and the field notes of both Ingalls and Foreman went to prove that the line actually laid out upon the ground by these surveys was the line which the trial court found to be the true line of division. Though it appeared from Foreman's field notes that he failed to find the Ingalls fir tree corner because it had "probably been destroyed by recent fires," the notes do show that he found all the other points of identification along the southern line of section 34, including the quarter section post and the meander posts on each side of the river. Ingalls surveyed from west to east, while Foreman, with the expressed intention of retracing Ingalls' old line, surveyed from east to west. It was impossible for him to pass through these points of identification along the southern line of section 34 unless he accepted the corners established by Ingalls. The claim that he did not accept the Ingalls' corner of 34, 35, 2, and 3 is based mainly upon the fact that this corner is out of line with the common corner of 35, 36, 1, and 2 to the east. One witness testifying for the appellants stated that he found a corner which appellants claim to be the true corner of 34, 35, 2, and 3, and that he saw scribe marks on a fir tree which he believed to be something like 40 years old. From this testimony it is argued that this witness did in fact discover the so-called Foreman corner at a point 6.87 chains north of the so-called Ingalls corner, but it was later shown by the same witness, as well as by others, that the marks which he discovered were not those of Foreman but of a surveyor by the name of Shaw, who surveyed the land some 24 or 25 years later than Foreman's survey.

Upon the issue of an agreement as to the boundary line, the evidence shows that a Mrs. Wilds and J. W. Logan, predecessors in interest of the parties in this action, were uncertain as to the true boundary line between their premises, and that some time about 1875 or 1876 they had talked the matter over and had agreed upon the same line which respondents now insist is the true boundary line; that in accordance with this agreement they built a fence along a portion of the line, a part by each, running from the river to the timber line; that they thereafter farmed the land, which was tillable up to the line, as agreed upon and lived together in this agreement for a period of several years; that Mrs. Wilds' successor in interest sold her lands to one of the appellants herein, and that they cut the timber up to the line which had theretofore been agreed upon; that this was done in the year 1898; that by reason of this cutting of the timber, the erection of the fence, the farming of the lowland, and blazed marks through the timber, the line between the two parties' properties was clearly discernible and was accepted by all parties as the true dividing line for a period of more than 40 years; that it was recognized and commonly referred to as the "Ingalls line"; that in fact it was not questioned until 1920, when one of the appellants entered upon the land which had theretofore been held and claimed by respondents and their predecessors and cut and removed timber therefrom. It also appeared that, during all this time, the so-called Ingalls' corner was a well-known and recognized corner, an "important corner," and was known to be the point from which the dividing line should start. It further appears that the fences which were erected by Mrs. Wilds and Logan were destroyed by water from the river and that they were subsequently repaired with the knowledge and consent of all parties.

[2, 3] Appellants insist that the element of uncertainty as to the true boundary which is necessary to invoke the rule of an "agreed boundary" is lacking, but it appears in the evidence that in the early days Mrs. Wilds, predecessor in interest of the appellants, and Logan, predecessor in interest of the respondents, had several conversations concerning the location of this line; that Logan at first was unable to locate the corner and asked Mrs. Wilds if she knew where it was to be found; that in response thereto she sent her son, Nathan Sanford, a witness in this case, to the Ingalls corner, with directions to him to point out such corner to Logan; that Mrs. Wilds and Logan had several conversations concerning the location of the line, some of which occurred down on the line near the river bar, and that, as a result of said conversations, they determined that a fence which Logan had erected was below the line, and they thereupon agreed to and did move the fence and put it upon the line between them; that Mrs. Wilds, being doubtful as to the location of a spring, had a special survey made in order to determine whether the spring was within the line of her property. There is sufficient here to sustain the finding of the trial court that the predecessors in interest of the parties hereto were uncertain as to the location of the true line between their properties and that, with the intent to establish such line, they agreed with each other that the boundary line between their respective properties should be the line commencing at the Ingalls corner and running west to the Foreman corner, as claimed by the respondents in this action. The "agreed" boundary rule is correctly stated in Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 477, 481, 95 Pac. 888, 889, from which we quote:

> "When such owners, being uncertain of the true position of the boundary so described, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location, as it may appear by subsequent measurements."

See, also, Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 634, 640, 108 Pac. 707.

[4] It will be seen from the foregoing that the rule may be invoked where the true boundary line is "doubtful or uncertain." It is not necessary that there should be an actual dispute between the parties as to the location of the true line. This was held in Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 489, 119 Pac. 893. In that case it was argued that the rule does not apply where the location of the boundary was merely uncertain, but that it must have been absolutely unascertainable, and that there must have been an actual dispute between the parties as to its true location. But the Supreme Court held that the rule was not subject to such qualification. In the first place, that it was only where the true location was subseqently ascertained that actions of this nature arose which required the application of the rule, and that obviously the rule could not apply if the location was unascertainable. As to the second point, it was held that all the authorities agree that it was sufficient if the true location was uncertain, and that it was not necessary that there should have been a dispute as to the boundary prior to the agreement as to the location.

[5, 6] From what has been said it follows that, if it were necessary for respondents to rely on their rights by adverse possession, sufficient evidence was received to support a finding quieting respondents' title upon that ground. It was shown that the true boundary line was marked upon the ground; that the parties built up to it and occupied the lands on each side; that the portion inclosed by the fence was farmed by the respective parties, and that the portion thereof which was covered by timber was occupied and used for the ordinary use and in the ordinary way; that the respondents and their predecessors in interest had paid all taxes against said land from 1875 to the date of the judgment; and that appellants and their predecessors in interest, as owners of the land immediately adjoining on the south, never exercised any ownership and never asserted any claim of right to the portion of the land north of the so-called Ingalls line at any time during the period from 1878 to 1920. But it was not necessary for the respondents to plead or prove title by adverse possession. Having shown that their predecessors in interest had agreed to and defined the boundary line between their respective properties and had occupied the premises in accordance with the agreement, the description in their respective patents carries title up to the agreed line, regardless of its accuracy.

> "The division line, when thus established, attaches itself to the deeds of the respective parties, and simply defines, not adds to the lands described in each deed, in accordance with the understanding of the parties, who are presumed to know best their lands." Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619, 630; Price v. DeReyes, 161 Cal. 484, 487, 119 Pac. 893.

LINCOLN et ux. v. CHAMBERLAIN.
(Civ. 4065.)

1. Trusts 🔑77—Payment to be made at or before conveyance to create resulting trust.

For a resulting trust to arise in favor of one because of his payment of the consideration for purchase of land conveyed to another, his payment must be made at or before the conveyance; so where D. advanced to defendant money to purchase land, and defendant gave to D. his note secured on the land which had been conveyed to him, no resulting trust arose in plaintiff's favor from his afterwards paying the note, though before the purchase it had been orally understood between plaintiff and defendant that he was merely to permit the use of his name in the matter for plaintiff's benefit.

2. Trusts 🔑99—No constructive trust under facts.

Though defendant purchased land, taking title thereto in his name and giving his note, secured on the property, for the money he borrowed for the purchase, with an oral understanding with plaintiff that he was merely to permit the use of his name for plaintiff's benefit, and thereafter without objection saw plaintiff make payments on the note and improvements on the property, no constructive trust arose in plaintiff's favor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action by E. L. Lincoln and wife against Frank I. Chamberlain. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. The principal facts in this case are as follows: The plaintiffs, E. L. Lincoln and his wife, Anna M. Lincoln, were on very friendly and confidential terms with defendant, Chamberlain. All of them were living in the city of Los Angeles, and defendant, Chamberlain, desired to take a position in Cuba. He had a daughter whom he wished to leave with plaintiffs. At that time plaintiffs were living in a three-room apartment and had no accommodations for the daughter of defendant, and none of the parties was possessed of any means wherewith to purchase a house. The defendant, however, stated to the plaintiffs that he had a friend by the name of Duncanson who would buy a place for him, but that he feared Duncanson would not do so for plaintiffs. The matter was finally arranged by Duncanson advancing the money for the purchase of the property. The title to the purchased property was taken in the name of defendant, and defendant gave back to Duncanson a promissory note and a trust deed for the property, which provided, among other things, for payments thereon to be made to Duncanson at the rate of $35 per month. Before the purchase was consummated the plan as heretofore outlined was agreed to as between plaintiffs and defendant, and it was further agreed between them only that plaintiffs would pay the $35 per month to Duncanson, and that defendant would leave a power of attorney with his daughter so that she could transfer the title to the property to the plaintiffs whenever they wished to have that done. On the same day that the trust deed was executed defendant executed the power of attorney as agreed upon and delivered the same to his daughter. The sum of $35 per month was thereafter paid each month by plaintiffs to Duncanson through a bank, but Duncanson had no knowledge of the arrangement as between plaintiffs and defendant. Defendant went to Cuba, where he remained one month, and then returned to Los Angeles, living thereafter for several months with plaintiffs. Plaintiffs paid the taxes, insurance, for the certificate of title, the water bill, installing new electric fixtures, repairing foundation of house, redecorating the interior, remodeling the house, installing new drainboard, the building of a garage and rear porch, new steps, a shingle roof, hot-water heater, plumbing, awnings, screen doors, hardware furnishings, lumber and wire for gates and fence, a total of $1,368.71, which, together with the amounts paid by them on account of the purchase price of the property up to the time of the trial, made a total of $2,018.71—a considerable portion of which was paid after defendant repudiated the agreement. Defendant never objected to any improvements being made on the property. The plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals.

[1] The theory of plaintiffs' case is that a resulting trust was established by the acts of the parties. It is a general rule that, where a conveyance of land is made to one person, and the consideration for the transfer of title is paid by another person, a resulting trust is created in favor of that person who has paid the consideration (Brown v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 589, 126 Pac. 493); but it must be shown that the party setting up the trust paid the money either at or before the execution of the conveyance and as a part of the original transaction of purchase (Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 1037; Case v. Codding, 38 Cal. 191; Roberts v. Ware, 40 Cal. 634; Woodside v. Hewel, 109 Cal. 481, 42 Pac. 152). After the conveyance is actually made, parol agreement that the purchase shall stand for the benefit of another will not be effectual for the purpose of creating a resulting trust. Hunt v. Friedman, 63 Cal. 510. In the instant case, although the evidence clearly shows that it was the intention of the defendant to merely permit the use of his name in the transaction for the benefit of the plaintiffs, and that he had no expectation at the time the purchase was made of ever claiming any interest in the property because of the fact that he was to furnish none of the consideration, yet the record discloses that it was his credit that was pledged. It was to him that the deed to the property was executed, and it was he who gave back the trust deed and the promissory note and who made the various promises and assumed the several obligations therein contained. Plaintiffs furnished no part of the consideration looking to that particular part of the transaction. So far as either the grantor or Duncanson was then aware, plaintiffs had nothing whatever to do with the matter, and while in reality the plaintiffs were as much, if not more, concerned than was defendant, their legal connection is first indicated by the oral agreement entered into after the purchase of the property was made to pay the consideration for the property for which defendant had already obligated himself to Duncanson, who advanced the money for defendant, as evidenced by the promissory note and the trust deed which had already been executed. The legal consideration for the property in the form of the promissory note and the trust deed by defendant had passed to Duncanson before plaintiffs' oral contract with defendant to discharge same by monthly payments took effect. They merely had defendant's word that he would transfer title to them. Plaintiffs' contract with defendant in legal contemplation, if it could ever be said to be effective, began where defendant's contract with Duncanson left off. It is said in Woodside v. Hewel, 109 Cal. 481, 42 Pac. 152:

> "It is essential that one who would claim an interest in real property by reason of having paid the consideration for its purchase must show that such payment was made at or prior to the time the purchase was made, and for the purpose of making the purchase. * * * After a party has made a purchase with his own moneys or credit, a subsequent tender or even reimbursement may be evidence of some other contract, or the ground for some other relief; but it cannot by any retrospective effect, produce the trust of which we are speaking. There never was an instance of such a trust so created, and there never ought to be, for it would destroy all the certainty and security of conveyances of real estate. The resulting trust, not within the statute of frauds, and which may be shown without writing, is when the purchase is made with the proper moneys of the cestui que trust, and the deed not taken in his name."

In Strong v. Messinger, 148 Ill. 431, 36 N. E. 617, the following language occurs:

> "A resulting trust arises, if at all, the instant the deed is taken and the legal title vests. No payment made will create a resulting trust, unless, at the moment the title passes, the trust results from the transaction itself."

And in 39 Cyc. at page 106 we find the following:

> "Since a resulting trust cannot rest on an express agreement, no parol agreement between the parties, made before or after the conveyance of property can give rise to a resulting trust therein."

[2] By neither the pleadings nor the argument on the part of plaintiffs can it be said that plaintiffs are seeking to establish a constructive trust. From the facts herein it is too plain to admit of argument that as between man and man, viewed from a standpoint of natural justice, plaintiffs ought to have judgment. Defendant stood by and saw plaintiffs expending their own money for improvements, to say nothing of the monthly payments made by plaintiffs on account of their supposed contract of purchase, and now seeks to reap the harvest to which in good conscience he is in no wise entitled. In common with the increase in value of other real estate in the city of Los Angeles, it is not unlikely that, in addition to the various improvements placed upon the property by plaintiffs, there has been a substantial advance in the value of the lot upon which the house stands. Defendant's moral obligation is apparently of no consequence to him. The statute of frauds does not permit the enforcement of the oral contract by which defendant solemnly bound himself to plaintiffs regarding the sale of the lot here in question. The decisions not only of the Supreme and of the appellate courts of this state, but by almost unanimous adjudication of the courts of sister states, are to the effect that in circumstances similar to those before us no resulting trust is brought into being by which the unrighteous acts of persons situated as was this defendant with relation to plaintiffs may be corrected. Unfortunately the decisions are likewise compelling as against plaintiffs' natural rights in connection with the doctrine of constructive trusts. There are many general statements enunciated by learned authors, as well as by eminent jurists, which, without regard to the particular facts of the case involved, would seem broad enough to cover the facts of this case, but an examination of such expressions, taken in conjunction with other definite and well-grounded principles, leaves this court no alternative other than a declaration that the doctrine of constructive trust has no application, even were the pleadings here such as to warrant the remedy thereby afforded. Plaintiffs must seek other relief.

There was no evidence to support the finding by the court to the effect that plaintiffs purchased the property in question. Defendant's motion for nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiffs' case, should have been granted.

The judgment is reversed.

CONREY, P. J., and JAMES, J. We concur in the judgment. For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, it seems clear that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover on the basis of a resulting trust.

Also we think that the facts found by the court, which in that respect go no further than the allegations of the complaint, are not sufficient to establish a constructive trust. If it were pleaded and proved not only that the plaintiffs have expended substantial sums of money in the improvement, maintenance, and repair of the property, but also that those expenditures were made with the knowledge and acquiescence of the defendant and in reliance upon his promise to convey, the plaintiffs might have a better standing in court. The plaintiffs should have that opportunity, if they so desire. It has been said that "as a general rule, to enable a court of equity to exclude a verbal contract for the sale of an interest in land from the operation of said statute, there must be a collateral circumstance constituting an independent equity, imposing an obligation in conscience." 25 R. C. L. p. 700. But the facts found by the court below in this case do not come up to that standard.

AL G. BARNES SHOWS CO. v. TAIT.

1. Appeal and error 🔑1040(12)—Order overruling demurrer to counterclaim held not error where no evidence was admitted thereon, and no finding made.

It was not error to overrule a demurrer to a counterclaim, where no evidence was permitted to be introduced under the counterclaim, and no finding was made respecting it.

2. Replevin 🔑72—Evidence held to show that animals procured by defendant in company with show agent was property of defendant.

Evidence in claim and delivery to recover animals held to show that the animals procured by defendant in company with plaintiff's show agent were the property of defendant.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1011(1)—Finding based on conflicting evidence may not be disturbed.

Finding of trial court based on conflicting evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal.

4. Master and servant 🔑61—Statute providing property acquired by employee belongs to employer held inapplicable.

Civ. Code, § 1985, providing everything which an employee acquires in his employment belongs to his employer, whether acquired lawfully or unlawfully, held not to apply to an arrangement between plaintiff's agent and defendant in procuring wild animals in foreign lands with a view of resale to plaintiff, where such arrangement was a proper one, and no fraud was practiced upon plaintiff.

5. Replevin 🔑103(2)—Return of animals taken to defendant held proper regardless of disclaimer of one with qualified interest therein.

Where in claim and delivery the court found that the real possession of animals procured by defendant in company with plaintiff's show agent was that of defendant, with but a qualified possession in a steamship company, the return of the animals to defendant was proper regardless of the disclaimer of the steamship company.

6. Replevin 🔑103(4)—Return of property or its value if return cannot be had held proper judgment.

A judgment for defendant for a return of property or for its value where return cannot be had is a proper judgment in replevin.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Al G. Barnes Shows Company against Stewart Tait and others. Judgment for defendant Tait, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

McCutchen, Olney, Willard, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. This action was brought by Al G. Barnes Shows Company, a corporation, against the Toyo Kisen Kaisha Oriental Steamship Company, D. W. Callahan, and Stewart Tait for 3 elephants, one tiger, 25 monkeys, one dog, and one king cobra snake, then in possession of the steamship company. Defendants Callahan and Tait were joined as defendants because they claimed an interest in the animals. All of the animals were delivered to plaintiff under claim and delivery proceedings, and used in its circus. Defendant Callahan did not answer, the steamship company filed a disclaimer, and defendant Stewart Tait filed an answer and counterclaim, and later a supplemental answer, which was amended. His answers denied all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint. In his counterclaim he set up ownership in himself of the elephants and monkeys, and asked for their restoration, or, if that were impossible, for $5,175, their reasonable value; also for $5,000 exemplary damages, and for costs of suit. The supplemental answer alleges the withholding and use by plaintiff of the animals since seizure, and the death, since the commencement of the suit, of all of them but one elephant. After demurrer to the answer and counterclaim had been overruled, the case went to trial on the complaint, answer, and amended supplemental answer. No evidence was permitted under the counterclaim. Judgment was for defendant Tait for $2,620.11, the value of 2 elephants and 25 monkeys, and for the return of the surviving elephant or $1,122.55, its value, with interest from the commencement of the action and costs of suit. Plaintiff's motion for a new trial was denied, and it appealed from the judgment.

The evidence shows that in 1915 D. W. Callahan and Al G. Barnes Shows Company entered into a contract under which Callahan went to the Philippines for the purpose of bringing out Igorrotes, and with the further object of securing freaks or wild animals at the direction of the Shows Company. Callahan was supplied with $350 and a round-trip ticket to Manila. The Shows Company made advances to the steamship company to cover the return fare of 10 Igorrotes that Callahan contemplated securing and bringing back to the United States. He arrived at Manila about January 20, 1916, and remained in the Philippines until about the 1st of April, endeavoring to find the Igorrotes for his employer, but without success. Callahan collected from the steamship company about $500, being the advances made for the fares of the savages to the United States. At this time he was conducting cable negotiations for 2 tigers and an elephant he had heard were to be had at Singapore. He also cabled to the Shows Company and received some $900 to pay for these animals. A few days before he was to leave for Singapore he had a talk with defendant Tait, whom he had met on a previous trip to Manila, and who had lived there eight years. Tait intended visiting the United States, and Callahan suggested that there was good money to be made in buying wild animals, and that, if Tait wished to accompany him, he would show him what to buy and the prices to be paid, provided he might have the first option for Mr. Barnes of the Shows Company on all animals bought by Tait. Mr. Barnes, Callahan said, would purchase the animals immediately on their arrival in San Francisco. Tait agreed to go with Callahan, and they left Manila for Singapore. At Hongkong Callahan notified the steamship agent, Mr. Sheppard, that he would have an elephant and 2 tigers for shipment, and the latter said he would get in communication with Mr. Barnes and arrange the transportation. While at Hongkong Callahan, learning that the elephant he hoped to get at Singapore had been sold, decided to go to Saigon in an effort to replace it. He and Tait went to Saigon, and thence inland to Phnom Penh in Cambodia. There they heard of an elephant owned by the royal family. An audience was had with the king. After much haggling in four languages, carried on through interpreters, an elephant was purchased for $375. There is a direct conflict in the testimony as to the purchase of this elephant, Callahan insisting that he was buying it for Barnes, and Tait just as strongly claiming that he bought it for himself. It is undisputed, however, that on leaving for Singapore the next day Callahan asked Tait to pay for the elephant and see that it was transported to Hongkong, where they intended to embark for the United States. Tait paid for the elephant and took a bill of sale for it in his own name. He also arranged for its care and for its shipment to Saigon and thence to Hongkong. After Callahan's departure Tait purchased and paid for 2 elephants, bought from another prince, took bills of sale for both in his own name, and on these, as on the first, paid export duties from Phnom Penh to Saigon and again at Saigon for Hongkong. He arranged with Mr. Sheppard for transportation of the elephants to the United States, not knowing at the time that the freight had been guaranteed by the Shows Company. Here, a few days later, he was joined by Callahan, who brought a tiger and some 40 monkeys. With some difficulty additional space was arranged for to take these animals on the same boat, and Tait's testimony is that he made arrangements for transportation of these also prior to knowledge of any freight guaranty by the Shows Company, though he did know of it before they sailed. Callahan's story is that together they visited the various offices, and that before sailing Barnes of the Shows Company had guaranteed the freight, but that on account of his sickness during part of this time he does not know whether the final consent to take all the animals was given to both or to Tait alone. Callahan was sick on the voyage, so that supervision of the care of the animals and reconstruction of their shelter on the deck of the boat fell to Tait. On arrival in San Francisco a Mr. Hill, representative of the Shows Company, met the boat and talked with Tait about the animals. Tait telling him that he would hold the animals for the Shows Company until the next day at prices which he then quoted him of $1,500 each for two of the 3 elephants, and on the third (the first one bought) the actual cost to him, and $15 apiece for the 25 monkeys. Hill stated that he would wire Br. Barnes of the Shows Company and let Tait know the next day. Plaintiff then instituted claim and delivery proceedings, and the animals were delivered to it. The trial court found Tait to be the owner of the 3 elephants and 25 monkeys to the exclusion of any claims of plaintiff as to ownership, right of possession, or damages claimed as money spent in pursuit of the animals. The court also found the value of each of the elephants to be $1,122.55, and the value of the monkeys as $15 each. The findings as to value are not questioned.

[1] Plaintiff makes seven contentions on appeal. The first of these is that the trial court erred in overruling plaintiff's demurrer to the counterclaim of defendant Tait praying the return of the animals in question to him, and seeking exemplary damages occasioned by his delay in San Francisco, due to the litigation. There is no merit in this contention. Although the court overruled plaintiff's demurrer to the counterclaim, it refused to permit any evidence to be introduced under it, and upon the subject made the following statement in the findings of fact:

> "That this court makes no findings whatsoever with respect to the counterclaim set forth by said defendant Stewart Tait in the answer filed by him in this action for the reason that this court refused to receive any evidence whatsoever with reference thereto."

This statement is supported by the consistent rulings of the trial judge sustaining plaintiff's objections to every question put to defendant Tait by his attorney in an attempt to prove the allegations of damage in the counterclaim.

[2, 3] The second contention is that the trial court committed error in finding against the plaintiff on the ownership of the animals. The undisputed evidence is that defendant Tait bought 2 elephants for the purpose of taking them to the United States and selling them as his own property. Defendant Callahan, the Shows Company representative, admits this. As to the third elephant, the evidence shows, as we have heretofore pointed out, a conflict in this: Tait insisted that he bought the animal for himself, while Callahan claimed it was bought for the Shows Company, but in this connection is the undisputed illuminating fact that Tait paid for the elephant, took a bill of sale for it in his own name, arranged for care and transportation, and paid duty upon it. As to the ownership of the 25 monkeys, defendant Tait testified that he furnished Callahan money with which to purchase these animals, and in this regard he is corroborated by Callahan himself. A reading of the entire record convinces us that there is abundant evidence to support the findings of the trial court. And in the instance where a conflict appears as to the ownership of one elephant the finding of the trial court cannot be disturbed by us under a rule so ancient and familiar that citation of authority is unnecessary.

[4] The contention that, as Callahan was the representative of the Shows Company, the question of agency enters into the case, that there was a joint venture between Tait and Callahan, and that under the principle enunciated in section 1985, Civil Code, everything acquired by an employee by virtue of his employment, except his compensation, belongs to his employer, is of no force whatever. There was no fraud practiced upon the Shows Company. The arrangement between Tait and Callahan, as the evidence shows, was in every way a proper one.

The findings of the court upon the question of ownership disposes of the third contention of plaintiff's cotenancy, the fourth, claiming an adventurer's lien, and the fifth, urging that the relief granted Tait was improper because the steamship company filed a disclaimer.

[5] The sixth contention is without merit. The return of the animals to Tait was proper regardless of the disclaimer of the steamship company in the proceedings, since the court found that the real possession was that of Tait, with but a qualified possession in the steamship company.

[6] The seventh contention that error was committed in giving alternative judgment for the value of the animals falls with the sixth. A judgment for defendant for a return of property, or for its value where return cannot be had, is a proper judgment in replevin.

The judgment is affirmed.

HARDER v. LANG REALTY CO. et al.

(Civ. 4386.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⊶165—Vendee need not complete contract if quantity of land bargained for is not given.

A purchaser is entitled to the quantity of land for which he has bargained, and, if vendor is unwilling or unable to give it, is under no obligation to complete the contract.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⊶37(2)—Vendee inspecting premises not precluded from complaining of defect in quantity.

That vendee viewed and inspected the premises, and had the boundaries pointed out to him, does not preclude him from complaining of a defect in quantity, as one dealing with an owner of land, the dimensions of which can be accurately ascertained only by scientific measurement, may assume that the owner knows the true boundaries, and rely on his representations to such extent.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑130(9), 165—One-foot deficiency in frontage and encroachment of adjoining building held defects in title.

A one-foot deficiency in the represented frontage of a city lot, and encroachment of an adjoining building thereon, held defects in the title, justifying vendee in refusing to accept the conveyance.

4. Specific performance 🔑30—Provision as to payment of cash above mortgage held unenforceable as indefinite in respect to amount and party to procure it.

A provision in a contract for the sale of a lot, reciting "cash above a first bank mortgage to be raised of about $3,500," held unenforceable as indefinite in respect to the amount and the party who was to procure it.

5. Vendor and purchaser 🔑187—Objection to sufficiency of offer to pay on removal of defects in title held waived.

Objection to the sufficiency of vendee's offer to pay on removal of defects in the title is waived by failure to object at the time or make any effort to remedy the defects.

6. Vendor and purchaser 🔑341(5)—Vendee's expenses in examining title and preparing papers proper charges against vendor.

Expenses properly incurred by vendee in examining the title to property and preparing the necessary papers are proper charges against vendor.

7. Action 🔑45(4)—Counts for recovery by vendee of purchase money paid held not improperly joined.

A complaint containing a count in assumpsit for money had and received and a count setting forth facts on which plaintiff relied for recovery of money paid on the purchase price of a lot, of which he refused to accept a conveyance because of defects in the title, held not insufficient on demurrer as misjoining a cause of action predicated on a rescission with an action to establish a purchaser's lien, to which plaintiff was entitled under either count.

8. Jury 🔑28(11)—Plaintiff's waiver of lien in action to rescind contract and recover deposit held not to have changed character of action, so as to deprive defendant of trial by jury.

That plaintiff, during the trial of an action to rescind his contract to purchase a lot because of defects in the title, and to recover money paid, waived his lien on the land, did not change the character of the action so as to deprive him of a trial by jury.

9. Appeal and error 🔑843(2)—Whether plaintiff's waiver of lien in action to rescind contract and recover deposit deprived defendant of trial by jury need not be considered where defendant expressly waived such right.

Where defendant, in an action to rescind a contract to purchase realty and recover a deposit, expressly waived his right to a trial by jury, the question whether plaintiff, by waiving his lien during the trial, changed the character of the action so as to deprive defendant of a trial by jury, need not be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Harder against the Lang Realty Company, Clifford S. Allred, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Allred appeals. Affirmed.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for appellant.

S. Joseph Theisen, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action to rescind a contract for the purchase of certain real estate, and to recover money paid as a deposit in part payment thereon.

The complaint is in two counts. The first is one in assumpsit for money had and received. The second sets forth at length the facts upon which the alleged obligation arose.

From the evidence it appears that plaintiff paid to defendants under a written contract the sum of $500 as deposit and part payment upon certain real property, consisting of a lot of land, together with a dwelling house situated thereon, located at the northeast corner of Forty-Fourth avenue and Geary street, San Francisco. The full consideration was the sum of $7,750. As to the terms of payment, the agreement recited that "cash above a first bank mortgage to be raised of about $3,500." The usual customary provisions allowing 30 days to examine title and consummate sale and further time to cure any defects, and if not so cured deposit to be returned, were incorporated in the agreement.

Upon the execution of the contract plaintiff ordered a search of the title and a survey of the property, at an expense of $50 for the search and $25 for the survey. The report upon these matters disclosed that the lot was incumbered by a deed of trust, and also that the house and lot were only 24 feet in width, instead of 25, as the contract called for, and that an adjoining house overlapped on the 25-foot frontage about 12 inches for a length of some 38 feet. Within the time provided for in the contract respondent caused to be served upon defendants written notice specifying these objections, but they failed to cure the defects or remove the incumbrance. Plaintiff thereupon tendered in writing the payment of the remainder of the contract price, and demanded a conveyance of the property free from all defects. Upon failure of appellant to comply therewith respondent demanded the return of his deposit and expenses, and thereafter brought this action to recover the same. Judgment went in his favor for the sum of $575, the amount of his deposit and cost of the search and survey.

The main ground relied upon for reversal is that the evidence fails to support the findings of the trial court to the effect that the title to the property was defective by reason of a lack of proper dimensions of the lot and the overlapping of the contiguous building. In this respect it is claimed that the evidence clearly shows that the block within which the property is situated had been subdivided by the construction of houses and division fences, and that the house and lot as shown to plaintiff was a 24-foot lot; that he was taken upon the premises and was told that the line of the adjoining house was the line of his lot. From these circumstances it is contended that, plaintiff having inspected the property purchased, and having had the boundaries pointed out to him, he could not be heard to object to a defect in quantity.

[1] We see no merit in this contention. The contract called for a lot with a frontage of 25 feet, and plaintiff was not bound to accept one of smaller dimensions. A purchaser is entitled to the quantity of land for which he has bargained, and, if the vendor is unwilling or unable to give it to him, he is under no obligation to complete the contract. 2 Warvelle on Vendors, § 832. This rule is somewhat qualified with reference to a sale of urban property under certain circumstances, when such property is described as containing an estimated number of acres. No such question, however, is here involved, and a discussion of it is not necessary. In the case of a city lot a deficiency in quantity of even a few inches has been held to be material, and to be a sufficient reason for the vendee to reject the title. Klim v. Sachs, 102 App. Div. 44, 92 N. Y. Supp. 107; Floeting v. Horwitz, 120 App. Div. 492, 104 N. Y. Supp. 1037; Sears v. Stinson, 3 Wash. 615, 29 Pac. 205; Siebel v. Cohen, 54 N. Y. Super. Ct. 436.

[2] Nor does the fact, as claimed, that the plaintiff viewed and inspected the premises, and had the lot pointed out to him, preclude him from complaining of a defect in quantity. A vendor cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained that such representations were untrue. Morris v. Courtney, 120 Cal. 63, 52 Pac. 129; Taber v. Piedmont Heights Building Co., 25 Cal. App. 222, 230, 143 Pac. 319. Dimensions of land cannot be seen with the eye at a glance, and can only be ascertained with accuracy by scientific measurement. Quarg v. Scher, 136 Cal. 406, 69 Pac. 96; Eichelberger v. Mills Land Co., 9 Cal. App. 629, 100 Pac. 117. One dealing with an owner of real property may therefore assume that the owner knows the true boundaries, and he may rely upon representations to that extent. Del Grande v. Castelhun (Cal. App.) 205 Pac. 18.

[3] Here the record discloses the fact that the appellant's agent and respondent both testified that there was nothing about the appearance of the house by which its exact dimensions could be ascertained.

Upon this subject, therefore, we conclude that the defect in quantity of the land and the encroachment thereon were defects in the title which justified the plaintiff in refusing to accept the conveyance.

[4, 5] Appellant further contends that the finding that plaintiff offered to perform all conditions on his part to be performed, including a tender, is against the evidence. There is evidence to show that the plaintiff offered to pay the sum of $3,750, said sum being the amount of cash over and above the first mortgage of $3,500, upon the removal of the deed of trust which incumbered the property and the overlapping of the adjoining building. The provision in the contract which recites "cash above a first bank mortgage to be raised of about $3,500" is indefinite both in respect to the amount and as to the party who is to procure it. It cannot, therefore, be enforced. Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 200 Pac. 610. In addition thereto defendant made no objection to the sufficiency of the tender, nor did he make any effort to remedy the defects in the title. Under these conditions objection is waived. Kerr v. Reed, 187 Cal. 409, 202 Pac. 142; Kofoed v. Gordon, 122 Cal. 314, 54 Pac. 1115.

[6] Complaint is also made of the action of the court in allowing a recovery of the costs incurred in making an examination of the title, it being claimed that these items were not moneys received by defendant or expended for his benefit for which a recovery might be had. Expenses properly incurred in examining the title to property and in the preparation of the necessary papers are proper charges. Turner v. Reynolds, 81 Cal. 214, 22 Pac. 546.

[7] And, finally, it is claimed that the trial court erred in overruling the demurrer to the complaint interposed by defendant Allred. In this connection it is urged that there was a misjoinder of causes of action for the reason that the first count was predicated upon a rescission, which was united with an action under the second count to establish a purchaser's lien.

[8, 9] We see no merit in this contention. The cause of action declared upon in both counts is the same. The first is one in assumpsit for money had and received, and the other sets forth the facts upon which plaintiff relies for a recovery. Under either count plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the land as security for the repayment of what he had paid in performance of the contract. Montgomery v. Meyerstein, 186 Cal. 464, 199 Pac. 800. In this connection it may be stated that the mere fact that during the trial the lien was waived by plaintiff in no manner affected the situation or changed the character of the action so as to deprive him of a trial by jury. Aside from the fact that this point is raised for the first time upon appeal, defendant expressly waived his right to a trial by jury.

From what we have said it follows that the trial court rightfully concluded that the plaintiff was entitled to a return of his deposit and a refund for his expenses in searching the title, defendant having failed to comply with the terms of his contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

SILVIUS v. SCHOLES. (Civ. 3775.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷290(1)—Relation held existent supporting unlawful detainer.

Where part of the purchase money of certain realty was advanced to the purchaser by another with the understanding that such person would occupy the premises purchased until the amount advanced by her should be applied as rent at the rate of a certain amount per month, held, where she continued in possession after the amount of her advance was exhausted pursuant to the understanding, the relation of landlord and tenant existed, supporting action of unlawful detainer.

2. Pleading ⚷106(2)—Plea of another action pending held not good as plea in abatement.

A plea of another action pending held not good as a plea in abatement, where it showed on its face that such other action had already gone to judgment, which judgment had become final by the lapse of 71 days; 60 days being the time within which an appeal might have been taken, under Code Civ. Proc. § 939.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Percy S. King, Judge.

Action by F. D. Silvius against Grace M. Scholes. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leon R. Yankwich and Edward H. Allen, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

James F. McBryde and W. Claire Anspach, both of Glendale, and Oliver O. Clark, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action of unlawful detainer. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that a finding of the trial court that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties is not supported by the evidence. Although the evidence was not without contradiction, there was testimony tending to show the following facts: The property which is the subject of the action was purchased by respondent with the aid of appellant, who advanced for the purpose a certain sum of money. It was understood that upon the acquisition of the place appellant might occupy it until the amount advanced by her should be applied in toto as rent at the rate of a certain amount per month. She did occupy the premises until the amount of her advance was exhausted pursuant to the understanding. This action was commenced thereafter. Under these circumstances, we cannot avoid the conclusion that appellant was a tenant of respondent, at least after the expiration of the period during which she was to occupy the property under her advance. Her status after that time had run is well described by the usual definitions of the word "tenant," even in its most restricted sense. 38 Cyc. p. 123; 16 R. C. L. tit. Landlord and Tenant, par. 2. The finding had ample support in the evidence.

[2] Appellant insists that the trial court erred in refusing to admit certain evidence under a part of appellant's answer which she characterizes as a plea in abatement, and this is the sole remaining point made. To be more specific, she contends that her pleading set up the plea of former action pending. The part of the answer which is now in question presented the claim of appellant that the real arrangement between her and respondent was that she was to have an undivided one-half interest in the property in suit after its acquisition, instead of a mere leasehold interest to use up the amount advanced by her to aid in completing the purchase, and that respondent fraudulently took title in severalty to the premises in his own name. The pleading then alleged that appellant had instituted an action for the purpose of establishing her one-half interest in the property, that respondent had answered her complaint therein, and that a trial of the cause had been had. The pleading then averred:

> "That judgment was rendered in favor of this defendant, and that thereafter, to wit, on the 2d day of February, 1921, there was filed and docketed in the above-entitled court a judgment in favor of this defendant, adjudging her to be the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the property described in * * * plaintiff's complaint."

It is especially to be noted that this pleading was filed April 14, 1921, 71 days after the entry of the judgment pleaded. As the statute allows but 60 days within which to appeal from a final judgment (Code Civ. Proc. § 939), the judgment in this instance had become final. Therefore the plea certainly was not a plea in abatement. Accordingly, evidence could not have been received under it as a plea of that kind. If appellant had alleged that a motion for a new trial was pending and undetermined in the action or that an appeal from the judgment was pending therein, the nature of the plea would have been entirely different.

It is to be remarked that the facts disclosed by the record are in such condition that the plea as made could not have been availed of by appellant as a plea in bar, if for the moment we assume, although we do not decide, that it may be viewed as a plea of that nature.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LAKENAN. (Cr. 1088.)

1. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—New trial granted for newly discovered cumulative evidence, rendering different result probable.

If newly discovered evidence, though cumulative, is so overwhelming as to render a different result certain or probable, a new trial should be granted.

2. Criminal law 🔑1156(3)—Whether newly discovered cumulative evidence renders different result probable is for the discretion of the trial judge.

Whether newly discovered cumulative evidence is so overwhelming as to render a different result certain or probable, so as to justify a new trial, is not a question of law, but a question of fact for the trial judge, whose discretion will not be interfered with on appeal, unless manifestly abused.

3. Criminal law 🔑938(1)—Newly discovered cumulative evidence held not so overwhelming as to require new trial.

Newly discovered cumulative evidence held not so overwhelming as to render a different result certain or probable, so as to require that a new trial be granted.

4. False pretenses 🔑49(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of grand larceny.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of grand larceny by means of the confidence game.

5. Criminal law 🔑97(1)—Conviction based on confidence game held proper, though money was passed in another state.

A conviction of grand larceny by means of the confidence game held not contrary to law, because the money was passed in another state, in view of Pen. Code, § 27.

6. Criminal law 🔑779—Instruction as to acts and declarations of coconspirators held proper.

In a prosecution for grand larceny by means of the confidence game, an instruction regarding the acts and declarations of coconspirators held proper, as directly pertinent to the prosecution's theory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; George Samuels, Judge.

John Lakenan was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr and Harry C. Morrison, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ezra W. Decoto, Dist. Atty., and Charles Wade Snook, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for the People.

STURTEVANT, J. Under an information filed by the district attorney, the defendant was accused of grand larceny. The jury returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty as charged in the information. The defendant moved for a new trial, the motion was denied, and the defendant has appealed.

The fifth point made by the appellant is the one which he stresses in his brief and in his argument. In that point he claims that the trial court erred in denying his motion for a new trial, in the face of the fact that he presented two affidavits which tended to establish his defense, an alibi. The correctness or incorrectness of the ruling of the trial court depends upon a consideration of the contents of the affidavits in connection with other facts contained in the record.

On the morning of the 3d day of October, 1921, the prosecuting witness, W. G. Woolfrey, arrived in San Francisco from Moose Jaw, Canada. After he had had his breakfast he stood in front of the Ferry building in San Francisco, and a man approached him and passed the time of day, and finally suggested to Mr. Woolfrey that he take a trip to Golden Gate Park, and at the same time pointed out the street car which Woolfrey should take. After Woolfrey got on the car he was approached by a man who introduced himself as L. H. Sterling. Sterling and Woolfrey spent the day in Golden Gate Park, and later went to the Sunset Hotel on Market street. The next morning Sterling and Woolfrey had breakfast together and then they crossed the bay for the ostensible purpose of seeing the wild ducks on Lake Merritt. After they had arrived in Oakland, and, as they were passing the Hotel Oakland, they saw a man standing in the doorway, and Sterling remarked: "Oh, by the way, there is some one over there I know; some one from Rochester." That man was subsequently introduced as Chetwell. Thereafter such proceedings were had that Woolfrey was led to believe that he could make a large sum of money through the instrumentality of his new acquaintances by investing on the stock exchange. Chetwell claimed to be possessed of inside information and took charge of placing the orders. Two papers, or vouchers, were made out, one in Sterling's name and one in Woolfrey's name, and Chetwell pretended to present the same to the exchange in Oakland. From time to time during the proceedings Chetwell would desist from saying something, or doing something, remarking at the time, "There is my auditor, and he must not know anything about it." Who the auditor was the record does not show. As a part of the general scheme it was claimed that Chetwell had been transferred to Reno, and it thereupon became necessary for Sterling and Woolfrey also to go to Reno. On October 25th, pursuant to previous arrangement, Chetwell, Sterling, and Woolfrey were at Reno for the purpose of finishing the business. A disagreement arose as to who should take the moneys to the exchange and draw down the winnings. Presently it was agreed that Sterling should go to the exchange and bring a man from the exchange to verify the fact that the individuals who had made the stock purchases were responsible financially. He went out and in a short time returned with a man purporting to come from the exchange. It was claimed by Woolfrey that the individual who returned with Sterling was the defendant, John Lakenan. Whoever the individual was, when he came into the room he had the two vouchers in his possession which Sterling and Woolfrey had signed in Oakland when they made their bid on the stock. To that man Sterling and Woolfrey exhibited their moneys and later delivered to him their moneys, which he took away with him, saying: "You come over in about twenty minutes and it will all be refunded to you with the winnings."

The money was not seen again. The representative of the exchange was not seen again in Reno, and the other actors dispersed. Woolfrey went from Reno to Portland, where he reported the matter to the police. The police sent him to Oakland, where he reported the matter to the Oakland police, and the Oakland police commenced their investigation. In the meantime Woolfrey remained in Oakland. Toward the end of November, while he stood at the railroad station at Fourteenth and Franklin, he was approached by Victor A. Dunn, who introduced himself as an attorney, and stated that he would undertake to recover Woolfrey's moneys on a contract which he wrote out and which provided that the attorney should receive 50 per cent. of the moneys recovered as his compensation. After Mr. Dunn had obtained his contract, and a short time before the 21st day of November, 1921, he asked the complaining witness to go with him to Fabiola Hospital to see a man that was there and to see if the man could be identified as one of the alleged conspirators. When they went to the hospital Woolfrey went into room 18. Mr. Dunn's stenographer, a young lady, remained outside of the door, and Mr. Dunn several yards away from the door down the hallway. When Woolfrey went into the room there was a man in bed propped up with pillows. Woolfrey said to him, "How are you?" the patient remarked, "I think you have made a mistake," whereupon Woolfrey replied, "Probably I have," and left the room. On the trial he testified that he was positive that the man in the bed was the man he had seen in Reno and the man who had obtained his money. He also testified that on the preliminary examination he had been asked the question and had answered, "You weren't sure the first time; weren't sure the second time? A. Not positive." He further testified that on the first visit to Fabiola Hospital he thought the man he saw in room 18 was the man he had seen in Reno, but he did not want to make a mistake; he wanted to be sure. He was not positive. On the afternoon of the same day the witness again went to the hospital with Detective Edward O'Donnell. The detective held a warrant for the arrest of the defendant upon his identification. Regarding that visit the witness testified that he and the officer went into the room where the defendant was in bed and that afterwards he told the officer he was almost positive that the defendant was the man. The officer testified that during that same evening Woolfrey told him he thought the defendant was the man. On the following day the witness and Officer Flynn went to the hospital. On that occasion the witness identified the defendant as the man who had received the witness' money at Reno, and the defendant was placed under arrest. The witness testified further that it was not until the time of the preliminary examination that the witness recalled to his own mind that the defendant was not only the man who had taken his money at Reno, but was also the man who had approached him at the ferry depot and had suggested to the witness that the witness visit Golden Gate Park. One of the main defenses which the defendant presented at the trial was an alibi. In support of his alibi he took the stand and testified in his own behalf. He also produced his wife and daughter, supporting his statement that he was in Oakland on the 25th day of October, 1921, the date that the prosecution claimed that Woolfrey had delivered his money into the hand of the defendant at Reno. In support of his motion for a new trial, the defendant read the affidavit of Ralph Lee. In that affidavit the affiant averred:

> "That on the 25th day of October, 1921, affiant was engaged in business at the town of Hayward in the said county of Alameda, state of California. That on the evening of said 25th day of October, 1921, your affiant saw and personally talked with the above-named defendant, John Lakenan, at affiant's place of business in the town of Hayward, county of Alameda, state of California."

The affidavit does not contain any further facts tending to fix and identify the date of that meeting. The defendant also tendered the affidavit of T. R. Rogers, his son-in-law, who was in Mendocino county at the time of the trial. In that affidavit the affiant avers:

> That the affiant and "the above-named Lakenan, during the months of October and November, 1921, resided at No. 25 Monte Vista avenue, Oakland, Cal.; that affiant saw and talked to the said John Lakenan practically every day during the month of October, 1921, and particularly on the 25th day of October, 1921, affiant saw and talked to the above-named defendant, John Lakenan, in the city of Oakland, county of Alameda, state of California."

Neither does that affidavit contain any additional facts fixing and identifying the particular date.

The motion for a new trial was denied. On the hearing of the motion the trial judge pointed out that the above affidavits were cumulative. The respondent urges the same point at this time. In reply the appellant contends that merely because the evidence was cumulative was not a sufficient ground for denying him a new trial. People v. Lapique, 136 Cal. 503, 69 Pac. 226.

[1, 2] It may be conceded that simply because newly discovered evidence is cumulative is not at all times, in and of itself, a sufficient reason for denying a motion for a new trial. For it is evident that new evidence, although cumulative, might be of such overwhelming character as to render a different result certain or probable, and in such case a new trial should be granted. But whether the evidence is of this character is not a question of law, but for the judgment of the trial judge, whose discretion will not be interfered with by an appellate court except in cases of manifest abuse. Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 690, 692, 62 Pac. 254. In People v. Buckley, 143 Cal. 375, at page 392, 77 Pac. 169 at page 176, concerning this point, the court said:

> "A new trial should not, however, be granted upon the ground of newly discovered evidence unless the showing as to such newly discovered evidence is sufficiently strong to render a different result probable. The question as to whether such a showing is made is one that is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the trial court, and the action of that tribunal in regard thereto will not be disturbed, except in cases of manifest abuse."

In People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, at page 4, 78 Pac. 235, at page 236, the court said:

> "The question as to the effect upon the case of the newly discovered evidence is from its nature peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, and, of course, should be determined by that court with a full realization of the responsibility involved, and the motion should undoubtedly be granted where the showing is such as to make it apparent to the trial court that the defendant has, without fault on his part, not had a fair trial on the merits, and that by reason of the newly discovered evidence the result would probably be, or should be, different on a retrial. But, unless the appellate court can plainly see that this discretion has been abused, that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a new trial, in view of the newly discovered evidence, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial will not be disturbed. Oberlander v. Fixen & Co., 129 Cal. 690, 692."

[3] Turning back to the affidavits of Ralph Lee and T. R. Rogers and looking at them separately, or considering them together in the light of the rest of the record, this court cannot say that the contents are of such overwhelming character as to render a different result certain or probable, or that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would result differently on a new trial. Under these circumstances we cannot say the trial court erred in denying the appellant's motion for a new trial.

[4] The appellant makes the point that the verdict is contrary to the evidence. It suffices to state that we have read the transcript from cover to cover. The prosecution introduced evidence which, if the jury believed it, covered each and every element of the offense alleged against the defendant.

[5] Because the money was passed at Reno in the state of Nevada a point is made that the verdict is contrary to law. The point is without merit. Pen. Code, § 27; People v. Chapman (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 127.

The appellant complains of certain rulings of the trial court arising during the course of the trial. We find not a scintilla of error in this connection. Such rulings were wholly impartial, and, with the assistance of counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the defendant, the case was fully presented by each side.

[6] The court instructed the jury regarding the acts and declarations of coconspirators. The appellant contends that the instruction was not only erroneous and had no application to the defense on which the defendant was on trial, but was calculated to confuse and mislead the jury in considering the testimony. It is not necessary for us to go further than to state that the instruction was directly pertinent to the theory of the case as stated by the prosecution, and there is nothing in the instruction tending in the least to mislead the jury, or to cause the members to give consideration to collateral matters.

WILLIAMS v. FLINN & TREACY et al.
(Civ. 4475.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑911(3)—That record does not show authority of succeeding judge settling statement does not prevent its consideration.

The fact that the record does not recite the conditions as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 653, under which a succeeding judge was authorized to settle a statement, does not prevent consideration of points urged therein; it being presumed, under section 1963, subd. 16, that a court or judge acting as such acts in the lawful exercise of his jurisdiction.

2. Exceptions, bill of 🔑41(1) — Bills held properly before court.

Where the time to present a bill of exceptions was extended to October 6, and on September 27 it was served, and on November 7 appellants presented a second bill and amendments thereto, all of which were referred to a referee to settle matters referred to in the bills which occurred before the referee, and after denial of motion for new trial on November 23, appellant's time to serve a bill after the denial of the motion was extended to December 20, and on December 19 appellants served a third bill, and on December 24 appellees served amendments thereto, all of which were referred to the referee for settlement and after settlement by the referee the trial judge settled and allowed the combined bill, which was presented on appeal with the certificate of the referee as to the portion relating to proceedings before him, the method adopted was a substantial compliance with Code provisions and properly presents the bills for appeal.

3. Interest 🔑18(2)—Allowed only from date of judgment, where damage not certain by calculation.

In action for an accounting, which included items claimed on express contract as well as on quantum meruit, and recovery was had for an amount arrived at after days of investigation, and the amounts found to be due plaintiff varied greatly from the amount asked for, and the damages were not certain nor capable of being made certain by calculation, interest prior to date of judgment was not proper (Civ. Code, § 3287).

4. Pleading 🔑237(3)—Refusal of amendment to defendant's pleadings to conform to proof before referee held an abuse of discretion.

Where an amendment to pleadings was necessary to entitle defendants to judgment in accordance with facts found by a referee, and to enable them to secure benefit of evidence introduced in their defense, refusing leave to amend their pleadings was an abuse of discretion.

5. Account, action on 🔑6(5)—Under general and special denial, defendants' right to contest items not limited to items specifically denied.

In action on an account, where plaintiff attached, as an exhibit to his complaint, an itemized statement showing the balance due, and defendant answered with general and specific denial that the exhibit attached was a full and complete statement of the account, under the specific denial defendants could contest each item of account, and their right was not limited by the individual items specifically denied in the answer.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1017—Referee's finding of fact has same weight as special verdict.

In view of Code Civ. Proc., §§ 644, 645, a referee's finding of fact is entitled to the same weight as a special verdict, and should be sustained, unless plainly not warranted by any reasonable view of the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by William H. Williams, Jr., against Flinn & Treacy, a copartnership, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Fabius T. Finch and Paul F. Fratessa, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

I. M. Peckham, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover commissions alleged to have been due to him from defendants, who were contractors for street work, as compensation for soliciting from owners of real property contracts to do street work. Plaintiff recovered judgment for $1,583.18 and the defendants have appealed.

[1] The first problem to be met has reference to the sufficiency of the record presented by the appellants; respondent vigorously objecting to a consideration of the points urged by appellants, upon the ground that said points are not presented by properly authenticated bills of exceptions. The record contains two bills of exceptions, with orders settling and allowing the same. However, several peculiarities distinguish the procedure followed by the appellants in preparing the record upon appeal. The action was tried in the superior court of the state, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, before Judge Hunt. It involved an accounting between the parties, which necessitated an investigation into transactions occurring during a long period of years. The trial judge appointed a referee "to take the evidence and report to the court his conclusion of fact thereupon." The referee proceeded with the hearing, which continued for several days. During this hearing the defendants discovered evidence which they contended entitled them to numerous credits against the plaintiff, which had not been set up in their answer, and they accordingly asked the referee for permission to amend the answer to include such credits. The referee announced that he would not postpone the hearing nor permit an amendment at that time, but would hear all the evidence that could be offered by either side, and when it was all before him he would permit amendments accordingly. After the hearing before the referee was completed, it became apparent to the parties that the referee, under the order appointing him, had no power to permit amendments to the pleadings. Defendants then asked the trial judge for permission to amend their answer to conform to the proof submitted by the parties and received by the referee, and upon which the referee had based his findings, in effect, that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $698.11. Permission to amend was refused, and defendants prepared a bill of exceptions directed to the order of Judge Hunt denying their motion to amend their answer and cross-complaint. In the meantime Judge Hunt had been succeeded in office by Judge Griffin, who sustained plaintiff's exceptions to the referee's report as to all credits allowed by said referee which were not specified in defendants' original answer, and settled said bill of exceptions directed to the ruling refusing leave to amend without any objection to said settlement having been made by the plaintiff. Plaintiff and respondent now objects to the consideration of said bill by this court upon the ground that it does not affirmatively appear therefrom that Judge Griffin was qualified to settle and allow the same.

It is contended that the bill should affirmatively show the existence of some one of the facts enumerated by section 653, Code of Civil Procedure, so as to bring the case within the rule of the Supreme Court permitting settlement by the successor of Judge Hunt. While the better practice, undoubtedly, would be as contended for by the respondent, and while the language of one or two of the earlier cases would seem to sustain his technical position, nevertheless, we think the later and better rule is that announced in the case of Lincoln v. Sibeck, 27 Cal. App. 61, 148 Pac. 967. That case was a stronger one for the respondent than is the instant case, because objection was made there to the settlement of the bill, while in the present case no objection was made. Nevertheless, in the case of Lincoln v. Sibeck, supra, it was said:

> "But the facts which might have justified the exception do not appear. If Judge Price had refused to settle the statement, or if any other condition described in section 653 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in rule XXVII of the Supreme Court, * * * had come into existence which would authorize another judge to act, then it would have been better practice to show such condition by proper recitals in the record, instead of relying upon the 'presumption of regularity' attending official acts of courts and their judges. In this instance, however, it seems that the presumption of law is sufficient to support the act of the judge in settling the statement, since there is a possibility that for some reason Judge Price had refused to settle the statement after request duly made. Under section 1963, subdivision 16, of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is presumed 'that a court or judge, acting as such, whether in this state or any other state or country, was acting in the lawful exercise of his jurisdiction.'"

[2] Judgment was rendered and entered by the court on August 29, 1921, and the defendants' time to prepare, serve, and present their bill of exceptions was extended by order of court to October 6, 1921. On September 27, 1921, defendants served such bill of exceptions, and on November 7, 1921, defendants presented said second bill and amendments thereto to the clerk of said court. Thereupon the court made and entered a minute order referring said bill of exceptions and amendments to the referee, to settle the same as to all matters referred to in said second bill which occurred before said referee. Defendants' motion for a new trial came on for hearing before said court, and was denied on November 23, 1921. Defendants' time to prepare and serve a bill of exceptions after the denial of said motion for the new trial was extended by order of court to December 20, 1921. On December 19, 1921, defendants served a third bill of exceptions, and on December 24, 1921, plaintiff served his amendments, and on December 28, 1921, said third bill of exceptions and amendments were presented by defendants to the clerk of said court, and the court thereupon made and entered a minute order referring said bill of exceptions and amendments to said referee for settlement as to all matters referred to in said bill and occurring before said referee.

The referee fixed January 11, 1922, at 2 o'clock p. m., at his office, as the time and place for the settlement of both said second and third bills of exceptions, and at said time the attorneys for both plaintiff and defendants appeared before said referee. Both said second and third bills of exception are substantially the same, so far as they refer to matters occurring before said referee, and said bills were settled as one bill; the referee certifying that they contained a full, true, and correct statement of all matters and proceedings had and taken before him in regard to such reference, and settling and allowing the same over the objections of plaintiff. On February 14, 1922, the trial judge also settled and allowed this combined bill of exceptions, which thus comes to us with the certification of the referee as to the portion thereof relating to proceedings before him and with the certificate of the trial judge as to the correctness of its statement of proceedings before the court.

This extended statement of the facts surrounding the settlement of the bills of exception presented in the record seemed necessary, in view of the many technical objections to the same raised by the respondent. We think the method adopted by the appellants substantially complies with the Code provisions governing the same and that the bills are properly before us.

[3] It is contended that the trial court erred in allowing plaintiff interest from February 1, 1918, and that interest should have been computed only from the date of the judgment. In this contention, we think the appellants are correct. Recovery was had for an amount arrived at after days of investigation by the referee. It was a case of an accounting, which included items claimed upon express contract as well as upon quantum meruit. The amounts found by the referee and the court to be due to the plaintiff varied greatly from the amount which he asked for in his complaint and which he had previously demanded from the defendants. We think this is a case where the damages are not "certain nor capable of being made certain by calculation," and therefore plaintiff is not entitled to interest thereon prior to the date of judgment. Section 3287, Civ. Code; Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 67, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 189 Pac. 117; Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 19, 184 Pac. 695.

[4] As to the action of the trial court in refusing leave to the defendants to amend their pleadings to conform to the proof introduced before the referee, were we of the opinion that such amendment was necessary in order to entitle defendants to a judgment in accordance with the facts found by the referee, and to enable them to secure the benefit of all the evidence which they had introduced in their defense, we should unhesitatingly say that the trial court abused its discretion in this ruling. It is true that it is only in exceptional cases that the action of the trial court upon a matter of this kind will be disturbed upon appeal, but we think this is such an exceptional case. It is the aim and aspiration of our system of law and the policy of our courts to afford substantial justice to litigants, and to that end liberal amendments are expressly permitted by our Code, and encouraged by our courts. In a case like this one, when a party has presented evidence such as would be sufficient upon which to base a finding in his favor as to his right to certain credits, and this evidence is presented during the course of a comprehensive investigation into the facts and figures, and at a time when the rights of the opposing party can be fully protected by the allowance of a continuance to enable him to meet such proof if he so desires, we can see neither reason nor justice in refusing permission to amend to conform to the proof. Indeed, to allow the plaintiff to recover a large amount in an accounting suit which the evidence has disclosed is not due him, merely because through inadvertence or other excusable neglect the defendant failed to set out in his answer all the credits to which he was entitled would be to settle a controversy without regard to the merits.

[5] However, in the present case, the plaintiff attached as an exhibit to his complaint a long, itemized statement of account, showing a balance due him of over $4,000. The defendants answered with general and specific denials of statements of fact and conclusions of law, and among the intricacies of that pleading we find a denial that "Exhibit A attached to plaintiff's complaint herein is a full or complete statement of any account between plaintiff and defendants." We think that under this denial the defendants were at liberty to contest each and every item of plaintiff's alleged account and that their right was not limited by the individual items of said account specifically denied in the answer. The evidence received by the referee contesting each item of said alleged account was, therefore, properly received under the general denial in defendants' answer; no amendment to the pleadings was necessary to entitle the defendants to the benefit of such evidence. The action of the trial court in sustaining plaintiff's objections to the findings of the referee in so far as they were based upon evidence contradicting certain items in plaintiff's account which had not been specifically denied in the answer was erroneous. That objection to the referee's report was not a good objection, and the said report should have been accepted without the change necessitated by the court's ruling in sustaining the exceptions of the plaintiff.

[6] A referee's finding on a question of fact is entitled to the same weight as a special verdict of a jury where the evidence was produced before and heard by him, or, as otherwise stated, must be given the same dignity on appeal as is required by the established practice as to any conclusion of fact made by a trial court. Section 644, Code Civ. Proc.; 23 R. C. L. 299. It should be sustained, unless plainly not warranted by any reasonable view of the evidence. Section 645, Code Civ. Proc. The trial court should have accepted the findings of the referee and given judgment in accordance therewith, allowing interest only from the date of judgment.

The judgment appealed from is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to accept and confirm the report of the referee and give judgment for the plaintiff in accordance therewith.

We concur: STURTEVANT, J; NOURSE, J.

PEOPLE v. PICKENS. (Cr. 926.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 15, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑29—Assault with deadly weapon and robbery held not parts of same offense.

Where the prime purpose of a conspiracy in assaulting prosecuting witness was not to rob him, but to drive him from the community, and robbing him was an afterthought, the robbery was not part of the same offense as the assault.

2. Assault and battery 🔑92—Robbery 🔑24(1)—Evidence held to sustain conviction of robbery and of assault with deadly weapon.

Evidence held to support a conviction of robbery and of assault with a deadly weapon.

3. Witnesses 🔑370(1)—Permissible on cross-examination to prove relationship between witness and party to affect credibility.

The jury are entitled to know a witness' bias to weigh his evidence, and it is permissible upon cross-examination to show the fact of relationship, fraternal or otherwise, existing between the witness and the party in whose interest he is called, as tending to affect his credibility.

4. Witnesses 🔑363(1) — Extrinsic evidence showing personal prejudice of witness admissible to determine credibility.

Extrinsic evidence may be introduced of any circumstances suggestive of probable personal prejudice of a witness, because the existence of such emotions renders a witness untrustworthy.

5. Witnesses 🔑370(1)—Testimony that witness' superior officer was member of Ku Klux Klan held irrelevant in absence of showing witness knew the fact.

Where in a prosecution for a felony it was in evidence accused was a member of the Ku Klux Klan, and accused's witness, a subordinate officer of the chief of police, testified that the reputation of the prosecuting witness was bad, rebuttal testimony that the chief of police was a member of the Ku Klux Klan held irrelevant in absence of showing that witness knew his superior officer was a member of the Ku Klux Klan.

6. Witnesses 🔑370(1)—Person to be affected as a witness by relationship or peculiar circumstances must have knowledge thereof.

In order that one, such as a witness, may be influenced by an emotion due to some circumstance such as relationship, the person thus affected must have a knowledge of the fact, and hence where in a felony prosecution it was in evidence accused was a member of the Ku Klux Klan, and his witnesses, who were subordinate officers of the chief of police, testified as to the bad reputation of prosecuting witness, evidence in rebuttal that the chief of police was a member of the Ku Klux Klan could not have biased witnesses where they did not know that their superior officer was a member of the Ku Klux Klan.

7. Criminal law 🔑1169(1)—Admission of evidence that witnesses' superior officer was member of the Ku Klux Klan held not prejudicial error.

In a felony prosecution admission of rebutting testimony that witness' superior officer, the chief of police, was a member of the Ku Klux Klan, though erroneous, because of absence of showing that witnesses knew their superior officer was a member of the order, held not prejudicial where the purpose of the evidence was to discredit witness' testimony, and the jury's verdict would have been the same even if the court had excluded the rebutting testimony.

8. Criminal law 🔑1173(2)—Refusal to instruct that accused might be convicted of lessor offense held not error when verdict would have been same if instruction were given.

In a prosecution for assault with a deadly weapon and for robbery, failure to instruct the jury that they might return a verdict of assault held not error where the only defense interposed was the attack upon the reputation of prosecuting witness, and the verdict, because of the evidence, would have been the same if the court had given the instructions requested.

9. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Judgment not reversed for technical errors not resulting in miscarriage of justice.

A judgment will not be reversed for technical errors in the admission of evidence and in misdirecting a jury, where such errors do not result in a miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

W. M. Pickens was convicted of robbery and of assault with a deadly weapon, and appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas Scott, Jr., of Bakersfield, and Charles Barnhart, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The appellant was convicted of two crimes charged in separate counts of an indictment. He was found guilty of robbery and of assault with a deadly weapon.

[1, 2] The following constitute the material facts: After making an appointment by telephone to meet them at a certain place, defendant and several confederates attacked one Clyde Richey, the complaining witness, when he alighted from a taxicab driven by him. One of his assailants attempted to put a black cloth over his head. Richey resisted, and during the struggle was beaten over the head by pistols or revolvers. At some time before the affray ended $350 was taken from his pocket. The approach of the witnesses Schultz and Hendricks caused the attackers to desist. They entered an automobile standing near by, which was identified as that of Pickens, and fled. Richey pursued them in his taxicab, and, after seeing appellant's machine swerve into a ditch and stick there, went for aid. He soon returned with a police officer and friends and found Pickens attempting to extricate his machine. The officer arrested Pickens and searched his car, in which was found, among other articles, a can of tar, a can opener, and a paint brush. It appears that Pickens was a rival of Richey's in the taxicab business, and evidence was introduced to show that the appellant had suggested the attack at a committee meeting of the Ku Klux Klan of which he was a member. To be more specific, his statement was, "that Richey's conduct was such that it would be good riddance to take him out of the city or give him a flogging." It is apparent that these facts permit the construction that the prime purpose of the conspiracy in assaulting Richey was not to rob him, but rather to drive him from the community, and that the robbery was an afterthought of one or some of the conspirators who took advantage of the opportunity presented to enrich themselves by appropriating Richey's money. Viewed in this light, the robbery was not a part of the same offense as the assault, and the case is substantially identical with People v. Bentley, 77 Cal. 7, 18 Pac. 799, 11 Am. St. Rep. 225. In that instance a conviction of robbery was sustained, although the defendant had been found guilty of having committed an assault with a deadly weapon upon the same occasion. In deciding the appeal the Supreme Court said:

> "The offense of which the defendant was first convicted was an effort to injure the person of the prosecutor with a deadly weapon; that of which he was last convicted was an attempt to take away the goods of the prosecutor from his person by intimidation or violence. The essential elements of the two offenses are not the same."

Tested by the rule announced for cases of this character in People v. Ciulla, 44 Cal. App. 727, 187 Pac. 49—that is, whether the evidence necessary to sustain a conviction of one offense would justify a conviction of the other—it seems clear that this judgment must be upheld. If robbery was not the purpose of the assault upon Richey, much of the evidence necessary to sustain the verdict of assault with a deadly weapon was not essential to establish the robbery, and that testimony which showed that a robbery was committed, and that Pickens was a party to it is capable of separation from that proving the assault with a deadly weapon. The essential elements of this robbery and of the particular assault of which appellant was convicted are not the same, although in general terms violence is involved in crimes of the class to which both belong.

[3] Appellant's second point is that the court erred in admitting evidence showing that Charles H. Stone, the chief of police, was a member of the Klu Klux Klan. Stone was not a witness, but Assistant Chief of Police Taylor had testified for the defendant that the general reputation of Clyde Richey for truth, honesty, and integrity was bad. The witnesses Cornwall, Hudson, and Lawson, all officers under Chief of Police Stone, had testified to the same effect. It was established that the defendant Pickens was a member of the same lodge of the order as the chief of police, and there was evidence to the effect that the offense had been suggested by Pickens at a committee meeting of the same lodge.

> "It is elementary law, supported by all authority, that the state of mind of a witness as to his bias or prejudice, his interests involved, his hostility or friendship toward the parties, are always proper matters for investigation, in order that truth may prevail and falsehood find its proper level. If the inner workings of a witness' mind are actuating his testimony, and the workings of that mind are brought forth to the light and held up in full view before the jury, results will be obtained much more in accord with truth and justice than though the witness' testimony is weighed and measured by his words alone." People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 Pac. 589.

For the purpose of fully weighing the evidence of any witness, the jury are entitled to know his bias or feelings in the case, if any there be. People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 626, 49 Pac. 833. It is permissible upon cross-examination to show the fact of relationship, fraternal or otherwise, existing between the witness and the party in whose interest he is called, as tending to affect his credibility. People v. Cowan, 1 Cal. App. 411, 82 Pac. 339.

> "No reason for holding that the witness must first be examined as to his hostility, and that then, and not till then, witnesses may be called to contradict him, because it is not a case where the party against whom the witness is called is seeking to discredit him by contradicting him. He is simply seeking to discredit him by showing his hostility and malice; and, as that may be proved by any competent evidence, we see no reason for holding that he must first be examined as to his hostility. And such, we think, is the drift of the decisions in this state and elsewhere." People v. Brooks, 131 N. Y. 321, 30 N. E. 189.

[4, 5] However, the fact of Stone's membership in the Klu Klux Klan without any proof that the witnesses whom it was sought to show were biased thereby had any knowledge of his being a member was clearly irrelevant to the issue. The evidence to which objection is made was offered in rebuttal. Its only purpose was to discredit the officers' testimony concerning Richey's reputation. Extrinsic evidence may be introduced of any circumstance suggestive of probable personal prejudice of a witness. The range of external circumstances from which probable bias may reasonably be inferred is too great for legal limitation, but the reason for admitting evidence of bias and interest is that the existence of such emotions renders the witness untrustworthy.

[6] It is self-evident, in order that one may be influenced by an emotion due to some circumstance such as relationship, the person thus affected must have a knowledge of the fact. It is inconceivable that the membership in the Ku Klux Klan of the chief of police could bias his subordinate officers, unless they were aware of his connection with the order, and no evidence appears in the record from which even an inference may be drawn that they possessed such knowledge.

[7] But, although the court committed error in overruling the defendant's objection to this testimony, we are convinced that no substantial prejudice resulted. As before stated, the only purpose of the evidence was an attempt to discredit the officers' testimony. If the court had sustained the objections and the jury had accepted as true the defense witnesses' assertions that the reputation of Richey for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community was bad, it is highly improbable that the jury's verdict would have been affected in the least. The essentials of Richey's story were fully corroborated by the uncontradicted testimony of others. The facts of the assault, as to time and place, the injuries received by the victim, the number of the assailants, their robes and revolvers, their conduct, manner, and direction of flight, the general description of their machine, and similar details were established by witnesses other than Richey. Then we find uncontested evidence of the pursuit by him of an automobile similar to that in which those who made the attack left the scene, and also to that of Pickens, to which, imbedded in a ditch by the road, Richey conducted witnesses. Again the record shows that Pickens' machine contained articles suggestive of a connection with the assault. The prosecution proved the existence of a motive upon the part of the appellant to injure the complaining witness and his efforts to induce others to join in unlawful conduct against him. These facts and others of a like character were established without dispute and by witnesses who were in no way impeached, and, considering them alone, we are satisfied that to reverse the judgment would indeed work a miscarriage of justice because of mere technical error.

[8] Certain instructions asked by the defendant were refused. These were as follows:

> "The court instructs the jury that, if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant committed an assault upon the person of Clyde Richey as charged in the indictment, but do not find from the evidence that such assault was made with a deadly weapon or with intent to kill and murder the said Clyde Richey, then you should find the defendant guilty of an assault."

And also this instruction:

> "The jury are instructed that, under the indictment charging the defendant with the crime of robbery, you may find the defendant guilty of any offense the commission of which is necessarily included in that with which he is charged, and you are therefore instructed that, under said indictment charging robbery, you may convict the defendant of a simple assault."

It is true that assault is an offense included within the charge of assault with intent to commit murder, and also that of robbery, but the evidence showed beyond question that Richey was attacked with deadly weapons and was robbed of $350. The failure to inform the jury that they might return a verdict of assault as an offense included in those charged in the indictment cannot be said to have been prejudicial error. The only defense interposed was the attack upon the reputation of the prosecuting witness for truth, honesty, and integrity. Had the court instructed the jurors as requested and informed them that they might convict the defendant of assault under the second count of the indictment, it is inconceivable that the verdict would have been otherwise than as it was rendered. Surely, if the uncontradicted story detailed by the people's witness is accepted as the truth, the conclusions reached by the jury were unavoidable.

[9] We have carefully studied the entire record, including the transcript of the evidence, and are convinced that no miscarriage of justice resulted from the errors in misdirecting the jury and in improperly receiving evidence. Under such circumstances a judgment will not be reversed. Section 4½, art. 6, Cal. Constitution; People v. Wong Hing, 28 Cal. App. 230, 151 Pac. 1159; People v. Fealy, 33 Cal. App. 605, 165 Pac. 1034.

CURTIN v. STATE. (Civ. 2613.)

1. Officers 🔑1—Service required by acts authorizing appointment of tax expert to sit with legislative committee on taxation held not to involve duties of "office."

St. 1909, p. 779, which by reference made act of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 390), a part, authorized the Governor to enter into an agreement with a tax expert to perform services required by the acts of 1905 and 1909, in investigating matters pertaining to the system of revenue and taxation and report measures deemed necessary to its revision and reform. Held that the services did not involve the performance of duties belonging to an office, the most essential characteristic of which is that the incumbent be clothed with some part of the sovereignty and that the duties be of continuous character.

2. Officers 🔑1—Test of "public office" is whether duties involve exercise of part of sovereign power.

The test as to whether a position created by statute is a public office is whether the duties of such position or employment involves the exercise of any part of the sovereign power of the state.

3. Officers 🔑30—Appointment of senator as tax expert to sit with legislative committee not violative of Constitution.

The duties of a state senator appointed under St. 1909, p. 779, as a tax expert, involving only a contract of employment, and not duties belonging to an office, did not violate Const. art. 4, § 19, as it read prior to amendment of 1916, that no senator during his term shall be appointed to any civil office of profit.

4. Interest 🔑19(1)—Interest not allowed in action against state on amount claimed under quantum meruit.

In an action against the state, authorized by St. 1921, p. 1592, on a contract of employment created under St. 1909, p. 779, where no definite sum was provided for compensation, and the action was on a quantum meruit, interest was allowable only from the date of judgment.

5. States 🔑215—No costs awarded against state in action authorized by statute.

In an action against the state, authorized by St. 1921, p. 1592, plaintiff, though victorious under its express provisions, cannot be allowed costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by J. B. Curtin against the State. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed as modified.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover against the state of California the aggregate sum of $11,947 for services rendered and moneys expended for and in behalf of said state. The authority for the maintenance of such an action against the state is to be found in an act of the Legislature of 1921, entitled:

> "An act to authorize suits against the state for services rendered to the state or for moneys expended in connection with such services, and regulating the procedure therein." Stats. 1921, p. 1592.

The plaintiff, from and including the year 1909, to and including the year 1913, which covered the period during which the services for which he herein sues were rendered, was a member of the Legislature of the state of California, representing in the senate the Twelfth senatorial district. The brief of respondent correctly states the facts and the history of the legislation by and under the authority of which the plaintiff performed the services and expended the moneys for which he here seeks reimbursement against the state as follows:

> "On March 10, 1905, Assembly Concurrent Resolution No. 21 was adopted by the Legislature. Statutes 1905, p. 1067. It provided for the appointment of a joint committee of the Senate and Assembly, consisting of four members, two to be appointed by the president of the Senate and two by the speaker of the Assembly, 'to examine into and report upon all matters connected with or in any way appertaining to the system of revenue and taxation in this state, and to further report such constitutional and legislative measures as may be deemed necessary to the revision and reform of said system of revenue and taxation.' Power and authority was given to the commission so that the investigation would be full and complete, with authority to employ all necessary clerical and expert assistants, to send for persons and papers, and to take all necessary means to procure the attendance of witnesses and testimony. It was further provided 'that, in the event provision is made by law for the existence of a commission for the revision and reform of revenue and taxation in force in this state of which the aforementioned committee is to be a constituent part, then and in that event the joint committee aforesaid and the members thereof are authorized to act as, and be an integral part and portion of, said commission.'
> "On March 20, 1905 (Statutes 1905, p. 390) an act which authorized the Governor to appoint an expert in taxation and public finance to sit with the joint committee authorized by Assembly Concurrent Resolution No. 21 when appointed, was passed. The Governor was made an ex officio member of said commission. In section 4 of the act, there is, in effect, a repetition of the powers given to the joint committee as contained in the concurrent resolution. Section 5 of the act provided that the members of said commission, other than the Governor, as chairman thereof, and the expert, should be paid for their services the sum of $10 per diem and their necessary expenses while actually engaged in the performance of their duties as prescribed in the act. By section 6 an appropriation of $10,000 was made. It is thus recognized by the Legislature that the two senators and the two assemblymen who were appointed on the commission were to be paid $10 per diem while engaged in the performance of their duties, and in addition thereto their necessary expenses. The act did not provide that any member of the committee should take an oath of office or give a bond. There was no term fixed. There was no time fixed for the making of the report. There was specified work required to be done, to wit, 'to investigate the system of revenue and taxation in force in this state and to recommend a plan for the revision and reform thereof.' When this investigation of the specific matter was completed, and report made, the work directed would be finished. The Governor was authorized to appoint the expert in taxation and public finance to sit with the committee and to be a member thereof. If there was a vacancy caused by any reason in the personnel of either of the senators or either of the assemblymen, there was no power of appointment given. If the work was not completed during the term of office of either of the two senators or of the assemblymen, it was, nevertheless, to be continued by the committee so appointed by the Legislature until the investigation had been fully made and the recommendations filed.

"There is no evidence that any oath of office was taken by the plaintiff under the act of March 20, 1905. Plaintiff was one of the senators appointed by the president of the Senate."

It is readily to be seen that the object of the act of 1905 was to facilitate an investigation of the tax system then in vogue in California by persons who had had special experience in the fiscal affairs of the state, and to that end acquire information and data and to report the same to the Legislature, so that the law-making body could have an intelligent basis upon which to reform or correct the defects in the system as it existed at the time of the enactment of the act of 1905. The report of the commission of the Legislature of 1907 of its investigations of the matters submitted to it in pursuance of the provisions of the act of 1905 embraced a proposed constitutional amendment, which was subsequently adopted by the Legislature of 1907 and submitted to the vote of the electors at the ensuing general election. That proposed constitutional amendment, although supposed to involve the correction or the reformation of the then existing system of taxation and the improvement of said system, was, nevertheless, upon consideration by the people, regarded as wholly inefficient for the purposes for which it was designed, and was consequently rejected at the general election in November, 1908. The Legislature of 1909, still sensible of the deficiencies in the then existing tax system, and for that reason desiring that the investigation authorized by the act of 1905 should be further pressed, and something more practicable evolved and formulated than the scheme contained in the proposed but rejected constitutional amendment, passed the act of 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 779). The act of 1909 by reference makes the act of 1905 a part thereof, particularly in so far as are concerned the purposes designed to be accomplished by said acts.

The act of 1909 "authorized the Governor of the state to appoint 'one person versed in matters relating to taxation, and a secretary, who shall be an expert on the science of finance and taxation, to carry on the work' provided for in the act of March 20, 1905, and the persons so appointed were to carry on the work mentioned. J. B. Curtin, the plaintiff, was appointed by the Governor as the 'one person versed in matters relating to taxation,' but no oath of office was required of him or of the Secretary, who was to be an expert on the science of finance and taxation, and no term was fixed, but it was contemplated that the work should be done by the two. There was an appropriation of $5,000 to be used for the purpose of carrying on the work mentioned, and to pay the necessary expenses of the members of the commission while engaged in the performance of their duties and the salary of the expert mentioned, and for all necessary clerical, printing, and other expenses connected with the work of carrying out the provisions of the act. While in the act of March 20, 1905, each member of the commission was to receive a per diem of $10 while actually engaged in the performance of his duty, the act of March 25, 1909, omitted such provision, but contemplated that the claims for each should be subject to approval by the board of control—board of examiners (?)—thus leaving the question of the compensation of the person 'versed in matters relating to taxation' to be fixed from time to time, based upon the reasonable value of his services. The expert, who was to act as secretary, was to have a salary, but the amount thereof was not mentioned in the act of March 25, 1909.

The complaint alleges and the answer admits, that the plaintiff was on the 8th day of June, 1909, appointed or employed by the Governor of the state as "the person versed in matters relating to taxation," to carry on, in conjunction with the secretary, who was likewise appointed by the Governor, the work provided for in the acts of the Legislature of 1905 and 1909. The complaint further alleges that the plaintiff, continuously during the period from June 8, 1909, to and including June 8, 1913, acted as a member of the Commission mentioned in the act of 1909, and performed services for the state of California as such member of said commission and "that the reasonable value of such services as such member of said commission was and is the sum of $208.25 per month, during the said period hereinbefore mentioned, and that no part of said sum has been paid." It is alleged that the labor and services rendered by the plaintiff as a member of said commission, and which were accepted by the Governor of the state and by the Legislature of the state of California, were of great value to the state of California, and "as a result of said labor many millions of dollars of additional revenue not otherwise obtainable as taxes was thereby derived." The complaint then sets forth specifically the amount reasonably due the plaintiff for said services for each of the months from June 8, 1909, to and including June 8, 1913, said amount for each of said months being $208.25, totaling the sum of $10,000. It is further alleged that the appropriation provided for by the act of 1909 proved to be insufficient to carry on the said work, labor, and services called for by said act, "and no part of said money appropriated by said act of March 25, 1909, was ever paid to plaintiff, and that, in order to complete the said work, labor, and services, said plaintiff advanced from his own funds the sum of $1,947." The prayer is for judgment for the sum of $10,000 for the services performed and $1,947 for moneys expended, with legal interest on each sum from June 8, 1913, until the rendition of judgment.

The answer, of course, admits the passage of the above-mentioned resolution and acts of the Legislature relating to the matter of investigating the tax and fiscal system of the state and the provisions of said resolution and acts as to the appointment of a commission and the duties thereof. It also admits the appointment by the Governor of the plaintiff as a person versed in matters relating to taxation, as alleged in the complaint. On information and belief it denies that the plaintiff performed the services which he alleges in his complaint he rendered in behalf of the state, and that said services were of value to the state, and that the plaintiff expended the sum of $1,947 for necessary clerical, printing, traveling, and other expenses connected with the work as a member of said commission. It then alleges that, during all times mentioned in the complaint, the plaintiff was the duly elected, qualified, and acting senator of the state of California from the Twelfth senatorial district thereof; that the appointment of the plaintiff to the position mentioned "was and is in contravention of the provisions of section 19 of article 4 of the Constitution of the state of California, as said section read prior to November 7, A. D. 1916, and was wholly void and ineffectual."

The court found that during all the times mentioned in the complaint the plaintiff was a senator of the state of California, and upon the other issues found in favor of the plaintiff, and awarded him judgment for the aggregate amount for which he sues, together with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum and costs of suit. The appeal is from said judgment.

The plaintiff testified that he was compensated by the Legislature for the services rendered by him pursuant to the act of 1905. The claim here is, as above stated, entirely for services alleged to have been rendered by plaintiff under the act of 1909 for the period of time stated in the complaint. As to the last-mentioned services, there is no dispute that the same were performed or rendered as alleged in the complaint and above explained.

It should be stated that the plaintiff testified that, although the statute of 1909 does not require that the appointee of the Governor under said act as "a person versed in matters relating to taxation" shall take or execute an oath of office he (the plaintiff), nevertheless did take and execute such an oath prior to entering upon the discharge of his duties. Explaining this circumstance, the plaintiff stated that a prepared oath was forwarded to him at his office, and that he paid no attention thereto for several days, but finally signed and returned it to the secretary of state.

[1] The primary and all-important question involved herein is whether the duties imposed upon the plaintiff by the act of 1909 under his appointment by the Governor involved the exercise of the duties of an office or whether the plaintiff was merely employed to perform certain services for the state which have no reference to the sovereign powers of the state. In other words, did the statute of 1909 by providing for the appointment or employment of "a person versed in matters relating to taxation," create an office to which was annexed the exercise of a part of the sovereign power of the state, or does the provision that the Governor may make such appointment merely vest in the executive the authority to enter into a contract of employment with such a person to render for the state services which do not involve the exercise of a part of the state's sovereign power?

The theory of the plaintiff is that the act, in pursuance of whose provisions the services for which he here seeks compensation were rendered, did not create an office, but merely authorized the Governor to employ "a person versed in matters relating to taxation" for the purpose of gathering data and information upon which the Legislature, in the exercise of so much of the sovereign power of the state as the people through their Constitution have vested in it, might formulate a system of taxation; and, since the statute does not expressly provide for the compensation of the person versed in matters relating to taxation who might be appointed by the Governor under the act, the plaintiff has proceeded upon a quantum meruit upon the theory that his contract with the state was one of employment without any express understanding as to what his compensation should be, precisely as would be the case where a contract had been entered into between individuals for the rendition of services by one with no express agreement as to the compensation to be paid the latter for such services, in such case the person performing the services being entitled, obviously, to the reasonable value thereof.

The contention of the state is that the position to which the plaintiff was appointed by the Governor under the act of 1909 was and is an office, and that, under the terms of section 19 of article 4 of the Constitution, as that section read prior to its amendment in the year 1916 (see Stats. 1917 and Extra Session 1916, p. 54), the appointment of the plaintiff was absolutely void for the reason that he was at the time of said appointment a member of the Legislature of the state. Said section as it then read provides:

> "No senator or member of the assembly shall, during the term for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office of profit under this state which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which have been increased, during such term, except such offices as may be filled by election by the people."

We are of the opinion that the statute of 1909 merely authorized the Governor to enter into an agreement with any person versed in matters relating to taxation to perform the services required by the acts of 1905 and 1909, and that the services so required to be rendered do not appertain to or involve the performance of duties belonging to an office within the true meaning of that term.

> "The most essential characteristic [of an office] is * * * 'that the incumbent, in his independent capacity, is clothed with some part of the sovereignty of the state, to be exercised in the interest of the public, and required by law,' and that the duties are of a continuous character, as opposed to a mere temporary employment." Barker v. State, 69 Ohio St. 68, 72, 68 N. E. 575, 576, citing State v. Brennan, 49 Ohio St. 33, 29 N. E. 593; State ex rel. Armstrong v. Halliday, 61 Ohio St. 171, 55 N. E. 175.

In Robertson v. Ellis County, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 146, 84 S. W. 1097, the action was by an official stenographer of the district court of said county to recover a sum of money alleged to be due him for services rendered as such stenographer. The important question in the case was whether the position of stenographer for said court as created by an act of the Legislature of the state of Texas was an office. The Texas Court of Appeals held that the position was not an office within the meaning of the word "office" as used in a certain section of the Constitution of that state, and as it is commonly used in all the Constitutions throughout the United States. The reasoning of the court in that case is so pertinent to the situation here that we quote from the opinion therein in extenso as follows:

> "The definition of the term 'office,' as given by Mr. Mechem in his work on Public Officers, is quoted with approval by our Supreme Court in the case of Kimbrough v. Barnett, 93 Tex. 301, 55 S. W. 120, and is as follows: 'A public office is the right, authority, and duty created and conferred by law, by which, for a given period, either fixed by law or enduring at the pleasure of the creating power, an individual is invested with some portion of the sovereign functions of the government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public.' The act authorizing the appointment of official stenographers provides for their appointment by the judges of the district courts, and declares that they shall be sworn officers of the court, and shall hold their office during the pleasure of the court, and further declares that the purpose of such appointment is to preserve the record in all cases for the information of the court, jury, and parties, and, to that end, 'it shall be the duty of the official stenographer to attend all sessions of the court; to take full stenographic notes of the oral evidence in every case tried in said court, together with all objections to the admissibility of testimony, the rulings of the court thereon, and all exceptions to such rulings; to preserve all official notes taken in said court for future use or reference and to furnish to any person a transcript of all or any part of said evidence or other proceedings upon the payment to him of the compensation,' etc. Does the act confer upon the stenographer any sovereign function of government? We think not. There is quite a material difference between a public office and a public employment. As said by Chief Justice Marshall, 'Although an office is an employment, it does not follow that every employment is an office.' Mr. Mechem, in his work on Public Officers, says: 'The most important characteristic which distinguishes an office from an employment or contract is that the creation and conferring of an office involves a delegation to the individual of some of the sovereign functions of government, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the public; that some portion of the sovereignty of the country, either legislative, executive, or judicial, attaches for the time being, to be exercised for the public benefit. Unless the powers conferred are of this nature, the individual is not a public officer.' Now, while the fact that the position of stenographer is designated in the act providing for its creation as an office, and that it declares that the person who may be called to perform its duties 'shall be a sworn officer of the court,' affords some reason for determining it to be such, still it is believed the place possesses none of those sovereign functions of the judicial department of the government to which it relates, to distinguish it from a mere employment to perform a species of service, under public authority, for the assistance and convenience of the court and parties litigant therein, in which no judicial discretion or judgment is involved. The creation of the position, as shown by the very terms of the act, was designed for no other purpose than to provide some one by whom the oral evidence offered, and other proceedings involving objections made to admissibility of testimony, the ruling of the court, and exceptions thereto, might be taken in shorthand, as a method of preserving those matters as they occurred, without delaying trials, to be afterwards transcribed and furnished the court and parties to the suit, to aid them in an accurate and prompt preparation of the record. The report or transcript of the proceedings by the stenographer is not binding, however, upon the court, and may be adopted or rejected at his discretion. No act which he is authorized to do is independent of the control of others, or vested in him as a supreme power to be exercised as a right or prerogative of a judicial office. We conclude that while the position of a stenographer, under the statute in this state, may be, in a sense, an office, and the term thereof may continue for a longer period than two years, yet there is no such sovereign function of government embraced in the powers conferred upon the individual performing its duties as brings it within the meaning of the word 'office' as used in the section of the Constitution quoted."

In the case of Mulnix v. Elliott, 62 Colo. 46, 156 Pac. 216, the proceeding was for a writ of mandate to compel the auditor of the state to issue to him a warrant for expenses incurred as a member of a joint committee appointed by the two houses of the Legislature on the authority of an act of the Legislature to make a thorough survey and study of all institutions, boards, bureaus, departments, commissions, and other subdivisions of the government, and ascertain facts concerning the organization, functions, activities, methods, efficiency of employees, and "such other facts as may be necessary or desirable to enable it (the committee) to make recommendations for the purpose of securing greater economy and efficiency in the state government." It was claimed by the Attorney General in that case, among other things, that the appointment of the members of the Legislature as members of the committee so created was void under a section of the Constitution of the state of Colorado (art. 5, § 8) providing that "no senator or representative shall during the time for which he shall have been elected be appointed to any civil office under this state," the members of said committee being at the time members of the Legislature which passed the act authorizing the appointment of the committee. It was held that the act did not contravene the said provision of the Constitution, the court saying:

"It [said committee] cannot put any of its recommendations into effect, nor does the act purport to confer upon the committee any executive authority whatever, and hence, from the premise upon which the argument of counsel for plaintiff in error is based, does not violate either of the constitutional provisions invoked."

It may be added that in the Colorado case the committee appointed under the act and referred to was authorized, as is true in the case at bar, to subpœna witnesses and to compel the production of such books, papers, and documents as it might conceive necessary for the proper discharge of its duties. See, also, U. S. v. Germaine, 99 U. S. 508, 25 L. Ed. 482; Bunn v. People, 45 Ill. 397; Rhoden v. Johnston, 121 Ark. 317, 181 S. W. 128; Hall v. State of Wisconsin, 103 U. S. 5, 26 L. Ed. 302, which involves an extended discussion of the distinction between an office and a contract of employment.

The foregoing authorities are, it is clear, determinative of the question now in hand against the contention of the Attorney General. It is perfectly plain that the act of 1909 does not delegate either to the commission created by the act of 1905 or the expert in the science of finance and taxation or the "person versed in matters relating to taxation" any part of the sovereign power of the state. As stated, there were no duties committed to the plaintiff except such as were involved in services he was to render in securing certain desired information upon which the Legislature could form some intelligent judgment with regard to the correction of the recognized defects in the then existing tax system of the state. There was no definite tenure fixed for the position to which the plaintiff was appointed. The services to be performed were not of a continuing or permanent nature, but were of an intermittent character, to be rendered at such times and on such occasions as his convenience or the exigencies of the purpose for which he was appointed might require. The moment that he completed his investigation his services were at an end, or to be discontinued. He might have completed his labors within 60 days or within a year, or, as was true in this case, it might have required three or four years. As is declared in the brief of counsel for the respondent, "he was required to keep no place of business for the public use, and he gave no bond," and, it may be added, was required to give none. He was not required to execute an oath of office, and here we may state that the mere fact that he did do so could not and did not have the effect of changing the legal character or status of the services which he was required to render by the act under which he was appointed. His report or that of the commission of which he was a member by virtue of the provisions of the acts in question involved no definitive action, or action which was binding upon the Legislature or upon the state. Such report could be adopted or rejected at the will or in the discretion of the Legislature. In fact, the services which he was required to perform under his appointment or employment by the Governor merely involved work which may well be said to be analogous to the work of an architect with whom the state had entered into a contract for the furnishing of plans for a state building or a person employed to superintend the construction of a state building or similar in character to the letting of contracts by the state for the printing or publication of books or other documents required for the state's use in the administration of the affairs of the government. No one would say that a contract for the construction of a public building between the state and a contractor or a contract for the publication of books issued under the authority of the state would involve the delegation to the contractor in such cases of any part of the sovereign power of the state. And we repeat in a different form of language that there can be no distinction discernible between the arrangement made by the Governor with the plaintiff in this case under the acts in question and any other contract the state might make within the scope of its authority with a contractor for services rendered either in erecting a building for the state or in printing necessary public documents or in investigating various departments of the state with a view of formulating a plan for the correction of any abuse which might exist therein or for managing them more efficiently and economically than they might have been administered.

[2, 3] In brief, while the definitions given by the adjudicated cases of a public office are generally or substantially the same, and are governed by the facts and circumstances of each particular case, the principal test as to whether a position created by statute is or is not a public office is whether the duties of such position or employment involve the exercise of any part of the sovereign power of the state; and it is clear, as the authorities above referred to point out, and as seems to be plain upon the very face of the proposition as it is presented upon the facts in this case, that the position to which the plaintiff was appointed under the act in question was not only lacking in permanency of tenure and the conclusiveness of the work imposed by said position, which are some of the characteristics of a public office, but that it did not commit to the plaintiff the exercise of any portion of the sovereign power of the state. It follows, therefore, that his appointment involved a contract of employment, and did not violate section 19 of article 4 of the Constitution.

The conclusions announced in the California cases cited by the Attorney General are not, in our opinion, at cross purposes with the conclusion to which we think the facts of this case irresistibly lead. See Patton v. Board of Health, etc., 127 Cal. 388, 59 Pac. 702, 78 Am. St. Rep. 66; Wall v. Board of Directors, etc., 145 Cal. 468, 78 Pac. 951; Coulter v. Pool, 187 Cal. 181, 201 Pac. 120.

The Patton Case appears to be more particularly relied upon than the other cases cited. In that case it was held that a health inspector appointed as such by the board of health of the city of San Francisco by authority of section 3009 of the Political Code was a public officer within the meaning of section 16 of article 20 of the Constitution. But, as is pointed out in that case, the board of health of the city of San Francisco, being clothed with large and extensive powers and duties, having by virtue of section 3012 of the Political Code "general supervision of all matters appertaining to the sanitary condition of the city and county," was authorized by the statute "to devolve upon the health inspectors such portion of its powers and duties as the board may deem best for the good of the public service. So far as the evidence shows," proceeds the court in that case, "the duties thus delegated to the inspectors are not extensive, but they cannot be said to be unimportant or purely ministerial, or lacking in the requirements of judgment and discretion." The court further said in the Patton Case:

> "It seems to be reasonably well settled that where the Legislature creates the position, prescribes the duties, and fixes the compensation, and these duties pertain to the public and are continuing and permanent, not occasional or temporary, such position or employment is an office and he who occupies it is an officer. In such a case, there is an unmistakable declaration by the Legislature that some portion, great or small, of the sovereign functions of government are to be exercised for the benefit of the public," etc.

(The italics in the foregoing quotations are ours.)

Thus it is to be observed that the court in the Patton Case finds that the office of health inspector of the city of San Francisco possessed all the characteristics of a public office as the same is defined by the authorities first hereinabove referred to. Moreover, the court in the Patton Case referred approvingly to the distinction drawn by Bunn v. People, 45 Ill. 397, between an employment and a public office, it being held in said case that the commissioners appointed under an act of the Legislature to superintend the construction of the state house were not officers within the meaning of the Constitution, but were agents or employees for a single and special purpose, "whose functions ceased upon the completion of the work." Further referring to the Bunn Case the court said in the Patton Case:

> "The question was subsequently regarded in that state [Illinois] of sufficient importance to call for a constitutional definition, and hence in 1870 the Constitution ordained the following: 'An office is a public position created by the Constitution or law, continuing during the pleasure of the appointing power or for a fixed term, with a successor elected or appointed. An employment is an agency for a temporary purpose, which ceases when that purpose is accomplished'"—citing Const. Ill. 1870, art. 5, § 24.

The foregoing definition of an employment is in effect approved by the court in the Patton Case, and, as we have above shown and as must be obvious upon the slightest reflection, the employment by the plaintiff in this case under the act of 1909 comes within the definition given of "an employment" by the Illinois Constitution just quoted herein, since the employment was for a temporary purpose, and was to cease and did cease upon the accomplishment of the purpose of the employment or agency.

The other cases cited by the Attorney General come no nearer supporting his contention here than the case of Patton v. Board of Health, supra. It is not necessary to review those cases herein.

[4] Another question arising in this case is whether the plaintiff was entitled to interest upon the indebtedness due him from the state. Section 5 of the act of 1921, authorizing suits against the state for services rendered to the state, etc., provides:

> "In case judgment be rendered for the plaintiff in any such suit, it shall be for the amount actually due from the state to the plaintiff, with legal interest thereon from the time the obligation accrued, and without costs."

Undoubtedly, under that provision of said statute, if the contract between the Governor and the plaintiff had fixed a definite or determinate amount to be paid the latter for his services, he would be entitled to interest upon any amount due him from the state for the services so rendered. In this case, however, there was no definite or any sum provided in the statute of 1909 for the compensation of the plaintiff, and the action is upon a quantum meruit, which means, of course, that the exact amount, if any, to which the plaintiff would be entitled for his services was uncertain until the same had been determined by the court upon the presentation of evidence showing the amount, character, and value of the services rendered. In such case it has been held that interest is not allowable, upon the theory "that the person liable does not know what sum he owes, and therefore can be in no default for not paying." Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164. See, also, Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 239; Coburn v. Goodall, 72 Cal. 498, 14 Pac. 190, 1 Am. St. Rep. 75; Heald v. Hendy, 89 Cal. 632, 27 Pac. 67; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 317, 42 Pac. 811; Erickson v. Stockton & Tuolumne Co. R. R. Co., 148 Cal. 206, 82 Pac. 961; American-Hawaiian, etc., Co. v. Butler, 17 Cal. App. 764, 121 Pac. 709; Robinson v. American Fish, etc., Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 119 Pac. 388; Courteney v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 600, 117 Pac. 778; Keyes v. Nims, 43 Cal. App. 1, 15, 184 Pac. 695; Haun v. Rosenmayer, 46 Cal. App. 353, 189 Pac. 117; Civ. Code, § 1917. It follows that interest must be disallowed, and a modification of the judgment ordered accordingly.

[5] The court below erroneously awarded plaintiff costs of suit. The statute of 1921, supra, expressly provides that, in an action against the state in pursuance of its provisions, the plaintiff shall not, if victorious in the action, be allowed his costs.

The judgment is hereby modified by striking out the sum of $8,757.10, being interest erroneously allowed on the amount recovered by the plaintiff, and also by striking out the costs awarded plaintiff, and as so modified the judgment is affirmed.

NEW YORK LUBRICATING OIL CO. v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 10274.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1923. Rehearing Denied May 31, 1923.)

1. Railroads 🔑333(1) — Automobile truck driver crossing in front of electric car guilty of contributory negligence.

Where the driver of an auto truck, although fully aware of the approach of an electric car, closed his eyes to the danger necessarily involved in any attempt to cross the track, and blindly drove his truck into the path of the oncoming car, he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

2. Railroads 🔑327(7)—Duty of traveler to stop.

It is duty of automobile truck driver, approaching an electric railway crossing, to give way to an approaching car, if necessary, to avoid a collision.

3. Railroads 🔑330(4)—Traveler not justified in assuming operation at ordinary speed.

A traveler in approaching a railroad track is not justified in relying upon the assumption that the motorman would not in any way be negligent in the operation of his car, and therefore is not warranted in believing that the car was being operated at the usual and ordinary rate of speed.

4. Railroads 🔑324(1)—Care required in crossing tracks of electric railway.

As much care is required of a person crossing the tracks of an electric railway upon a private right of way in the open country as is required of a person crossing the tracks of a steam railway.

5. Railroads 🔑333(1)—Traveler crossing near approaching car negligent.

It is the duty of a traveler to note the speed at which an electric car is approaching, and if, when he last looks at the approaching car, it is within such a distance and going at such an apparent rate of speed as to cause a reasonable apprehension of danger, it is negligence to attempt to make the crossing.

6. Railroads 🔑333(1)—Traveler crossing immediately in front of approaching train, guilty of contributory negligence.

Where the physical facts shown by the undisputed evidence raise the inevitable inference that a person approaching a railroad crossing did not look or listen, or that, having looked and listened, he endeavored to cross immediately in front of a rapidly approaching train which was plainly open to his view, he is as a matter of law guilty of contributory negligence.

7. Railroads 🔑338—Finding of last clear chance essential to judgment.

In an action for damages resulting from a collision on a crossing, if the judgment for plaintiff can be sustained only on the theory of the doctrine of the last clear chance, it is essential that the court find that defendant had the last chance to avoid the collision.

8. Railroads 🔑338—Doctrine of last clear chance held inapplicable.

Where the driver of a truck, which could have been stopped within a distance of three feet was, although aware of the approach of an electric car, going 30 miles an hour, closed his eyes to the danger, and drove his truck into the path of the oncoming car and the motorman, while he was yet some distance from the point of collision, was likewise aware of the approach of the truck, held that there was no room for the application of the rule of the last clear chance doctrine.

9. Negligence 🔑83—Last clear chance doctrine stated.

The doctrine of the last clear chance is only applicable to a defendant who actually perceived the predicament and danger of a plaintiff in time to have avoided the accident by the exercise of due diligence, and defendant cannot be held liable on the theory that he would have discovered the peril of the other but for remissness on his part.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Franciso; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the New York Lubricating Oil Company against the United Railroads of San Franciso. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. M. Abbott and K. W. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Enid Childs, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco (J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff in this action recovered judgment against the defendant for damages to its auto truck resulting from a collision between the truck, operated by an agent of the plaintiff, and a suburban electric car, which was operated by the defendant upon a private right of way running parallel with Sloat boulevard, in the city and county of San Francisco. The case was tried without a jury. The defense of the defendant rested in part upon the plea of contributory negligence. The trial court found, among other things, that the defendant was guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the damage complained of and that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

It seems to be conceded, and properly so, that the motorman was guilty of negligence in his operation of the street car prior to the time of the collision. It is contended, however, in support of the appeal from the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, that the evidence shows affirmatively, and without contradiction, that the driver of the truck was, as a matter of law, likewise guilty of negligence which proximately contributed to the accident.

This contention, we think, must be sustained.

The evidence adduced upon the entire case tends to show the following facts: the collision occurred about 10 o'clock in the morning of a clear day in an outlying district of San Francisco. The crossing at which the accident happened was not a regular stop for cars. There was a sign overhead, "Cars Stop Here," but cars stopped at that point only on signal. On the north side of the car tracks was an aviation field and on the south side was practically open country. The car prior to and at the time of the collision, was moving toward the crossing at a speed of from 30 to 35 miles an hour. Until the car approached within 50 feet of the crossing the motorman did not give his entire attention to the track ahead of him. When the motorman ultimately discovered that a collision between the car and the truck was imminent and inevitable he jumped back into the car, and, after it had proceeded 300 or 400 feet beyond the point of collision, went forward and stopped the car.

The evidence is uncontradicted to the effect that the truck was approaching the crossing at the rate of 5 miles per hour and that the driver of the truck, some little time prior to the collision, looked and saw the car approaching the crossing, but continued driving the truck on in its course at the same rate of speed in an attempt to make the crossing. The evidence is also uncontradicted to the effect that, going at the rate of speed of 5 miles per hour, the truck could have been stopped within a distance of 3 feet; that the driver of the truck had, at all times, as he approached within 40 feet of the railroad crossing, an unobstructed view of the tracks for a distance of 700 feet; that from Nineteenth avenue, which is approximately 1,000 feet east of the point of collision, there is a descending grade of 2¾ per cent. on the defendant's private right of way, and down this grade the electric car was coasting; that the driver first saw the car approaching when he was 40 feet distant from the track and that at that time the car was 700 feet away; that he watched the approach of the car from that time until he reached a point 25 feet from the track, at which time the car was 500 feet away, and that he made no attempt to slow up, stop, or accelerate the speed of the truck. It is also an uncontradicted fact in the case that the driver of the truck did not at any time prior to the collision note or attempt to observe the speed at which the car was approaching the crossing.

[1] There is no escape from the conclusion, it seems to us, from the uncontradicted evidence as above outlined, that the driver of the truck, although fully aware of the approach of the car, closed his eyes to the danger necessarily involved in any attempt to cross the track, and blindly drove his truck into the path of the oncoming car, and was, therefore, guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. Martz v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 31 Cal. App. 592, 161 Pac. 16.

[2, 3] Admittedly the driver of the truck, not only could see, but actually did see, the car as it came down the descent at an excessive rate of speed. And if he could, as the evidence shows without contradiction, have stopped his truck at any time prior to the collision within a distance of 3 feet, then surely his failure to do so under the shown circumstances of an obvious and imminent danger was a failure to exercise that ordinary care which a reasonably prudent man is required by the law to exercise in such a situation. The failure of the driver of the truck to come to a stop upon the approach of the car is attempted to be justified by the admitted fact that he did not note the speed of the car, but relied upon the assumption that the car was going at its "regular rate of speed," and that therefore he had time to safely cross. It was the duty of the driver of the truck upon approaching the crossing to give way to the car, if necessary, to avoid a collision. Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Rys., 175 Cal. 1, 5, 164 Pac. 798. There is no showing as to what was the regular rate of speed of the electric cars in the vicinity of the collision, nor was there any showing that the driver of the truck knew the regular speed of the cars in that vicinity or elsewhere. The driver of the truck was not justified in relying upon the assumption that the motorman would not in any way be negligent in the operation of his car, and therefore the driver was not warranted in believing that the car was being operated at the usual and ordinary rate of speed. Hutson v. Southern California Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 703, 89 Pac. 1093; Alloggi v. Southern Pacific Co., 37 Cal. App. 72, 173 Pac. 1117.

[4] The rule with reference to the duty of a person approaching a railroad track is equally applicable to electric railroads which are being operated under conditions similar to those under which steam railroads are ordinarily operated. That is to say, as much care and caution is required of a person crossing the tracks of an electric railway upon a private right of way in the open country as is required of a person crossing the tracks of a steam railway. Martz v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., supra; Heitman v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 10 Cal. App. 397, 102 Pac. 15; Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 159 Cal. 494, 115 Pac. 320; Phillips v. Washington, etc., Ry. Co., 104 Md. 455, 65 Atl. 422, 10 Ann. Cas. 334.

[5] It was the duty of the driver of the truck to note the speed at which the electric car was approaching the crossing, and if, when the driver of the truck last looked at the approaching car, it was within such a distance and going at such an apparent rate of speed as to cause a reasonable apprehension of danger, it was undoubtedly negligence on the part of the driver to attempt to make the crossing. Martz v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra.

[6] It is the rule in this state that, where the physical facts shown by the undisputed evidence raise the inevitable inference that a person approaching a railroad crossing did not look or listen, or that, having looked and listened, he endeavored to cross immediately in front of a rapidly approaching train which was plainly open to his view, he is, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence. Martz v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., supra; Jones v. Southern Pacific Co., 34 Cal. App. 629, 168 Pac. 586.

[7] It has been suggested in support of the judgment that the trial court may have resorted to and applied the doctrine of last clear chance. It will be noted in this behalf that the trial court did not find that, under all of the circumstances preceding and attending the approach of the truck and the car, the defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the collision, and if the judgment in favor of the plaintiff could be sustained only upon the theory of the doctrine of last clear chance, then it was essential that the court find that the defendant had the last clear chance to avoid the collision. Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Tucker v. United Railroads, 171 Cal. 702, 154 Pac. 835.

[8, 9] But even if the findings of the trial court could be construed to cover the doctrine of last clear chance, we are satisfied that there is no room for its application to the facts of the instant case as presented in the record before us. It is a well-settled rule in this state that this doctrine is only applicable to a defendant who actually perceived the predicament and danger of a plaintiff in time to have avoided the accident by the exercise of due diligence. A defendant cannot be held liable upon the theory that he would have discovered the peril of the other but for remissness on his part. Herbert v. Southern Pacific Co., 121 Cal. 227, 53 Pac. 651; Harrington v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85; Thompson v. Los Angeles, etc., Ry. Co., 165 Cal. 748, 134 Pac. 709; Tucker v. United Railroads, supra. Conceding, however, that the motorman, while he was yet some distance from the point of collision, was aware of the approach of the truck, nevertheless it is an undisputed fact that the driver of the truck was likewise aware of the approach of the car, and that he could have brought the truck to a standstill within a distance of three feet. There was a concurrent duty, as a matter of law, upon the part of the driver of the truck to stop, if possible, before the actual collision occurred. Obviously the truck proceeding at the slow rate of speed mentioned, and with the ability to stop within the short distance of three feet, had the greater opportunity to avoid the collision. And so long as the negligence of the driver of the truck in continuing on in his course to the point of crossing the tracks of the defendant was contemporaneous and concurrent with that of the defendant's motorman, plaintiff cannot rightfully rest its case upon the doctrine of last clear chance. Young v. Southern Pacific Co. (Cal. Sup.) 210 Pac. 259.

Judgment appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE v. BERRY. (Cr. 2451.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 3, 1923. Rehearing Denied and Opinion Modified June 1, 1923.)

1. Larceny 🔑65—Evidence held to show defendant's participation with confidence operators.

In a prosecution for a grand larceny, evidence held to show existence of a conspiracy of which defendant was an active member, and his complicity with confidence operators to the extent of participating in the fruits of their unlawful operations.

2. Criminal law 🔑372(5)—Evidence of all transactions held admissible under similar offense rule as tending to prove a conspiracy.

In a prosecution for grand larceny under two indictments one of which charged grand larceny and an attempt to commit, and the other charged grand larceny, in several counts, from different individuals, and the verdict was acquittal on all charges except one wherein defendant was found guilty, evidence of each and all of the enumerated transactions was admissible under the similar offense law, as tending to prove a conspiracy, and hence acquittal on all but one of the crimes of the consolidated indictment did not make the evidence of the other offenses inadmissible to show defendant to have been a member of the general conspiracy.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Otis B. Berry was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Paul W. Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. Two indictments, one numbered 15595 and the other numbered 15932, were returned by the grand jury of Los Angeles county. That numbered 15595 contained five counts, in four of which defendant, with William Metler (alias Dorchester), Abner B. Thompson, Fred Williams, Joe Stanley, J. Carter, George Carter, John Doe Hathaway, J. W. Davis, and Fred Mayen, was charged with the crime of grand larceny; in the other count the same persons were charged with an attempt to commit the crime. Indictment numbered 15932 contained two counts, in each of which defendant, with Joe Quigley and John Doe Hathaway, was charged with the commission of the crime of grand larceny. In count No. 1 of indictment No. 15595 the subject of the larceny was $43,000 in cash and a check for $1,176.45, obtained from one Thomas Donahue. Count No. 2 was a different statement of the offense alleged in count No. 1. In count No. 3 the charge was that of obtaining from John F. Herr certain certificates of corporate stock, bonds, and a book of traveler's checks, in all alleged to be of the value of $17,120. In count No. 4 the subject of the larceny alleged was $24,000 in cash, obtained from John Bassler. Count No. 5 charged an attempt to commit grand larceny from Simon Weiss. In indictment No. 15932, count No. 1 charged the commission of grand larceny of certain United States bonds of the value of $2,255, from Albert Hageman, and count No. 2 thereof was a different statement of the offense charged in count No. 1.

These indictments were consolidated, and defendant, severing from his codefendants, was tried thereon, the result of which was a verdict of acquittal upon all the charges save and except that presented by count No. 3 of indictment No. 15595, wherein he was found guilty, as therein charged, of the larceny of the property described therein as belonging to John F. Herr. Judgment followed, from which defendant has appealed.

Appellant's chief contention is that the verdict is not justified by the evidence. The record on appeal is voluminous, consisting of some 3,200 pages.

It appears that prior to February 3, 1920, defendant was assistant cashier of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank at Los Angeles, which bank, upon said date, upon opening a branch bank at Hollywood, placed him in charge thereof as manager. It also appears that in 1919 and in the early part of 1920 a band of crooks, commonly known as bunkomen, were operating a scheme whereby, due to their cupidity and gullibility, a number of persons possessing means were illegally divested of their property. The modus operandi of these conspirators is specifically stated by appellant, with some slight variations, as follows:

For at least several months prior to April, 1920, Los Angeles and vicinity was infested either with one general band of "crooks" or several and distinct bands of "crooks." Whether it was one general band or several bands working independently need not be discussed. Suffice it to state that, in the general outline, their nefarious schemes of defrauding were the same. About that time some 200 "crooks" were in and around Los Angeles, working this game; that there were several different headquarters; that some of the gangs belonged to a "trust" and some did not; that some $100,000 to $200,000 per week had been taken out of Los Angeles for months by these gangs.

The defrauding scheme is what is known in police parlance as the "pay-off game"; and when reduced to its brutal last analysis consists in making some "honest" tourist to the beautiful shores of California believe that he can make a hugh fortune by "playing" Wall street through some local "brokerage house," and, in any event, he can escape liability for loss, if he loses, by the use of fictitious or "phony" checks or "credit slips." He "wins" anywhere from $10,000 to a quarter of a million dollars; some trouble arises with the "brokerage house" in the matter of paying the "winnings," and this trouble is usually over the "credit slips," in that the money "won" cannot be paid until "credit is established" in order that the "brokerage house" may know that the "victim" could have paid his loses if he had lost; the victim usually goes hurriedly back to his home town and there converts everything available into current funds; more hurriedly he returns here to collect his "winnings"; another "play" is made; some "mistake" is made therein and all is "lost"; he is then sent to some far off city to wait the arrival of his associates and all will be regained by "playing" Wall street again on the money to be furnished by his associates—who never come.

Needless to say the "brokerage house," the "play," the "winnings," and all else are pure fake. Readily to be apprehended is the fact that the securities—cashiers' checks, drafts, certificates of deposit, stocks, bonds, or what not—which the victim brings back from the East, must be converted into cash as speedily as possible and at the same time in a manner not to arouse suspicion.

The larceny for participation in which the defendant was convicted was one of several with which he was connected, evidence as to which was received at the trial. It is not necessary to detail it at great length, it being sufficient to refer to that part of it implicating the defendant. It may be premised that if each transaction stood alone, being conceived and conducted independently of the others and by different individuals, the defendant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify his conviction might have some force; but it clearly appears from the evidence that the offense of which the defendant stands convicted was but one of a series in all of which he was personally active, cooperating with different actors; and while in some cases his participation might appear to be innocent if it had been confined to each of them respectively, his connection with all of them gives special significance to acts which might otherwise not suggest criminality.

Walter Evans was defrauded by Fred Mayen of $3,000, the two being engaged in a fictitious transaction ostensibly of a dubious character. Evans having a draft for this amount, drawn on the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles, was induced by Mayen to cash it at the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, of which the defendant was an officer, upon the representation that if presented to the Citizens' National Bank the nature of their transaction might be discovered. The defendant personally assisted in cashing the draft.

One Falligan became poorer by $20.000 through acquaintanceship made casually with Hathaway and Franklin. They persuaded him to open a small account at the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank. He thereupon drew a check for $10,000 upon his home bank in Denver, Colo., and deposited it at the first-named bank for collection. In due course he received from this bank a cashier's check for this amount, payable to himself, which he indorsed and handed to Hathaway on February 3, 1920. On this day the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank opened a branch in Hollywood and placed the defendant in charge thereof, and on the same day the defendant presented this check to the First National Bank of Hollywood, bearing no indorsement from Hathaway, from whom he received it, and collected the amount thereof in cash. A second check for a similar amount, being a cashier's check issued by a bank in Colorado, was received by Falligan, who desired to cash it at the main office of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank, but was persuaded by Hathaway to take it to the Hollywood branch and to see the defendant personally about converting it into cash. Hathaway accompanied Falligan to the bank, but stood outside during the transaction.

John Gunther was swindled out of the sum of $15,000 by Stensland and Hathaway. Gunther had received from an eastern bank drafts aggregating that amount, which that bank directed him to present to the Continental National Bank of Los Angeles. He there deposited them for collection. He was then told by Stensland and Hathaway that he must transfer his account to the Hollywood branch of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank and do business only with the defendant. He accordingly drew a check for this amount in favor of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank and handed it to the defendant for collection, who informed him that the money would probably be available the next day, February 25th. On that day Stensland, at the suggestion of Hathaway, took Gunther to Santa Barbara, where, on February 28th, they received a telegram from Hathaway telling them to return to Los Angeles, which they did, arriving there the next day, when Hathaway informed Gunther that his money had come. Gunther remarked, "We can do nothing to-day for it is after 3 o'clock, and the bank will be closed," to which Hathaway replied that the side door would be open. They all three went to the bank, Hathaway and Stensland remaining outside, and Gunther saw the defendant and withdrew the $15,000 in currency. In collecting this check the defendant did not send it through the clearing house, but personally presented it to the Continental National Bank; he demurred to receiving a cashier's check for it, contrary to the usual courtesy between banks, and demanded cash. Gunther had not notified the defendant that he would require cash. It is also significant that Hathaway appeared to know when the money became available at the defendant's bank.

William Scheider lost, by the machinations of Anderson, Harris, and Mayen, $8.200. He desired to do his business with a certain Los Angeles bank, but Harris insisted that he should do it at his bank, and took him to the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank (where, in fact, he had no account) and introduced him to the defendant. Later, in the course of a fictitious transaction, Harris and Mayen took Scheider to the defendant's bank to draw therefrom the above-named amount; they remaining outside. The money was handed to him by the defendant in a bundle inclosed in an envelope. Upon his emerging from the bank Harris remarked, "I will get my money, too," entered the bank, and in a few minutes returned carrying a package identical in appearance with that of Scheider. As we have seen, Harris had no account with this bank or any business with it.

Basler was defrauded of $24.000 by Rogers and Sellers in a spurious stock transaction. They persuaded him to go to the bank of the defendant at Hollywood, saying that it was not advisable to deal with the big banks of Los Angeles, but they knew a bank in the country where they could deal safely. He followed this advice, and in the course of their dealings went to the defendant's bank for the purpose of withdrawing $24,000, going there in Sellers' automobile, accompanied by Sellers and Rogers. These two remained outside in the machine at a point whence they could see through the glass side and front of the bank what occurred in the defendant's office. Basler asked for his money. The defendant appeared to be very nervous and excited and took Basler down into the unfurnished basement of the bank and showed him a copy of a newspaper, "The Pink Record," of the previous day. Basler not having his glasses, the defendant read to him an article consisting of an expose of the methods of a criminal band of swindlers, telling Basler not to say a word or he (the defendant) might have his head blown off or his throat cut. Basler, who was somewhat deaf, had not heard all that was read, and asked the defendant what he meant, to which he replied, "Go outside and tell those men your money has not come." But Basler insisting, the defendant led him upstairs and paid him $14,000, and promised to at once telegraph to a bank in Texas, upon which the remaining $10,000 had been drawn, and if that draft had been honored he would pay Basler the amount on receipt of the answer. He requested him to return at about 4 o'clock that day (Saturday), and promised that he would remain at the bank and keep enough money out of the vault to pay the draft. Basler returned at the appointed time, was admitted by the defendant through a side door, and received from him the remaining $10,000.

Hageman was another visitor to Los Angeles whose stay there was marred by the loss of the proceeds of the sale of $2,700 of Liberty bonds as the result of his acquaintance with two confidence operators, Quigley and Hathaway, already named. At their instance he opened a small account at the bank of the defendant at Hollywood. Quigley introduced him to the defendant, and requested him to write a letter to a bank in Nebraska, instructing that bank to forward Hageman's bonds. The letter was dictated by Quigley, typewritten by defendant, and signed by Hageman. A couple of days later Hageman called again at the bank and stated to the defendant that he was afraid he was in bad hands and would lose his bonds, saying, "I don't trust those fellows," to which the defendant replied, "If you are as careful as you are now, they can't beat you out of them." The bonds arrived in due course, and at Hathaway's suggestion Hageman requested the defendant to buy them, which the defendant said he could not do, since they were registered bonds, but that if Hageman would indorse them he would sell them for him. It was accordingly arranged that the defendant would sell them in Los Angeles and meet Hageman and Quigley on a street corner there and turn over the money in an hour. Defendant took the bonds to the Citizens' National Bank and sold them for $2,470. He then met Hageman and Quigley at the appointed place, took them into the lobby of a nearby hotel, and, according to Hageman's version, turned over to him $2,235, according to his own account the full amount. The defendant took no receipt or other evidence of payment.

Donohue parted with over $42,000 through the intermediary of defendant's friend Dorchester and the latter's confederate Thomson. Complying with Dorchester's suggestion that he sell his securities, to the value of the above-named sum, he accompanied Dorchester to the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank. He there, following the directions of Dorchester, who remained outside, saw the defendant, to whom he stated his business and that he had been recommended by Dorchester. The defendant replied that Dorchester was a friend of his and that he had known him for a couple of years. The defendant undertook to sell Donohue's securities through a stockbroker, A. W. Coote. Donohue and Thomson then left the city for a few days, and being at Riverside they received a telephone message from Dorchester to come back to the city; that the money was available. The next morning Donohue, accompanied by Dorchester, went to the defendant's bank. He was then in possession of a check which, added to the money to be received for his securities, amounted to $42,032. Dorchester again remained outside the bank. Defendant at this time, having received from Donohue the before-mentioned check, handed to him the balance over and above $42,000, and told him to return a little later. He did so, again accompanied by Dorchester, who, as before, did not enter the bank, and was now told by defendant that his money was in town but that he (Berry) did not have it in the bank, but to sit down while he went out to get it. The defendant at that time had a check from Coote, the broker, drawn against his own bank, which he had procured personally from Coote's office. In leaving the bank the defendant passed close to Dorchester, but Donohue could not tell if any conversation occurred between them. The defendant then went to the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank and cashed the first of the above-mentioned checks. He had had issued by his own bank a draft for $40,000 against the Coote check. He personally carried this draft to the Citizens' National Bank and received on it $40,000 in large bills. He added to this amount about $1,400, the balance of the Coote check. When he returned to the waiting Donohue, he had a bundle wrapped in a peculiar colored glazed paper, which he unwrapped, disclosing three smaller packages, each wrapped in the same kind of paper. The defendant stated the different amounts of money in each package, aggregating $42,000, without, however, exposing the same to view. He then wrapped the three packages in one bundle, and told Donohue that he was in a hurry and that Donohue could count the money later. As Donohue was leaving the bank the defendant remarked to him, "Remember, I am not your guardian," whereupon Donohue stopped and said, "Why, isn't Dorchester all right?" to which the defendant answered, "Yes, Dorchester is all right," adding that he had been a customer at the bank for a couple of years. The defendant then stepped out of the bank in advance of Donohue and passed close to Dorchester, standing in a crowd. Donohue and Dorchester then went to the office of Hutton & Co., where Donohue received a check for $1,176, which Dorchester suggested to him that he take to the defendant's bank and cash if the defendant were there. He went to the bank, but the defendant not being there he rejoined Dorchester, who was with Thomson at the Hotel Hayward. The three went to a room together, where Donohue placed his package of money on a dressing table by the side of another package, wrapped in the same peculiar kind of paper as Donohue's and supposed to contain money belonging to Thomson. Thomson then went out to see about getting the profits from a fictitious stock deal which had formed the pretext for the conversion of Donohue's securities and checks into ready cash, and also to file a selling order given by Dorchester. Donohue, at Dorchester's suggestion, placed the $1,176 check upon his bundle of money. His attention was then engaged in decoding some telegrams and he failed to notice the disappearance of his package and check. Thomson returned in a few minutes with a tale of woe to the effect that he had made another stock transaction in which he had lost all. Then occurred a pretended fight between Dorchester and Thomson. Donohue was induced by the bunkomen to leave for New Orleans upon their promise to be there and meet him at a hotel. On the following day we find the defendant in possession of the $1,176 check, which he had received from Dorchester, and which he cashed at the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank upon which it was drawn. In receiving it from Dorchester he had not required his indorsement. Two or three days thereafter Donohue, realizing that he had been swindled, returned to Los Angeles, went to the defendant's bank with a detective, and informed the defendant that he had been robbed by Dorchester, to which the defendant replied that if he ever saw Dorchester again he would hold him for the authorities. Nevertheless, we shall see that a few days thereafter he was again dealing with his friend Dorchester, but under the name of Albert Johnson, buying from him stolen securities and checks, utterly forgetful of his virtuous intention to bring his activities to the attention of the police, the record furnishing abundant evidence of the single identity of Dorchester and Johnson.

Mr. Herr made the acquaintance of Fred Williams in a city park in Los Angeles. They soon thereafter visited another of the city's recreation grounds, namely, Westlake Park, where they had the misfortune (for Herr) to meet Dorchester. We have already had some inkling of Dorchester's pursuits, which, the sequel shows, were shared by Williams. Herr was induced by these worthies to enter into a fictitious stock transaction, during the course of which he intrusted to Williams, duly indorsed, 60 shares of Pennsylvania Railroad stock, 1,000 shares Guaranty Trust Company stock, a bank certificate for $500, $620 in travelers' checks, together with $12,000 of Liberty bonds. All these valuables were by Williams "lost" in the same manner as Donohue's securities, and Herr was hurried off to New Orleans, where his recently found friends were to join him and together they were to retrieve their ill fortune. Shortly thereafter he returned to Los Angeles, having received a letter from the bank which had issued the $500 certificate that it had been collected through the Hollywood branch of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank. He thereupon called at said branch bank, his visit occurring some three weeks after the time of the surrender of his securities to Williams, and there for the first time met its manager, the defendant, to whom he exhibited the letter above mentioned, which stated that the certificate appeared to have been indorsed to Albert Johnson. On this visit Herr was nervous and broken down physically, and the defendant advised him to go up the street and get a cup of coffee and stay away half an hour. On his return he informed the defendant of the loss of his railroad stock, the transfer of which he was trying to prevent. The defendant told him that he had known Johnson for two years, and understood he was in the moving picture business, and that upon Johnson's inquiry as to a bond house through which he could sell securities he had recommended him to Aronson & Co. of Los Angeles. He also suggested to Herr that he employ a detective, and on the evening of that day met him at a hotel, at which time he told Herr that the detective he had in mind insisted upon receiving a retainer. The defendant met Herr again on the following evening and introduced him to two city detectives. Aronson & Co. had sold some of the stock and requested Herr to cancel his order to the corporation issuing the stock to stop its transfer. Herr testified that the defendant advised him in this connection that since he had indorsed the stock nothing could be done, and advised him to sign a waiver, as requested by Aronson & Co., which he did in consideration of $200 paid by that concern. While not disclosing the fact to Herr, the defendant had also received $640 in travelers' checks stolen at the same time as Herr's other securities.

Simon Weiss arrived in Los Angeles on January 28, 1920, and early fell into the clutches of Preston and George James, who were also known by the names of Conley and Fred Mayen, respectively. In a pretended stock deal with these men Weiss drew two drafts on North Dakota banks, which he took to the Hollywood branch of the Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank; Mayen having informed him that he must do business at that bank. Upon entering the bank he approached the assistant manager, observing which the defendant intervened and personally attended to the business of Weiss. The defendant, in sending the aforementioned drafts to a North Dakota bank, instructed the bank to hold them for a few days in order to give the daughter of Weiss, who had custody of certain certificates of deposit belonging to him, an opportunity to bring them in. The bank replied to this letter, inquiring what the defendant knew of the transaction in which Weiss was engaged which required the transfer of the money represented by the drafts, and stated that the writer had known Weiss and his family for many years and that for the past four or five years Weiss had not been responsible for his acts. In answer to this inquiry the defendant wrote that he would use his best efforts in every way to protect Weiss, and that as far as he could see he thought Weiss was in a legitimate deal. This statement of the defendant was based upon no information or knowledge whatsoever. In due time there were received by the defendant's bank for account of Weiss $1,950 and certificates of deposit aggregating $9,000, which information was conveyed to Weiss through Mayen, and Mayen transported Weiss in company with Conley to a place near defendant's bank. There he told Weiss to go to the bank and sell the certificates of deposit. Weiss went in, met the defendant, and told him he desired to cash said certificates. The defendant was not authorized to buy securities, but was required to submit such transactions to the president of the bank, Mr. Monette, at its main establishment. He thereupon went there with Weiss, and in presenting the transaction showed the president a letter, received from the North Dakota bank which had issued the certificates, saying that they would be paid upon maturity. He did not show to the president the other letter of the bank stating that Mr. Weiss had for some years not been responsible for his actions. In passing it should be mentioned that the defendant had already suggested to the president the purchase of the certificates two weeks before Mr. Weiss had requested the defendant to buy them. The president finally authorized their purchase, and intrusted the completion of the transaction to the defendant, who thereupon, in the main bank, issued a draft upon a San Francisco bank, and also prepared a signature identification for Mr. Weiss under the seal of the bank. This he gave to Weiss, telling him he could use it in San Francisco in cashing the before-mentioned draft and others given him by defendant in payment for other securities. Weiss testified that he at no time requested payment in San Francisco exchange and never asked for the identification card. Mayen and Conley then informed Weiss that they must all go to San Francisco, the consummation of the stock deal in which they were engaged having been transferred to that city. They started on their journey the next day and were arrested en route. A search of Mr. Mayen's residence disclosed a large stock of bunko paraphernalia, all of which was of the same kind and character as that used in all bunko cases of which evidence was offered at the trial of the defendant. In all cases the name of the fictitious stock exchange was the International Exchange. The alleged brokers, namely, Dorchester, Hathaway, Mayen, and Sellers, all claimed to represent Sherwood, Sheppard & Co., New York. There was no such firm in existence. All used printed matter, blank orders, etc., of these two fake organizations, all of which, from their appearance, were procured either from Mayen or from his source of supply.

It was further shown in evidence that Mayen had visited the defendant at the main bank before the establishment of the Hollywood branch, and also at the latter establishment, a number of times. When calling he talked to no one in the bank but the defendant, and he had no account or other business with the bank; that on one night, in company with a Mrs. W. H. Edgington, he drove in an automobile to the home of the defendant, whom he designated to her as his banker; that the defendant came out to the automobile, and Mayen handed to him what appeared to be a roll of money.

[1] We have set forth at length much of the testimony, and we think it requires no further statement of the evidence, or argument, to demonstrate, not only the existence of a conspiracy, but also that the defendant was an active and interested member thereof. The jury is the sole judge of all controverted questions of fact, and its verdict, if based upon evidence, is conclusive on the appellate courts. Disregarding the testimony of the defendant, and contradictions in that of some of the important witnesses for the people, and accepting, as did the jury, the state's view of the whole case, we are satisfied that the evidence, although circumstantial, shows, as above stated, criminal complicity of the defendant with the confidence operators, even to the extent, according to the testimony of Mrs. Edgington, of participating in the fruits of their unlawful operations.

[2] It cannot be successfully said that by the acquittal of the defendant of all but one of the crimes of the consolidated indictment that the jury found the defendant was not a member of a general conspiracy, but of only one conspiracy, and hence the evidence of the other offenses was inadmissible, and for that reason the defendant did not have a fair and impartial trial. We have no doubt that evidence of each and all of the enumerated transactions, whether covered by the indictment or not, was admissible under the similar offense rule as tending to prove a conspiracy. The interlocking of the participants in the various frauds, their common use of the same fictitious entities, their uniform insistence that their banking needs in carrying out their numerous swindling operations should be intrusted solely to the defendant as assuring an element of safety, were facts justifying an inference that a general conspiracy existed, and the defendant's guilty connection therewith was abundantly shown.

The court fully and fairly instructed the jury on the law applicable to the facts of the case, and it did not commit error in ordering the indictments consolidated. Pen. Code, § 954.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CAIAZZA et al. (Cr. 1095.)

1. Criminal law 🔑37—Enticement and entrapment held no defense where crime originally conceived by defendants.

Where defendants conspired to burn insured property with intent to defraud the insurer and also the owner, and it appeared that the conception of the crime originated with defendants, it was no defense that law enforcement officers, having become cognizant of the purpose to commit the crime, allowed it to proceed, concealing themselves in order to obtain evidence to convict, and that they encouraged the perpetration of the criminal design.

2. Criminal law 🔑797—Statement by court that jury might make any recommendation it saw fit held not to mislead jury.

In a prosecution for conspiracy to burn insured property with intent to defraud, that the trial court, in reply to a question by the foreman of the jury, if it was in the power of its members to recommend leniency, stated that the jury might make any recommendation it saw fit, did not operate to mislead the jury.

3. Criminal law 🔑885—In absence of statute, jury may not accompany verdict with recommendation.

In the absence of statute, a jury has no right or authority to accompany a verdict with a recommendation; their province being solely to determine the guilt or innocence of accused.

4. Criminal law 🔑1173(1)—Refusal to instruct as to defendant's good character not error where crime admitted.

In a prosecution for conspiring to burn insured property with intent to defraud insurer and the owner thereof, it was not error to refuse to instruct concerning defendant's good character; the commission of the crime by defendant being admitted, and his character therefore, whether good or bad, not being involved.

5. Conspiracy 🔑47—Finding that defendant knew premises he attempted to burn were insured, sustained.

In a prosecution for conspiring to burn insured property with intent to defraud insurer and the owner thereof, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant knew the premises he attempted to burn were insured.

6. Criminal law 🔑423(1)—Any act in furtherance of the object of the conspiracy is competent evidence against the other conspirators.

In a prosecution for conspiracy, any act of either confederate in pursuance of the object and purpose of the conspiracy is competent evidence against the others.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; J. E. Woolley, Judge.

Pasquale Caiazza and Joe Giusto and another were convicted of conspiring to burn insured property with intent to defraud and injure the insurer and owner of the property, and the named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

M. F. McCormick and C. M. Ozias, both of Fresno, for appellant Caiazza.

Thomas F. Lopez, of Fresno, for appellant Giusto.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

TYLER, P. J. Appellants, together with one Diego Failla, were jointly indicted of the crime of conspiracy to burn certain insured property with intent to defraud and injure the insurer and also the owner thereof. Appellants were both convicted and Failla was acquitted. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying the motion of said appellants for a new trial.

At the outset it may be stated that it is conceded that neither of the defendants is a man of integrity; that they had an evil purpose and entertained an unlawful and wicked design to join with the owner of the property in what they believed to be a plot to commit arson, a crime that is viewed by the law as a heinous and most aggravated offense for the reason that it endangers human life and the security of habitations and evidences moral recklessness and depravity in the perpetrator.

It is contended, however, that notwithstanding the admitted evil intent and purpose of the defendants, the judgment of conviction can only be upheld by the strong hand of power, and not by or under the law. In this connection it is urged that the verdict is against public policy, which should always estop the state from devising a scheme to encourage or aid one in the commission of a crime. The verdict is therefore assailed for the reason that the evidence is insufficient to convict defendants, it being claimed that it only shows that they were pliant and willing instruments who could be and were instigated and impelled to commit the crime in question by public officials and decoys employed by the state for such purpose, and that they never would have committed the crime with which they are charged but for such assistance and co-operation on the part of such officials. In other words, defendants invoke the defense of instigation and entrapment.

This subject has received full and careful consideration by the District Court of Appeal for the Third District in the very recent case of People v. Rodriguez, 214 Pac. 452. See, also, People v. Silbelo (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 462, decided February 23, 1923. In the Rodriguez Case a collation of the authorities is made and the subject fully reviewed, and the conclusion in substance is there reached that if the criminal design charged originated with the perpetrators of the act they cannot escape conviction merely by reason of the fact that a trap was laid for them or that they were facilitated in the execution of their enterprise by officers of the law who acted for the purpose of detecting them in the perpetration of their unlawful act. The great weight of authority is in accordance with this view. See, also, 16 Corpus Juris, p. 88; People v. Barbera, 29 Cal. App. 604, 157 Pac. 532.

In support of the judgment of conviction it is claimed that the evidence in this case nowhere warrants the conclusion of appellants that they were the victims of official enticement or instigation, or that they were lured from the path of rectitude by any official or his agent, but that, on the contrary, it does show from the admissions made by them that they were professional arsonists, and that they originated the crime with which they are charged.

The record is voluminous, but briefly and in substance the evidence shows that one Holcomb was the owner of and resided with his family in the dwelling house in Fresno which defendants are accused of attempting to burn. Holcomb and his wife were not on friendly terms. She was afflicted with an incurable disease, and Holcomb was desirous of sending her to Germany in order that he might marry some one else, but was not possessed of sufficient funds to do so. A fire had occurred at his home, but it was extinguished before any substantial damage was done. There is evidence in the record which indicates that Holcomb started that fire for the purpose of collecting the insurance in order to carry out his plan of sending his wife abroad. Shortly thereafter Holcomb had a conversation with defendant Caiazza, whom he had known for some eight years, on which occasion this fire was discussed. Caiazza expressed to Holcomb the opinion that it was impossible "to get along without being crooked," and suggested to him that he again burn his home. Holcomb thereafter, according to the testimony of Caiazza, hunted him up and importuned him to procure someone to do the burning. The parties met at the home of Caiazza on Thanksgiving Day of 1921, when the matter of destroying Holcomb's property was discussed in a general way. According to the testimony of Holcomb, Caiazza explained how easy it was to accomplish the burning; that he knew of places which had been burned; and that he could procure a friend of his who made a profession of setting fire to property, to engage in the desired undertaking for the sum of $50. Holcomb thereafter discussed the matter with a friend, who advised him that he had better report the matter to the authorities. Holcomb thereupon informed the fire chief, who in turn took the matter up with other officials of the city of Fresno. A plan was thereupon arranged by the police and fire authorities to have Caiazza and Holcomb in the basement of a store where Holcomb was employed and discuss plans for the burning. Caiazza appeared there at Holcomb's request. A dictaphone had in the meantime been installed on the premises, and while the conference between Holcomb and Caiazza was being had the officers secreted themselves so as to hear what was said. The subject of the burning was again discussed by the parties, as was also the amount of insurance carried by Holcomb. Caiazza was of the opinion that the burning should be done by a professional, but that it should be deferred until such time as Holcomb could procure more insurance in a company represented by Caiazza; he being in the insurance business. Thereafter preparations were made to carry out the plan. Defendant Giusto was employed to do the actual burning. Holcomb agreed to pay the sum of $350 for the commission of the act. Part of this sum was paid to Caiazza in cash, the balance being made up of promissory notes signed by Holcomb. On the evening of April 19, 1922, Giusto, accompanied by Failla, went to the Holcomb home, and they in conjunction with Holcomb prepared the place for burning. They poured gasoline over the premises, and spread pieces of sheet saturated therewith through the rooms and applied a lighted candle thereto. The officers, who were in hiding on the premises, extinguished the fire and the arrest of defendants followed.

[1] It thus conclusively appears from the evidence that the crime with which the defendants stand charged was originally conceived by Holcomb and Caiazza independent of any suggestion or aid from the officers. There is no question that after the scheme was thus formed Holcomb, for purposes of his own, betrayed Caiazza, and that defendants were thereafter encouraged in the perpetration of their criminal design by the officers. There is a distinction, however, between inducing a person to do an unlawful act, and setting a trap to catch him in the execution of a criminal plan of his own conception. This distinction is pointed out in the Rodriguez Case, supra. Where the doing of a particular act is a crime, regardless of the consent of any one, the courts are agreed that if the criminal intent originates in the mind of the accused and the criminal offense is completed the fact that an opportunity is furnished, or that the accused is aided in the commission of the crime in order to secure the evidence necessary to prosecute him therefor, constitutes no defense (Case and Comment, August, 1922).

Upon this subject, therefore, we conclude that the defense here interposed by appellants is without merit.

It is further claimed that the court erred in refusing to give certain instructions upon the subject of entrapment and participation. The case not being one of official instigation, as has been pointed out, the instructions were properly refused.

[2] Nor is there any merit in the further contention that the court misled the jury during its deliberations. In this connection it appears from the record that the trial judge was asked by the foreman of the jury if it was in the power of its members to recommend leniency. In reply thereto the jury was informed that it might make any recommendation it saw fit. It is contended that as the law does not authorize or permit any such recommendation the court by so advising the jury prejudicially misled it as to its authority, it being claimed that the remark of the court was in effect an invitation to the jury to do a thing not authorized by law which deceived the members thereof into bringing in the verdict that it did.

[3] The objection is without merit. In the absence of a statute it is the prevailing rule that a jury has no right or authority to accompany a verdict with a recommendation, their province being solely to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused. People v. Lee, 17 Cal. 76, 17 Am. L. R. 1156. If the court had led the jury erroneously to suppose that by incorporating in their verdict a recommendation of leniency the punishment would be reduced there might be some merit in the objection. As there was no such intimation on the part of the court of the effect of such recommendation, there could be no prejudice. People v. Lee, supra.

[4] It is further claimed on behalf of the defendant Giusto that the court committed error in refusing to give an instruction concerning his good character.

We see no merit in this claim. The nature of the charge and the evidence supporting it rendered such an instruction of little, if any, value to the defendant. The fact of the commission of the crime by him is admitted. His character, therefore, whether good or bad, was not involved, and it could in no manner operate as a factor in his favor. Under such circumstances, refusal to give the instruction did not affect his substantial rights.

[5] And, finally, it is claimed that there is no evidence in the record to show that the defendant Giusto knew that the premises he attempted to burn were insured.

[6] There is no merit in this contention. There is evidence to show that he was told by Holcomb to take such personal property as he desired from the premises, and that he did attempt to carry certain articles away with him after setting fire to the premises, which he discarded when the officers arrested him. This is a circumstance from which knowledge of the fact on his part might properly be inferred. The very offense here charged is a conspiracy to burn the property in question with intent to injure the owner and insurer. The evidence to establish the confederation or conspiracy was complete. Any act, therefore, of either confederate in furtherance of the object and purpose of the confederation, is competent evidence against the others. There is an abundance of evidence in the record to show that Caiazza knew the property was insured.

Under all these circumstances the jury was justified in finding that both defendants attempted the crime with which they are charged with intent to defraud the insurer. People v. Vasalo, 120 Cal. 168, 52 Pac. 305.

The judgments are affirmed.

REDEMEYER v. CUNNINGHAM.
(Civ. 2529.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 17, 1923. Rehearing Denied April 16, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 14, 1923.)

1. Deeds ⚷40—Frauds, statute of ⚷100—Deed of part of block, not showing boundary line between blocks, held invalid.

Where plat of city addition did not show any division line between two blocks embraced in one tract, a deed of the south half of one of the blocks "according to the plat of said addition" was void for uncertainty in that it was impossible to determine from it the location of the boundary line between the blocks, as extrinsic evidence showing the location of such boundary line was inadmissible under the rule that conveyances must be written.

2. Deeds ⚷41—Description in deed referred to must be definite.

Although the parties to a deed may describe the property therein conveyed by a reference therein to another deed or map which contains a description, yet the deed and the instrument referred to, when taken together, must be as certain in respect to the description as a description contained in the deed itself.

3. Ejectment ⚷25(2)—Outstanding title in third person held a defense.

Outstanding title in a third person is a good defense, although defendant does not connect himself therewith.

4. Adverse possession ⚷43(6)—Decree of distribution held to convey interest in land by adverse possession.

In ejectment, where defendant had offered in evidence a decree of distribution in the estate of one who had occupied the lands adversely, distributing the land to defendant and his wife, evidence of defendant's adverse possession was improperly excluded.

5. Pleading ⚷93(2)—In ejectment defenses of prescription and public highway held inconsistent.

In ejectment the defenses that defendant had acquired title by prescription and also that the land was part of the highway, and hence not subject to action by owner of the record title, held inconsistent and irreconcilable defenses.

6. Ejectment ⚷73—Cross-complaint showing land a street held properly excluded.

In ejectment cross-complaint claiming that the land in question was a street and asking for recovery of possession of the street, and that obstructions thereon by plaintiff be removed, held properly excluded, as it showed both parties to be trespassers on the street, and since, if defendant could succeed in establishing his right to the possession of the disputed strip, the court might in its judgment protect him against interference with his use of it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Action by Otis Redemeyer against John Cunningham. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

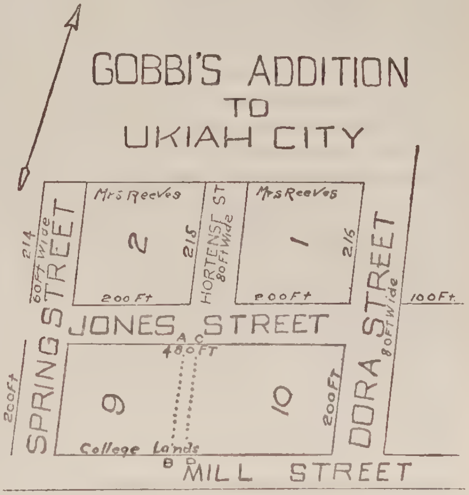
A. L. Wessels, of Ukiah, for appellant.

Mannon & Mannon and Charles Kasch, all of Ukiah, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was in ejectment to recover the possession of a strip of land in the city of Ukiah, Mendocino county, described as follows:

> "Beginning at a point where the westerly line of Hortense street if extended southerly would intersect the southerly line of Jones street, and running thence southerly along the said westerly line of Hortense street if extended southerly to the north line of Mill street; thence easterly along the northerly line of Mill Street 24.3 feet to a certain fence; thence northerly along the line of said fence to a point in the southerly line of Jones street; thence westerly along the southerly line of Jones street 23 feet to the point of beginning."

To better understand what follows, we append a replica of a portion of the map of Gobbi's addition to the city of Ukiah filed in the county recorder's office in March 30, 1888, to which we have added the dotted lines, A B, C D, to indicate the boundaries of the disputed strip. We may call attention at this point to the fact that on said map no division line between blocks 9 and 10 appears, and this circumstance is of importance in the controversy between the parties.



The answer to the verified complaint denied the ownership of plaintiff to any portion of said land or his possession or right to the possession thereof or that the defendant "ousted or ejected the plaintiff from said premises, or any part thereof," or that the defendant ever wrongfully or unlawfully withheld any portion of said premises from plaintiff. As a second defense it was alleged that the deeds under which plaintiff claimed title to said property, namely, a deed from one Terrence Rodgers of May 7, 1918, and from the same grantor of February, 1919, and a deed from Ella King Hodghead of March 20, 1919, conveyed no interest, since said grantors and each of them "had no right, title, interest, claim, or estate, either in law or in equity, in or to the premises described in the complaint, or any part thereof, or ever had any right, title, interest, claim, or estate therein." For a third defense title by prescription was sufficiently set forth. Defendant also asked leave to file a cross-complaint in which it was alleged that one William Proudfoot on June 17, 1889, and for some time prior thereto, was the owner of the land bounded by Jones, Dora, Mills, and Spring streets in said city, and while such owner he subdivided the land into two tracts or subdivisions and named and designated said tracts as "block 9 and block 10 of Gobbi's addition to Ukiah City, and defined and described and fixed the bounds and limits of each of said blocks, as follows: Block 9 aforesaid as comprising and embracing the west 280 feet of the said tract, and being 280 feet east and west and 200 feet north and south, and block 10 as comprising and embracing the remainder of said tract, and being 200 feet east and west and 200 feet north and south." It was further alleged that the plaintiff is, and has been for some time, the owner of said block 10 as thus described, and the defendant and Nancy Cunningham the owners of the south half of said block 9, and the defendant and certain heirs of John C. Gobbi, deceased, were and are the joint owners of the north half of said block 9, and that said block includes the land in dispute; that after the subdivision of the said tract of land by the said William Proudfoot, as aforesaid, the owner of the tracts of land included in said block 9 and said block 10 "opened up, set aside, set apart, laid out, defined, and designated the east 80 feet of said block 9 as a public highway for the use of the public, and also as a private highway for the use and benefit of said owners, their successors and assigns, and did by their acts, words and deeds, and with the intention to dedicate and set aside the same, dedicate and set aside the said tract of land for such public and private use; that thereafter the owner of the lands included in said block 9 and block 10, by mutual agreement, acquiescence and consent, agreed to and did cut down the width of said public and private highway to the width of 40 feet, with center line thereof unchanged, and thereafter constructed substantial buildings and fences along each side thereof as thus fixed, defined, and established; that said public and private highway was by said owners, named, designated, and described as Hortense street; that the said street has been used continuously, except during the period obstructed by the plaintiff as hereinafter mentioned by the public and by the owners of the lands in said blocks 9 and 10, and by the residents in that vicinity without objection on the part of any of the owners of said properties, for a period of more than 20 years prior to the commencement of this action"; that defendant and his cotenants as aforesaid are the owners of the fee to the land lying in said Hortense street and are entitled to the possession thereof subject to its use as a public and private highway, and "each of them uses the same as a means of egress, ingress, and regress to their lands in said block 9 aforesaid; that while the defendant and his cotenants aforesaid were so seized of said premises the plaintiff afterwards, and on or about the 1st day of March, 1919, and without right or title, entered into possession of said premises and ousted and ejected the defendant and his cotenants therefrom, and ever since has and now does wrongfully and unlawfully withhold the said premises and the possession thereof from the defendant and his cotenants." Then follows an allegation that between March 1 and October 1, 1919, the plaintiff constructed a solid concrete wall and caused to be erected thereon a fence along and across the north and south entrances of said Hortense street so as to completely obstruct it and prevent travel thereon, and has ever since "wrongfully and unlawfully and without right obstructed the said highway as aforesaid." The prayer was for the recovery of the possession of said street between blocks 9 and 10, subject to the use thereof for a public and private highway, that said obstructions be removed and the nuisance thereby created be abated, and for general relief. The trial court declined to allow defendant to file said cross-complaint, and this is one of the rulings of which appellant complains.

To prove his title to the north 100 feet of the disputed strip plaintiff introduced two deeds from William Proudfoot (admittedly the common source of title) to E. W. King, dated June 17, 1889, and September 12, 1895, a decree of distribution in the estate of E. W. King, deceased, of the date of October 27, 1915, distributing the residue of his estate to Ella King Hodghead, and a deed from her to plaintiff, dated March 20, 1919, describing the land as follows:

> "Beginning at a point in the southerly line of Jones street 20 feet westerly of the easterly line of Hortense street, if the same were extended southerly in its present course; thence westerly along the south line of Jones street to the intersection of what would be the westerly line of Hortense street if the same were extended southerly in its present course; thence southerly along said extension of the westerly line of Hortense street 100 feet; thence easterly and parallel to the southerly line of Jones street 60 feet, more or less, to a point 20 feet west of what would be the easterly line of Hortense street if the same were extended southerly in its present course; thence northerly 100 feet, more or less, to the point or place of beginning."

As to the southerly 100 feet in controversy plaintiff put in evidence a deed of reconveyance from E. W. King to William Proudfoot of September 17, 1895, from the latter to Wiley English, dated November 13, 1896, from English to J. B. Stetson of February 23, 1897, a tax deed from the state of California to J. C. Ruddock, dated March 6, 1905, the property having been sold for delinquent taxes for 1897 assessed to Wiley English, a deed from Ruddock to F. L. Caughey of an undivided one-half interest, dated November 10, 1906, a deed from Ruddock and Caughey to Terrence Rodgers of the date of April 9, 1912, and from Rodgers to plaintiff dated February ———, 1919, conveying the following:

> "Beginning at the intersection of the west line of Dora street with the north line of Mill street (being the southeast corner of block IX–X of Gobbi's addition to Ukiah City) and running thence north along the west line of Dora street one hundred (100) feet to the south line of land conveyed by William Proudfoot to E. W. King by deed dated June 17, 1889, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of said county in Book 48 of Deeds, p. 176 (said property being now owned by the grantee herein); thence westerly along the south line of said King lands and a prolongation of said south line two hundred and eighty feet, more or less, to what would be the west line of Hortense street if the same were extended southerly in its present course; thence southerly along said west line of Hortense street (if extended) 100 feet more or less to the north line of Mill street; thence easterly along the north line of Mill street to the place of beginning."

The foregoing clearly showed the record title in and to the whole of the disputed strip to be vested in plaintiff.

[1] Appellant, however, objected to the introduction of said deed from Rodgers upon the ground:

> "That no foundation has been laid, and that he did not have any interest in the land at the date, having theretofore conveyed all his interest in it to Henry Owens on April 18, 1912."

In support of his contention appellant thereafter offered said deed from Rodgers to Owens purporting to convey "the south one-half (S.½) of block nine (9), Gobbi's addition to the town of Ukiah City, according to the plat of said addition on file with the county recorder of Mendocino county, California." Plaintiff objected to this deed upon the ground that it was impossible to determine from it the location of the boundary line between blocks 9 and 10, and hence the deed was void for uncertainty. The court finally adopted the view of plaintiff and sustained his objection. This ruling involves one of the important questions in the case. It was and is the claim of appellant that all the parties in interest from the time the whole tract belonged to William Proudfoot recognized block 9 as being 280 feet from west to east, and thereby including the disputed strip, and block 10 as extending from Dora street 200 feet west to the easterly line of Hortense street if extended. In support of this position appellant refers to several circumstances, among which is the description of block 9 in the said deed of William Proudfoot to E. W. King of June 17, 1889, in which said block 9 is described as extending from a point 200 feet westerly from Dora street a distance of 280 feet to Spring street.

It is not an unreasonable inference that the dividing line between said blocks was generally so understood and recognized, but in said deed there is no reference whatever to any monument, deed, fact, or circumstance suggesting or furnishing any data by which such boundary line can be established. The deed is according "to the plat of said Gobbi's addition," and there is nothing thereon to indicate the location of said line. The rule is well established, as stated by this court in Scott v. Woodworth, 34 Cal. App. 400, 167 Pac. 543:

> "To be valid on its face, a deed must contain such a description of the real property thereby intended to be conveyed as will enable the property to be readily located by reference to the description."

[2] It was further declared therein that, if the writing itself does not "furnish the means whereby the description may be made sufficiently definite and certain readily to locate the property, then the instrument must be held void, since the imperfections of the description cannot be supplied through evidence extrinsic to the writing itself without running up against the positive mandate of the rule that a conveyance of real property must be in writing." As before indicated, if reference had been made in the deed from Rodgers to the description of block 9 as contained in said deed from Proudfoot, or to any other fact or circumstance by aid of which the line could be located upon the ground, a different situation would be presented. If such reference had been made, then we would be governed by the rule affirmed in Donnelly v. Tregaskis, 154 Cal. 261, 97 Pac. 421, quoting from Caldwell v. Center, 30 Cal. 540, 89 Am. Dec. 131, as follows:

> "Although the parties to a deed may describe the property therein conveyed by a reference therein to another deed or map which contains a description, yet the deed and the instrument referred to, when taken together, must be as certain in respect to the description as a description contained in the deed itself."

To the authorities cited in the Scott Case, supra, we may add Reed v. Lammel, 28 Minn. 306, 9 N. W. 858, and Cunningham v. Village of Willow River, 68 Minn. 249, 71 N. W. 532, each involving a situation quite similar to that herein.

In support of his claim to the record title appellant also offered a deed from William Proudfoot to John Cunningham, dated December 5, 1919, purporting to convey by metes and bounds the southern half of the 80-foot strip included within the boundaries of said Hortense street if extended to Mill street. The court, though, properly excluded this deed upon the ground that the grantor had previously conveyed all his interest in the south half of blocks 9 and 10 to Wiley English.

As to the north half of the disputed strip, it is quite plain that the deed from King to W. I. Bailey dated June 21, 1890, offered by appellant, was properly excluded, since it described by metes and bounds and purported to convey block 9 as lying entirely west of said Hortense street, if extended. It therefore did not include the land in controversy. Indeed, without further specification of the instruments offered by appellant, we conclude that the record title to the disputed strip was shown to be in respondent.

Appellant, however, attempted to prove title by prescription. He asked many questions along this line, but the trial court sustained objections to them. Then he made the following offer:

> "We offer to prove by defendant John Cunningham that he knows of his own personal knowledge that since 1912 Henry Owens was in actual and open notorious possession of the south half of block 9, holding and claiming the same as his own during all the time down to the time of his death, which was January 7, 1918, and during each and every year cultivated that tract of land, including the land in controversy in this action, and put it in grain; that during all of the time the tract was inclosed in a substantial inclosure; that as to the north half of block 9, and also including the strip contained in this action, the same was in the actual possession of John Gobbi, and prior to 1912 the same had been used by him as a home, upon which he had built a house, and upon which he lived until the time of his death, and that this tract of land was also inclosed in a substantial inclosure; that since that time the defendant acquired a deed from Henry Owens to the south half of 9 he has been in actual, open, and notorious possession of the same, claiming to hold the same as his own, and during said time has cultivated said tract and with reference to the north half from the time he secured the deeds from the heirs of the Gobbi estate."

[3] It is true that this offer was not complete, since it contained no allusion to the payment of taxes. As to that, however, evidence was subsequently offered, and an objection was sustained upon the ground that it was immaterial. We are aware also that a blanket offer like that, standing alone, is not a sufficient basis for challenging the ruling of the court, but the statement came after objection to questions in relation to the possession of the property and claim of title had been sustained, and appellant desired to make clear the purpose of the offered evidence. The trial court excluded the testimony upon the ground that there was "no deed in evidence between Owens and Cunningham." But, if defendant had shown title in Owens, it would have been a good defense to the action. Title in a third party is a good defense, though defendant does not connect himself with it, and particularly is this so when the plaintiff has not been in the possession of the lands within the period of the statute of limitations or at all. Cranmer v. Porter, 41 Cal. 462; Trenouth v. Gordon, 63 Cal. 379; Robrecht v. Reid, 114 Cal. 356, 46 Pac. 101. In the last of these the rule is stated as follows:

> "It is true that in an action of ejectment, when the plaintiff relies upon a paper title, the defendant may show the true title with right of possession to be outstanding in a third person, without connecting himself with it, and may thus defeat the action."

This is simply an illustration of the well-established doctrine that in ejectment the plaintiff must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not upon the weakness or want of title in the defendant. Gage v. Downey, 94 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 635; Reay v. Butler, 95 Cal. 206, 30 Pac. 208.

[4] But the fact is that appellant offered in evidence a decree of distribution in the estate of Henry Owens, deceased, distributing to appellant and his wife "the S. ½ of block 9 of Gobbi's addition to the town of Ukiah City," and in said decree it was "further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that any other property not now known or found be and the same is hereby distributed to John Cunningham and the said Nancy Cunningham share and share alike." This latter clause would, of course, include the title of Owens to any part of the disputed strip even if it was not embraced in the land specifically described in the decree of distribution. After the trial court's attention was called to this decree of distribution, and while appellant was being examined as a witness, the record shows the following:

> "Mr. Wessels: I will ask you to state, Mr. Cunningham, if you know from your own knowledge whether Otis Redemeyer or Terrence Rodgers or Mr. Van Dusen or any of the predecessors of Mr. Redemeyer or his grantors had been in possession of the tract in dispute since the year 1912 or any part thereof.
> "Mr. Kasch: Object upon the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.
> "The Court: Not material unless he derived title from Owens in order to make the claim of adverse possession. You must show the continuity by proper conveyance to Mr. Cunningham.
> "Mr. Wessels: I will ask you to state whether or not there had been any other person in possession of the south half of block 9 or the south half of the tract in dispute other than Henry Owens, yourself, and your cotenant,

Nancy Cunningham, since the year 1912 down to the present time.

"Mr. Kasch: Same objection, incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial.

"The Court: Same ruling."

It may be added that appellant sought unsuccessfully to introduce similar evidence as to the north half of said strip. In this connection the following question was asked of Mr. Cunningham:

> "I will also ask you to state whether or not there has been any one whatsoever in possession of the north half of block 9 and the half of the land in question since 1912 other than John Gobbi, his heirs, and yourself and your cotenant?"

The court sustained an objection to this question, and this we think was error. We can perceive of no reason why appellant was not entitled to show actual possession for the statutory period as one of the material elements of title by prescription. It is true that some of the excluded evidence was offered also for the purpose of showing an agreed division line between the two blocks, but, if improper for that purpose, it was at least admissible to support the claim of adverse possession.

[5] Appellant also attempted to introduce evidence tending to show that the 80-foot strip included in the extension of Hortense street had been dedicated to the public for public use as a highway, and that said strip had been used as a public street for a period of 29 years. Appellant claims that "ejectment will not lie for an incorporeal hereditament; a public road or street is an incorporeal hereditament"—citing Wood v. Truckee Turnpike Co., 24 Cal. 474; Mahon v. San Rafael T. R. Co., 49 Cal. 269; Coburn v. Ames, 52 Cal. 385, 28 Am. Rep. 634; Swift v. Goodrich, 70 Cal. 103, 11 Pac. 561; Southern Pacific Co. v. Burr, 86 Cal. 279, 24 Pac. 1032; City of Eureka v. Gates, 120 Cal. 54, 52 Pac. 125; 19 Corpus Juris, "Ejectment," p. 1034.

In the Wood Case, supra, the plaintiff did not own the fee to the land in controversy, but he was claiming as the purchaser under a sheriff's sale of "all the right, title, interest, claim, and property of the Truckee Turnpike Company in and to the Truckee turnpike road, a highway," etc. It was held that said turnpike company held a mere franchise, and that it did not pass to the plaintiff by said sale, and that "all that was offered for sale and all that the plaintiffs bought was the 'road.'" It was in view of these facts that the Supreme Court said:

> "The plaintiffs acquired nothing by the purchase of the 'road,' to which the action of ejectment has any remedial relations. 'Road' is a legal term, strictly synonymous with the term 'way,' and in the complaint, and throughout all the title papers of the plaintiffs, their identity is fully recognized. A way is an easement, and consists in the right of passing over another man's ground. * * * It is an incorporated hereditament, a servitude imposed upon corporeal property, and not a part of it. It gives no right to possess the land upon which it is imposed, but a right merely to the party in whom the way is vested to enjoy the way."

It was therefore held that ejectment would not lie to recover possession of the way.

In the Mahon Case it was held that the action was proper, since the plaintiff owned the fee and brought the action to recover possession, having been improperly precluded by defendant from entering upon the land except upon the payment of a toll, and then only for the purpose of passing over the same.

In 52 Cal. 385, 28 Am. Rep. 634, it is said:

> "In effect, the finding is that Ames & Templeton took the exclusive possession of the alleged highways, and used them for the storage of merchandise, thereby excluding the public from the use of them as public highways. Even though it be conceded that they were legally established as public highways, the defendants had no authority in law to appropriate them to their exclusive use and dominion to the exclusion of the public. In doing so they were trespassers, and in such cases it is well settled that the owner of the fee may maintain ejectment. He is entitled to the possession subject to the public easement," etc.

In Swift v. Goodrich the right to the use of water was involved, which the court declared to be an easement, and held that ejectment would not lie.

In Southern Pacific Co. v. Burr the action related to a strip of land 400 feet in width granted by Congress to the Central Pacific Railroad Company to aid in construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific Ocean, and the Supreme Court held that the grant necessarily involved "a right of possession in the grantee, and is inconsistent with any adverse possession of any part of the land embraced within the grant," and it was determined that the plaintiff could recover in an action of ejectment against one who had entered into possession of a part of the land and claimed title in fee. While it was admitted that perhaps for a mere easement the action would not lie, "wherever a right of entry exists, and the interest is tangible, so that possession can be delivered, an action of ejectment will lie."

In the Eureka Case the action was brought by the municipality to recover possession of land constituting a part of the street, and it was held that—

> "If the owner of the fee has dedicated a street and alley to public use, and the dedication has been accepted by the city in which the street and alley are situated, such city may maintain ejectment to recover possession thereof as against the owner of the fee, though the city may claim only an easement in the street and alley for public use."

The citation from Corpus Juris is to the effect that—

> "The general rule is that an action for ejectment cannot be maintained for an incorporeal hereditament."

It is apparent that these authorities do not militate against the ruling of the trial court as to the offered evidence. It is clear that appellant was in no position to urge such defense. In his answer he alleged that he was in possession of the disputed strip under a claim of right, and that he and his predecessors in interest had been in such possession since 1912. Even in the cross-complaint, which he sought to file, after alleging the dedication of the strip 80 feet in width for a public highway, he averred in effect that by agreement of the owners of the fee the highway was reduced to a width of 40 feet, and they had entered into the possession of the 20-foot strip on each side respectively. Assuming, therefore, that the strip in question is actually a part of the highway, defendant by his pleadings and also by the evidence showed himself to be a trespasser, and under the decisions the owner of the fee could maintain ejectment against him. Appellant cannot blow hot and cold. He cannot justify his possession upon both grounds, namely, that he had acquired a title by prescription, and also that the land was a part of the highway, and hence not subject to an action by the owner of the record title. The two defenses are entirely inconsistent and irreconcilable. Of course, if there is a highway 80 feet in width extending through to Mill street, both plaintiff and defendant are trespassers, and it is a matter which should receive the attention of the municipal authorities, but under the circumstances already detailed we think that question could not be settled in this proceeding.

[6] We are of the opinion also that the court committed no error in excluding said cross-complaint. It showed both parties to be trespassers, and as long as appellant was occupying a part of the street he could hardly complain of respondent for interfering with his use of it. Moreover, if appellant can succeed in establishing his right to the possession of the disputed strip, the court may in its judgment protect him against any interference with his use of it. Mills v. Fletcher, 100 Cal. 142, 34 Pac. 637; Nelson v. O'Brien, 139 Cal. 628, 73 Pac. 469. The residue of the 80-foot strip is not involved in the proceeding, and any controversy concerning it should be litigated in another action, if necessary.

Although the record is voluminous, and the discussion by counsel has taken a wide range and is characterized by much industry and learning, we think the material issues relate to the question of title, either of record or by prescription, and that the court committed error in the respect already indicated.

The judgment is reversed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

BURNETT, J. In his petition for rehearing respondent contends that the ruling of the court below in rejecting the offered evidence as to the payment of taxes was without prejudice for the reason that it did not show that the payment was made for five consecutive years. No such objection was made in the trial court, and the ruling was based distinctly upon the ground that it was not material. When the offer was made of a copy of the official record, respondent objected upon the ground that "it's immaterial who paid the taxes." Then counsel for appellant stated:

> "We offer in evidence a statement prepared by Lee Cunningham, the tax collector of Mendocino county, showing who paid the taxes so far as disclosed by the records in that office."

The transcript then shows the following:

> "The Court: Objection sustained.
> "Mr. Wessels: We offer it in evidence for the purpose of—
> "Mr. Kasch: Now, with the witness Cunningham it can't be material. I submit the motion to strike out the testimony as he has not connected it up.
> "The Court: If that was out, the other document also must go B and C.
> "Mr. Kasch: I intended to follow with a motion to strike out those in view of that strip.
> "The Court: There is very little materiality in it, the motion will be granted."

As to the record offered it was manifestly not complete, and of itself it was not sufficient to prove said payment for the statutory period, but we must assume that appellant intended to follow it with other evidence that would supply the deficiency. Under the ruling of the court, however, it would be idle for him to present any further proof, since the court had already decided that it was immaterial. As aptly stated by appellant:

> "When the trial court, at the instance and pursuant to the objection of respondent, erroneously excluded proof of one of the elements constituting title of appellant by adverse possession, such error alone constitutes ground for reversal, and thereafter it was not incumbent upon the appellant to go through the useless and idle procedure of offering evidence of the remainder of the elements constituting his title by adverse possession."

Moreover, it is the claim of appellant that such evidence was offered "for the purpose of showing all the lands situated in Gobbi's addition to the town of Ukiah City, bounded on the north by Jones street, on the east by Dora street, on the south by Mill street, and on the west by Spring street that had been, in fact, assessed, and for the purpose of showing all the lands situated therein that had not been, in fact, assessed, and for the purpose of showing that all taxes levied or assessed thereon had been paid, and, so far as disclosed by said records, by whom such taxes were paid." It is the contention of appellant that this evidence would have shown that the land in controversy was not assessed at all; it being treated by the assessors as a part of Hortense street. We cannot say that it would not be material for that purpose. Of course, if the property was not assessed, the element of taxes would be eliminated. And since the later decisions of the Supreme Court (McGrath v. Wallace, 85 Cal. 622, 24 Pac. 793; Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 396, 35 Pac. 1008) overruling Oneto v. Restano, 78 Cal. 374, 20 Pac. 743, hold that the burden of proof is upon the claimant of title by adverse possession to prove that no taxes have been assessed, if such be the fact, appellant should have been allowed to show it.

It is true that appellant did not state specifically in the trial court that the evidence was offered for that purpose, but he was not permitted to make a full statement, being interrupted, as we have seen, in the midst of his offer by counsel for respondent. We must assume that appellant was not only acting in good faith in the trial court, but that he is sincere in his declaration in this court that he could have shown the facts as claimed by him, if he had been given an opportunity to do so. Of course, we cannot say that he may not fail, but we think the interests of justice demand that he be allowed to make the attempt to establish his claim.

It may be conceded that his various positions were somewhat inconsistent, but it i not claimed, nor could it be, that he was put to an election.

As against plaintiff's claim of the exclusive right to the possession of the tract in dispute, defendant would be permitted to defeat the action on the ground that he had acquired title by prescription, although such claim of title would be of no avail against the municipality or the public.

Another reason why respondent should not prevail herein is that the consideration which he now urges for a rehearing was not presented in the original argument before this court. In his brief the following is all that he said upon the subject:

> "Under point 3 of issue 6, appellant argues that he acquired title by adverse possession, but his point is met by the words of the trial court at page 175: 'Not material unless he (Cunningham) derived title from Owens in order to make the claim of adverse possession. You must show the continuity by proper conveyance to Mr. Cunningham.' Even if we consider every offer of defendant as actually in evidence, he has failed to show continuity of possession by himself and his predecessors in interest of the lands described in the complaint for the necessary period of five years. And if the disputed tract was or is a part of Hortense street, surely counsel will not contend that title to it can be acquired by adverse possession."

The rule is to ignore points made for the first time on petition for rehearing. It is true that this is not an inflexible rule, and in the interests of justice the appellate court may disregard it, but, in view of the strenuous objection made by respondent to every effort of appellant in the trial court to prove the elements of adverse possession, it would not be unfair to apply the rule herein.

At any rate we think the question should be thoroughly investigated by the trial court, and the petition for rehearing is denied.

IMPERIAL COUNTY v. GAREY, County Auditor. (Civ. 4145.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 17, 1923.)

1. Counties 🔑178—General election laws with respect to notice inapplicable to county bond elections.

Neither Pol. Code, § 4088, requiring that county bond elections "be held as nearly as practicable in conformity with the general election law," nor section 1044, requiring that special elections on any proposition be conducted under the provisions of sections 1044, 1120, 1121, 1133, and 1151, warrants the inference that any of the sections dealing with elections generally are applicable to county bond elections with respect to notice, though sections 1133 and 1151, relative to precincting and appointment of election board members provide for acts necessarily preceding the holding of the election.

2. Statutes 🔑207—Particular provision prevails over general provision.

A particular provision of a statute generally prevails over, and will be treated as an exception to, a general provision.

3. Counties 🔑178—Provisions as to notice of county bond elections prevail over provisions of general election laws.

Pol. Code, § 4088, requiring that notice of county bond elections be published in newspapers published in the county, or, if none, posted in five public places, constitutes an exception to and prevails over the general provisions of part 3, tit. 2 (sections 1041–1380), section 1142, subd. f (as added by St. 1921, p. 875, § 1), requiring publication only, and section 1056, requiring both publication and posting, as provided by section 1053, section 1054, subd. 1, and section 1055.

4. Counties 🔑178—Notice of county bond election need only be published in newspaper though also ordered posted by board of supervisors.

While an order of the county board of supervisors, pursuant to statutory authority, has all the sanction and effect of a direct statutory enactment, notice of a county bond election need only be published in newspapers published in the county, as required by Pol. Code, § 4088, though also ordered posted at each polling place by the board, which cannot add to or take from the statutory requirement, which is jurisdictional.

Application by Imperial County for writ of mandate to compel W. D. Garey, county Auditor, to attest certain county bonds. Writ granted.

E. R. Simon and Chas. E. Scott, both of El Centro, for petitioner.

Hickcox, Crenshaw & Trude, of El Centro, amici curiæ.

O'Melveny, Millikin, Tuller & Macneil and Paul E. Schwab, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an original application for a writ of mandate to compel the auditor of Imperial county to attest certain county bonds, the issuance whereof had been authorized by the electors of the county voting at a special election called for that purpose by the board of supervisors. Respondent bases his refusal to attest the bonds upon the ground that the election was not properly noticed.

The election was held under section 4088 of the Political Code. It is conceded that the notice, which is specifically defined in that section, was given. But it is claimed by respondent that the provisions of other sections of the Political Code respecting notice are equally applicable to such special bond elections, and that the notices provided for by such other sections should have been given. To be more specific, it is claimed that, in addition to the notice which is specifically prescribed by section 4088, there also should have been given the notices defined in section 1056 and in subdivision (f) of section 1142 of the Political Code.

Section 4088 is found in part 4 of the Political Code, the provisions whereof relate exclusively to the government of counties, cities, and towns. The article in which this particular section occurs (article 13) is entitled "Issuance of Bonds," and deals exclusively with the issuance of county bonds. In so far, at least, as notice is concerned, section 4088 provides a complete and comprehensive scheme for calling county bond elections. It reads in part as follows:

> "Any county * * * may incur * * * a bonded indebtedness for any purposes for which the board of supervisors are herein authorized to expend the funds of said county. * * * Such indebtedness shall be * * * incurred in the following manner, to wit: The board of supervisors thereof shall by order specify the purpose for which the indebtedness is to be incurred, the amount of bonds which they propose to issue * * * and shall further provide for submitting the question of the issuance of said bonds to the qualified electors of the county at the next general election, or at a special election to be called by the board for that purpose. * * * If a special election is called, none but qualified voters of the county shall be permitted to vote thereat, and it shall be held as nearly as practicable in conformity with the general election law of the state. * * * Notice shall be given of such election by publication in one or more newspapers published in the county, once a week for at least four weeks, or daily for not less than thirty days prior to said election. If there be no such newspaper, then by posting the same conspicuously in five public places in said county at least thirty days before said election. Such notice must contain the time and place or places of holding such election, the names of election officers to conduct same, the amount and denomination of the bonds, the rate of interest to be paid, and the number of years, not exceeding forty, the whole or any part of such bonds are to run. * * * If two-thirds of the electors of the county voting at such an election shall vote in favor of issuing such bonds, the board must proceed to issue the amount of bonds specified."

Sections 1056 and 1142 are found in title 2 of part 3 of the Political Code. That title contains the general provisions relating to elections. It deals with elections generally.

Section 1142 forms part of a chapter which is headed "Boards of Election." The section deals with the appointment of election officers. Subdivision (f) of the section (as added by St. 1921, p. 875, § 1) after providing that the county clerk or registrar of voters shall mail or deliver a notice of appointment to each person whom the board of supervisors has appointed to act as an election officer, reads:

> "He [the county clerk or registrar of voters] shall also publish the names of the election officers appointed and polling places designated for each election precinct in some daily newspaper published in the county or city and county where the election is to be held, for three successive issues, the last publication to be at least one week before the day such election is to be held."

Section 1056 is found in an article entitled "Election Proclamations." The sections constituting the article are numbered 1053 to 1056, inclusive. Section 1053 provides for the issuance by the Governor of an election proclamation before every general election and also whenever he orders a special election to fill a vacancy in the office of state Senator or member of the Assembly. Subdivision 1 of section 1054 provides that the Governor's proclamation must contain "a statement of the time of election, and of the offices to be filled." Section 1055 provides for the publication and posting by the several boards of supervisors of the Governor's election proclamation. It is required—

> "to be published in some newspaper printed in the county, if any, and to be posted at each place of election at least ten days before the election, and in case of special elections to fill a vacancy in the office of state senator or member of assembly, the board of supervisors, upon receipt of such proclamation, may, in their discretion, cause a copy of the same to be published or posted as hereinbefore provided, except that such publication or posting need not be made for a longer period than five days before such election."

Section 1056 reads:

> "Whenever a special election is ordered by the board of supervisors, they must issue an election proclamation, containing the statement provided for in subdivision one, section ten hundred and fifty-four, and must publish and post it in the same manner as proclamations issued by the Governor."

[1] We shall first consider respondent's claim that notice should have been given by the county clerk in conformity with subdivision (f) of section 1142. It will be recalled that section 4088 declares that the notice prescribed by it shall contain "the time and place or places of holding such [bond] election" and the "names of election officers to conduct the same." So far, therefore, as the contents of the notice are concerned, subdivision (f) of section 1142 does not differ substantially from section 4088—the former simply declaring that the notice required by it shall contain "the names of the election officers appointed and polling places designated for each election precinct," which is substantially what is required to be set forth in the notice described by section 4088.

Section 4088 does not say that, if a special bond election is had, it shall be "called" in conformity with the general election law. The language is: "* * * and it [a special bond election] shall be held as nearly as practicable in conformity with the general election law of the state." There is an obvious distinction between calling an election, including the giving of notice thereof, and holding an election. This distinction is recognized throughout the Code. Section 1133, for example, declares that the board or body charged with the conduct of any of the elections mentioned in section 1044 may precinct the territory within which such election "is to be held." The use of the phrase "is to be held" (the future tense) clearly indicates that the holding of an election embraces acts which follow the calling of the election—that the holding of an election embraces such acts as, for example, the opening of the polls on the election day, the casting of the ballots, the challenging of voters, the canvassing of the vote, etc.

There is nothing in section 1044 which tends to indicate that it was the legislative intention that the notice of election should be deemed to be a part of the holding of an election. That section, after referring specifically to certain elections, declares that—

> "All other special elections, including all special elections to vote upon or for or against any proposition or question authorized to be submitted to a vote, shall be conducted under the provisions of sections 1044, 1120, 1121, 1133 and 1151 of this Code."

It is true that two of the sections to which reference is thus made, sections 1133 and 1151, do provide for acts which necessarily must precede the actual holding of the election—section 1133 providing for the precincting of the territory within which the special election is to be held and section 1151, providing for the appointment of the persons who are to serve upon the election boards. But section 1044 makes no reference to the subject of notice, either directly or indirectly. It is only to the extent that the specifically referred to sections—sections 1120, 1121, 1133, and 1151—deal with matters which in point of time precede the opening of the polls on the election day that section 1044 can be deemed to prescribe duties which are to be performed in connection with a county bond election prior to the actual holding of the election.

For these reasons we conclude that, with respect to the matter of notice, there is nothing in the language of either section 4088 or section 1044 which in and of itself warrants the inference that any of the sections which deal with the subject of elections generally are applicable.

It only remains to consider whether the county authorities must give the notices prescribed by those sections which relate generally to the subject of elections, notwithstanding section 4088 does not of itself make such other sections applicable to county bond elections.

[2, 3] It is a well-established cannon of construction that where there are two provisions in a statute, one of which is general, and designed to apply to cases generally, and the other particular, relating to only one subject, the particular provision will as a general rule prevail and will be treated as an exception to the general provision. In Felt v. Felt, 19 Wis. 193, the court states the rule thus:

> "But it is a well-settled rule of construction that specific provisions relating to a particular subject must govern in respect to that subject, as against general provisions in other parts of the law, which might otherwise be broad enough to include it."

See, also, Talcott v. Harbor Commissioners, 53 Cal. 199; Trinity County v. Mendocino County, 151 Cal. 284, 285, 90 Pac. 685; Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Pacific Co., 31 Cal. App. 108, 109, 159 Pac. 992; In re Rouse, 91 Fed. 96, 33 C. C. A. 356; Gardner v. School District, 34 Okl. 716, 126 Pac. 1018; Hawkins v. Bare, 63 W. Va. 431, 60 S. E. 391; Dahnke v. People, 168 Ill. 102, 48 N. E. 137, 39 L. R. A. 197; Stockett v. Bird, 18 Md. 484; and Rodgers v. United States, 185 U. S. 83, 22 Sup. Ct. 582, 46 L. Ed. 816. According to this canon of construction the special provision contained in section 4088 with reference to the giving of notice of county bond elections must be held to constitute an exception to the general provision contained in subdivision (f) of section 1142.

What we have said regarding the inapplicability of subdivision (f) of section 1142 is equally true of section 1056. That section, by its express reference to subdivision 1 of section 1054, requires the publication and posting of an election proclamation which shall set forth "a statement of the time of election and of the offices to be filled." Assuming, for the purpose of this decision only, that the form of proclamation thus defined may be made to fit the case of a special county bond election, still the fact remains that section 1056 is general in its terms and is designed to apply to special elections in a general way. Section 4088, on the other hand, relates to one specific subject—the issuance of county bonds; and with respect to the matter of notice it provides such a complete and comprehensive procedure that it is evident that it was intended to be the exclusive expression of the legislative will upon the subject of notice.

There is no conflict between the foregoing views and what was said in Cohn v. Isensee, 45 Cal. App. 531, 188 Pac. 279. There the court was impelled to place upon the statute in question a construction which would harmonize it with the Constitution, and it did not clearly appear in that case that the Legislature intended to prescribe by the special statute all the rules which would govern. In the present case it does appear that it must have been the intention to make the section, which deals specifically with the subject of county bond elections (section 4088), a full and complete expression of the legislative will concerning the matter of notice.

Subdivision (f) of section 1142 requires publication only—not posting. So, also, section 4088 requires publication, and not posting, in all cases where there is a daily or a weekly newspaper published in the county. If publication were made pursuant to the terms of each of these two sections, there would be substantially a duplication of notice, notwithstanding the difference in the time or period of publication prescribed by the two sections respectively. We would be loath to lay at the door of the Legislature the absurdity of requiring such an unnecessary recurrence of duplicate notices. Section 1056 requires both posting and publishing. Section 4088 dispenses with posting in all cases where there is a newspaper published in the county. There is in this respect an inherent antagonism between the two sections. Cohn v. Isensee, supra, expressly recognizes that, where there is such antagonism between the general and the special law the latter operates exclusively upon the subject with which it deals.

[4] In calling the election, the board of supervisors ordered that the notice not only be published but that it be posted at each polling place at least 10 days before the election. Though the notice was published as ordered by the board and as prescribed by section 4088, it was not posted. Wherefore, notwithstanding section 4088 does not make posting a necessary prerequisite where there is a newspaper in which publication may be made, it is contended by respondent that the board's order had all of the effect of a statute, and that a strict compliance therewith was essential. Without doubt an order of the board which is made pursuant to the authorization of a statute has all of the sanction and effect of a direct statutory enactment (Murphy v. San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444; San Luis Obispo v. Fitzgerald, 126 Cal. 279, 58 Pac. 699; Inglewood v. Kew, 21 Cal. App. 611, 132 Pac. 780); but that is not this case. Here the notice was given in strict conformity with the specific requirements of section 4088 of the Political Code, and that, as we have seen, is the only notice which the statute demands. The board of supervisors is without power or authority to add to or take from the statutory requirement. The notice prescribed by the Legislature is jurisdictional, and the board of supervisors is powerless to add aught to the jurisdictional requirements which the Legislature has seen fit to provide. Hamilton v. Detroit, 83 Minn. 119, 85 N. W. 933; State v. Gordon, 217 Mo. 103, 116 S. W. 1099; State v. Ross, 160 Mo. App. 682, 143 S. W. 502; State v. Commissioners, 28 Wyo. 30, 200 Pac. 469. Respondent places much reliance upon Thrasher v. Kirksville (Mo. Sup.) 204 S. W. 804. That case is clearly distinguishable from this. There it was held, in effect, that the power of a city to make a contract, if the grant of power be silent as to the precise manner in which the power shall be exercised, carries with it the implied authority at the discretion of the body exercising it, to call for bids and to let the contract to the lowest and best bidder. In the instant case the statute, which is specific as to the kind of notice to be given, leaves no room for the discretionary exercise of any power beyond that specifically delegated by the statute.

The demurrer interposed by respondent to the petition is overruled, and it is ordered that the peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed.

COURVIOSIER v. BURGER. (Civ. 2393.)

1. Negligence 🔑136(10)—Question for jury on conflicting evidence.

In a personal injury action, where the testimony of plaintiff and that of defendant differed as to how the accident occurred, the question was for the jury.

2. Appeal and error 🔑1002—Jury's finding on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

The jury's finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal where the Supreme Court cannot say that the evidence on which the finding was based is unworthy of belief.

3. Municipal corporations 🔑705(1)—Automobile driver who failed to blow horn or stop machine on discovery of pedestrian crossing street held negligent.

An automobile driver who turned from one street into intersecting street crowded with traffic and pedestrians, and, with knowledge that a pedestrian was crossing such other street where pedestrians customarily did so, failed to blow his horn or stop machine to permit the pedestrian to safely cross, but zigzagged the machine and turned it toward and ran over her when she backed up to avoid the machine, was guilty of negligence.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Pedestrian crossing street at street intersection not contributorily negligent for failure to look up and down intersecting street.

Pedestrian who started to cross street at the place allotted to and ordinarily used by pedestrians, and who before leaving the sidewalk carefully looked up and down the street, but was struck by an automobile which had turned into the street from an intersecting street, held not contributorily negligent as a matter of law, though she did not look up and down the intersecting street.

5. Negligence 🔑72—One placed in sudden peril not held to strict accountability.

Under circumstances of sudden and terrifying peril produced by another, the injured person is not held to the same strict accountability as in positions more favorable for the exercise of deliberate and accurate judgment.

6. Pleading 🔑246(3)—Amendment of complaint when case was called for trial so as to correct typographical error held proper.

In action for injuries sustained when struck by an automobile at street intersection, in which the original complaint alleged that the plaintiff was walking from the northeast corner of certain streets to the "southeast corner," permitting plaintiff to amend complaint when the case was called for trial so as to make it read that plaintiff was walking to the "northwest corner" held proper.

7. Trial 🔑165—Refusal to excuse jury during motion for nonsuit held proper.

The court's refusal to excuse the jury while defendant moved for a nonsuit held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Daisy Courviosier against Arthur I. Burger. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Charles Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Ray T. Coughlin and Marco S. Zarick, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages caused by the alleged negligent operation of an automobile by defendant whereby plaintiff was run over and severely injured, and she was awarded a verdict of $3,000 by the trial jury. The appeal is from the judgment entered thereon in her favor. As to the circumstances of the accident, which occurred on Eighth street, Sacramento, plaintiff testified as follows:

> "I was prepared to go to work, and I was going to the post office, down K street, going towards the post office. I walked on a straight line from the sidewalk, about the center of K street. As I crossed Eighth street, until I reached about six or seven feet from K street, on Eighth, I heard a noise suddenly to my left; so I turned. I saw the car almost on me, so near I could not tell whether it was a car or truck, it was so close to me. Just as I swung back, Mr. Burger turned the car away from me immediately, and immediately back on me. He turned away and started back on me. My first temptation was—when I turned around, I sprung back, I bumped into a woman behind me; she would have been struck if I hadn't. As he turned away from me, he suddenly backed on me immediately and knocked me down, and the front wheel, right-hand, ran over both of my limbs. * * * It was coming direct for me, and I sprang back. As I sprung back the front wheel turned direct away from me, and direct back on me. * * * I sprang back as far as—until I struck somebody; seemed kind it swung away, started back, turned around, swung back on me, knocked me down, ran over me."

The record also shows the following questions and answers:

> "Q. When you stepped off, Mrs. Courviosier, to cross the street, did you look up and down the street both? A. I always do; yes; I did. Q. You looked up and down Eighth street? A. Yes; just as I said, then this car came around, almost ran around the policeman about from K street on Eighth street, so rapidly, right on the corner, what I heard was the noise closer. Q. You saw him round the policeman? A. No; I did not; I was looking straight ahead; it was perfectly clear when I crossed over. Q. Did you look to the right and left? A. Not any distance, except in front of me. Q. You did not look to the right or left, but was looking straight ahead? A. I looked, except the distance, I know I was the distance before; I saw nothing coming either way. I could have crossed the street if it hadn't come so suddenly. * * * Q. Did the automobile continue on past the corner, or stop at the time it ran over you? A. He stopped; for the first time, he blew the horn; when he was over me he blew the horn for the first time."

Mrs. Carrie Tobin, who was crossing the street just behind plaintiff, testified:

> "I was walking—just walked off the sidewalk, right in front of the S. P. Building. Mrs. Courviosier was just a step or two ahead of me, and proceeded—the machine came up around, started to come around the intersection very quick. Mrs. Courviosier was hit. She was five or six feet from the sidewalk, a step or two ahead of me. The machine came up so quick, knocked her down, and went over her body. I did not hear the horn toot until it was on top of Mrs. Courviosier. * * * Q. Did you notice how the machine was operated; was there anything about that specially, either about the man or the way he managed the machine? A. Yes; the machine zigzagged a couple of times; he turned the machine; she stepped back; he turned it again, turned it right in front of her, and deliberately knocked her down."

It may be added that both of these witnesses testified to declarations in reference to the accident which they claim to have heard the defendant make.

According to plaintiff, the defendant, while at the hospital, "said he was so rattled he did not know what he was doing; he turned around, he was so rattled he did not know what he was doing; that is what he told me in the hospital."

Mrs. Tobin testified:

> "There were two gentlemen sitting in the corner of the Receiving Hospital there. I made the remark that the gentlemen did not blow his horn until he was on top of her. I did not know who Mr. Burger was. He stepped up; he said, 'I beg your pardon, lady, I did not toot my horn at all.' He made the statement in the hospital."

[1, 2] Although Mr. Burger was a witness at the trial, he made no denial of these statements; in fact, he was not interrogated concerning them. He did, however, as might be expected, give a different account of the accident. According to his version, the collision was entirely due to the negligent act of plaintiff in stepping backward in front of the truck. To the extent, though, that his story conflicted with that of plaintiff, it was a matter entirely for the determination of the jury, and, of course, the finding is binding upon us, since we cannot say that the testimony imputing negligence to defendant is unworthy of belief.

The main contention of appellant is that the evidence shows without conflict that plaintiff is chargeable with contributory negligence, and that the verdict would and should have been in favor of defendant if the jury had given due heed to the following instruction of the trial court:

> "If you believe from the evidence that at the time of the accident the defendant, Burger, was driving his motortruck in a careful and prudent manner, and if the jury further believes from the evidence that the defendant, Burger, saw the plaintiff in front of him, and that she was then walking to his left and out of the path of the automobile, and not in a line directly in front of said automobile, the said Burger had the right to assume that the plaintiff would continue on in the same direction in which she was then going and had the right to assume that she would not stop or hesitate or run backwards so as to be in front of the motortruck, and you are further instructed that, if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff, Daisy C. Courviosier, did stop or hesitate or run backwards and so placed herself in front of the motortruck and in a position of danger, then she was guilty of contributory negligence as will defeat her right of action herein, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

In answer to this contention it is deemed proper to state that this hypothetical instruction was based upon the testimony of defendant, and it was proper for the court to so present defendant's theory of the case, but the jurors discredited his testimony and accepted that of plaintiff's witnesses. The question is, then, whether the testimony, which seems to have carried conviction to their minds, is legally sufficient to support the view that defendant was negligent, that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and that plaintiff acted as an ordinarily prudent person would act under the circumstances. We think there can be no kind of doubt that these questions must be answered favorably to respondent.

There is no controversy as to the general statement of the duty of the driver of an automobile embodied in the following instructions of the trial court:

> "The driver of the automobile was under the legal duty to use reasonable care to avoid colliding with other vehicles or persons in the public highway. His duty was to be on the alert to observe persons who were in the street or about to cross the street and to use reasonable care to avoid colliding with them. He was under an obligation to take notice of the conditions existing in the public street and to propel his car in a manner suitable to those conditions. He was under a duty to observe the condition which existed at the crosswalk. The defendant should, as he approached the crosswalk, have kept a careful watch ahead to avoid injury to pedestrians using the crosswalk. The driver of the motor vehicle in this case, at the time and place in question, was required to maintain such control of his machine that on the shortest notice he could stop it so as to prevent injury to pedestrians.

> "When one crossing a street at the proper place becomes confused and vacillates as to the course he or she shall pursue, reasonable care may require that the driver stop his automobile in order to avoid the collision."

[3] This duty of the driver in the present case is emphasized by the consideration that he was using a city street crowded with traffic and thronged with pedestrians. He had also just changed his course of travel from K to Eighth street, which involved a situation of increased peril to pedestrians crossing the latter street. Giving full credit, as we must, to plaintiff's testimony, we find defendant in this situation: He turned into Eighth street without giving any audible signal to call attention to the change in his course. He approached the crossing with the same omission, notwithstanding plaintiff was proceeding across the street in the accustomed place and unaware of his approach until the automobile was within a few feet of her. If he had been alert, he could have seen she was oblivious of the impending danger. Indeed, the evidence—his own testimony, in fact—justifies the inference that he did see the plaintiff, and that he knew her attention was not directed to the machine until it was within five or six feet of her. Under these circumstances, he was negligent, of course, in failing to sound the horn, and, moreover, common prudence and proper regard for human safety would direct him to stop his machine when he realized that the danger was so imminent. Besides, there is support for the theory that he was actively and aggressively negligent and even reckless in his management of the machine after he discovered the danger, or, as characterized by the witnesses, he became "rattled," "zigzagged" the truck, and seemed deliberately to pursue the plaintiff.

That the testimony which we have quoted shows a case of negligence on the part of defendant cannot be gainsaid, and, manifestly, that negligence contributed proximately to the accident. This latter proposition is not disputed, and, indeed, is so self-evident as not to admit of candid discussion.

[4, 5] The question remains whether plaintiff, according to her own story, was so incautious and imprudent as to preclude recovery. We are satisfied that the jury was entirely warranted in finding that she did all that the law or enlightened conscience required. A few of her statements appear somewhat uncertain and obscure, but this is not surprising, in view of her unfamiliarity with court proceedings and the stress and excitement of the occasion of the accident. A fair and just inference from her testimony is, however, that she was crossing the street in the place allotted to and ordinarily used by pedestrians; that before leaving the sidewalk she carefully looked up and down the street—that is, she looked south and north on Eighth street—and saw no vehicle approaching. This is all that she was required to do before proceeding on her way. It could not be claimed with any reason that she should have looked up and down K street in anticipation that a vehicle might turn from that street into Eighth street. If that duty were imposed upon a pedestrian, it is easy to see that he might be kept waiting during all the busy hours of the day. When she saw no one approaching she was entirely warranted in pursuing her journey, assuming that, if any one turned from K into Eighth before she crossed, he would give her timely warning of his approach. Manifestly, she could not go forward with safety if she were required to watch constantly for vehicles that might change their course at right angles. Nor does her testimony reveal any want of proper care after she became aware of the proximity of the machine of defendant. It appears that the movement she made was likely to promote her safety, and in all probability would have enabled her to avoid the machine had it not been for the eccentric action of the defendant. Besides, the rule is that under circumstances of such sudden and terrifying peril produced by another the injured person is not held to the same strict accountability as in positions more favorable for the exercise of deliberate and accurate judgment. Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677. At any rate, it was for the jury to say whether she acted with due caution and circumspection

As before indicated, there is some sanction for the application of the doctrine of the "last clear chance" or wanton indifference, but it is deemed sufficient to base the decision upon the other ground.

The cases cited by appellant are not opposed to the conclusion we have reached.

In Cawley v. La Cross City Ry. Co., 101 Wis. 145, 77 N. W. 179, it was held that the failure of a person to look and listen and to see and hear an approaching car, if within plain view and hearing, is negligence per se. Therein the plaintiff was injured while attempting to cross a railroad track, and the court adhered to the well-established rule that in this class of cases, for reasons which need not be repeated, such duty is inflexible. It may be added that additionally the court held that there was no ground for charging the defendant with negligence at all.

In Moss v. H. R. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 Pac. 631, the plaintiff stepped from the sidewalk into the street without looking for the approach of vehicles. Therein it was said by the court:

> "Giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, and resolving every reasonable inference which may be drawn therefrom in favor of plaintiff, the inevitable conclusion must be that plaintiff left his place of safety on the sidewalk and stepped directly into the path of the moving automobile."

That such conduct was negligence, and that of the grossest kind, on the part of the plaintiff, is, of course, incontrovertible.

No fault can be found with the doctrine announced in Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493, that it is the duty of a pedestrian "to look to the right and to the left whenever he has voluntarily put himself in a position which may be one of peril coming from either direction and in particular when he has received adequate warning of the likelihood of peril." In that case the plaintiff did not look, although he was warned by a "loud and raucous" noise from the machine which was backing toward him.

The case of Beeler v. Atchison, T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 107 Kan. 522, 192 Pac. 741, was decided upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to show negligence on the part of the defendant, and in commenting upon that consideration the court very properly said that "it was not within the province of the jury to indulge in mere conjecture and speculation for the purpose of finding negligence," and the conclusion was reached that the verdict of the jury must have been based upon mere conjecture, since there was no substantial evidence of the want of proper care in the shipment of certain animals.

In Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 604, 93 Pac. 677, the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed, although there was a failure on the part of Scott to observe "the car standing at the corner ready to start at the time he started to make the turn." The opinion contains an interesting discussion of the correlative duties of the motorman and of the driver of the vehicle that was struck, concerning which there can be no difference of opinion. The case is, however, in point only to the extent that it involved the general principles of negligence.

Wheelahan v. Philadelphia Traction Co., 150 Pa. 187, 24 Atl. 688, was the case of a driver of a vehicle attempting to cross a street car track upon which a car was approaching, and it was properly held that the failure of the plaintiff to lean forward so as to prevent the hood on his wagon from obstructing or limiting his view was negligence preventing recovery.

Carson v. Federal Street & Pleasant Valley Railway Co., 147 Pa. 219, 23 Atl. 369, 15 L. R. A. 257, 30 Am. St. Rep. 727, also involved the crossing of a street car track and the application of the familiar rule requiring one to look and listen so as to avoid walking or driving directly in front of a moving car.

We may conclude the consideration of this branch of the case with a reference to the decision of the New York Court of Appeals in Baker v. Close, 204 N. Y. 92, 97 N. E. 501, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 487, wherein is pointed out the distinction between a case of this character and one involving a collision "at grade street crossing of a steam railroad." As to the latter it is said that the duty is inflexible for the wayfarer "to look both ways, to listen, and, if necessary, to stop," but—

> "it is different, however, as to the rights and duties of pedestrians and drivers in the use of crossings on our city streets. There, the right of passage is common to all, and both footmen and drivers are bound to exercise reasonable care for their own safety and the safety of others upon the street. The rigorous rule applicable to steam railroad crossings is necessarily relaxed, * * * and the footman is not required as matter of law to look both ways and listen; but only to exercise such reasonable care as the case requires, for he has the right to assume that a driver will also exercise due care and approach the crossing with his vehicle under proper control."

The recent case of Deputy v. Kimmel, 73 W. Va. 595, 80 S. E. 919, 51 L. R. A. (N. S.) 989, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 656, and the note thereto appended contain also interesting and pertinent suggestions upon the subject. We may quote from the syllabus the following:

> "A person lawfully in a public highway may rely upon the exercise of reasonable care by drivers of vehicles to avoid injury. Failure to anticipate omission of such care does not render him negligent. A pedestrian is not bound, as a matter of law, to be continuously looking or listening to ascertain if automobiles or other vehicles are approaching, under penalty that, if he fails to do so and is injured, his own negligence will defeat recovery of damages sustained."

We feel satisfied that under any just and reasonable rule or the sanction of any recognized authority it cannot be said that the verdict of the jury is unwarranted.

[6] When the case was called for trial, plaintiff asked and was granted permission to amend her complaint so as to correct a typographical error. The mistake was in the statement that she was walking from the northeast corner of Eighth and K streets, to the "southeast corner of Eighth and K streets," whereas, it should have been to the "northwest corner of Eighth and K streets."

Of course, appellant was not prejudiced by the action of the court. It would, indeed, have been strange if the trial judge had not permitted the amendment. If he had refused it, he would certainly be subject to censure. But he did what might be expected by those who understand the importance of the exercise of a wise discretion to see that causes are tried upon their merits.

[7] The other complaint of appellant is equally devoid of merit. It is disclosed by the following quotation from the record:

> "Mr. Coughlin: Plaintiff rests.
> "Mr. Gilmore: I would like to submit a matter before the court; if the court sees fit, may we excuse the jury.

"The Court: I don't believe it is necessary; just state your motion; I do not care to hear it argued."

Thereupon counsel for appellant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. We know nothing in the law requiring the court to hear argument upon a motion for nonsuit or to order the motion to be made in the absence or without the hearing of the jury. It is a matter committed to the sound discretion of the trial judge, and we perceive no reason for doubting the propriety of the course that was pursued. No doubt, the trial judge was satisfied that the case was one for the jury, and that it would lead simply to a waste of time and effort to permit argument. We think that such conclusion was entirely justified. If it was thought by appellant that the jurors might be inclined to consider the circumstances as an indication of the judge's opinion in favor of plaintiff, and hence might be more readily induced to find a verdict for her, he should have requested an instruction to meet the situation.

After a consideration of the whole record, we are confident that the verdict should not be disturbed, and the judgment is affirmed.

GILBERT v. CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (Civ. 4390.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚷218(3)—Lack of work is good reason for dispensing with services of employee.

Lack of work is good reason for dispensing with the services of an employee.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷217(3)—Seasonal civil service employee after discharge has no better position than other unemployed eligibles.

A seasonal civil service employee, on being laid off, is no more an employee than before his first assignment, but is relegated to the position of an unemployed eligible; nor does his period of temporary service, succeeded by a revival of eligibility for another appointment, create a municipal position or invest the registrant with a permanent appointive eligibility comparable to a tenure of position in a permanent service.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷217(3)—Not necessary that civil service registrants remain continuously unemployed for more than two years before name may be stricken.

Under article 13, § 10, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, granting to civil service commissioners the discretionary power to strike any name from the list of eligibles after the lapse of two years from the time it was entered, it is not necessary for a name to have remained on the register continuously for two years before it may be stricken, but where a candidate has been given temporary employment and thereafter relegated again to the eligibles list, his name may be stricken, though a full two years have not elapsed after the close of his temporary employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Walter Perry Johnson, Judge.

An action by William Gilbert, for a writ of mandamus to be directed to the Civil Service Commission of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James F. Tevlin, of San Francisco, and Wm. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George Lull, City Atty., and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. This is an original proceeding in mandamus, instituted in the superior court to compel the defendants, constituting the civil service commission of the city and county of San Francisco, to restore petitioner's name to a place upon the register of candidates eligible to appointment to the position of ordinary clerk in the classified service of the city and county. A demurrer to the amended petition having been sustained, and the petitioner having failed to further amend, the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment petitioner prosecutes this appeal.

From the petition it appears that, after an examination held for that purpose, the civil service commission prepared a register of candidates for appointment to the position of ordinary clerk, and that petitioner's name was placed upon said register on the 21st day of June, 1909; that at divers times between said date and the 2d day of August, 1921, the petitioner, after due certification therefor, held various temporary or seasonal positions as ordinary clerk under various civil departments and offices of the municipality; that on the 15th day of July, 1921, the civil service commission adopted a resolution wherein it was declared that the name of the petitioner was then and thereby removed from said register on the ground that said name had remained upon said register for more than two years; that at the time said resolution was adopted the petitioner was actually employed as an ordinary clerk in the office of the auditor of said city and county; that at no time between the said 21st day of June, 1909, to the 15th day of July, 1921, did petitioner's name remain upon said register without appointment or employment as an ordinary clerk under the city and county for a continuous period of two years.

The controversy involves an interpretation of the powers of the civil service commission as defined in section 10 of article 13 of the charter, and which reads in part as follows:

> "The commissioners may strike off the names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years."

The position of the appellant is that—

> "An ordinary clerk, while in employment as such, is not a candidate and his name is not upon the register, and that never between June 21, 1909, the date of his original registration, and July 15, 1921, the date of the resolution complained of, was the appellant a candidate, or was his name on the register, for a period of more than two years; secondly, that, in that he was an employee in the civil service at the time the resolution was passed, he could be removed only for cause, upon written charges, and opportunity afforded him to be heard in his defense, and, as no charges were made against him, the resolution complained of was void on this ground, as well as on the ground first above stated."

Respondents answer that appellant's name was continuously upon the eligible list from 1909 until it was stricken off in 1921; that, when an ordinary clerk is given a temporary or seasonal appointment, his name is not taken from the register but a notation of the appointment is made and the "eligibility" of the person is still retained for other or future certification and appointment. As to the second point, respondents answer that the resolution of July 15, 1921, did not affect appellant's tenure of the position that he was filling, but merely rendered him ineligible for further appointment.

At the conclusion of the hearing in the trial court the learned trial judge rendered an opinion, giving his reasons for denying the writ, which we approve and from which we quote:

> "Pursuant to a rule in force since June, 1909, seasonal service in any one or more of the departments for not less than six months entitled the registrant to preference in the matter of temporary clerkships. * * * In other words, the contention of the plaintiff is that service of six months in seasonal clerical positions places the registrant in the category of a civil service employee, having an established position as a permanent seasonal clerk subject to call. On this theory classification as a preferred seasonal clerk is declared to confer a permanency of clerical tenure with employment merely suspended during seasons of idleness. No matter how often the registrant may be laid off for lack of work, it is urged that he retains a permanent status as one qualified to render seasonal service, and through such status becomes vested with a right to the opportunity of employment which abides with him indefinitely.
> [1] "The vice of this argument is that it treats one discharged from employment as still holding the equivalent of a permanent position in the city government. It is well settled that lack of work is good reason for dispensing with the service of an employee. Dunne v. New York, 116 App. Div. 331, 101 N. Y. Supp. 678; Eckerson v. New York, 80 App. Div. 12, 80 N. Y. Supp. 168, 170; State v. City of Seattle, 116 Wash. 326, 199 Pac. 449. And the reduction of the force of employees has the effect of abolishing a corresponding number of positions. O'Neill v. Williams, 53 Cal. App. 1, 199 Pac. 870; People v. Delaney (Sup.) 190 N. Y. Supp. 29; Randolph v. Smith, 92 Misc. Rep. 291, 155 N. Y. Supp. 991; Petty v. Kracke (Sup.) 154 N. Y. Supp. 294. Adopting this principle in Rodrigue v. Rogers, 4 Cal. App. 257, 263, 87 Pac. 563, 565, which dealt with the case of an extra clerk whose period of seasonal service had ended, the court said: 'He was employed for a limited term, and upon the expiration of the term of his employment he ceased to hold office or to be an employee of the municipality.'
> [2] "Hence, when a seasonal clerk is laid off, he is no more an employee than he was before his first assignment, but is relegated to the position of an unemployed eligible. An appointment to a seasonal position does not cause the removal of the appointee's name from the list of eligibles. The name keeps its place, and, on the termination of the employment the registrant falls back into the group of eligibles, and may receive later a new appointment. But he has no greater right to permanent retention of his name on the general list than any other registrant whose name was placed on the list at the same time as his, but who, bcause of lower rank, has gone the entire period of two years without receiving any appointment at all.
> "There is no authority for holding that temporary service for six months, succeeded by a revival of eligibility for another appointment, creates a municipal position or invests the registrant with a permanent tenure of reappointive eligibility comparable to the tenure of position by a clerk in permanent service. The promulgation of an eligible list does not create an absolute right for an indefinite period. The life of the list is governed by the provisions of the law; and every person gaining a place on the list is charged with notice that his opportunity for employment is limited by the legal duration of the list itself. When the list is abolished, the quality of eligibility is lost, and can be regained only through the successful test of a new examination.
> [3] "But an argument in favor of the creation and maintenance of a special list in behalf of preferred seasonal clerks is hung upon the use of the word 'candidates' in section 10 of article 13, where the commissioners are authorized to 'strike off names of candidates from the register after they have remained thereon more than two years.' It is argued that, while a clerk is filling a seasonal position, his name no longer appears on the register as that of a candidate, and that he becomes again a candidate only when laid off. Hence, it is urged that the power of the commission to expunge names applies only in respect of those registrants who have been on the list as continuously unemployed candidates for more than two years awaiting opportunity for employment.

"We must look to the spirit and purpose of the law to determine its meaning. And yet, even if we were held to the strict letter of the law, the clause would hardly be open to the construction suggested. The language of the statute does not imply that the names must remain for over two years as the names of candidates waiting continuously for employment. When applicants take their examinations, they 'take rank upon the register as candidates in the order of their relative excellence'; and this place they hold as long as their names are on the list. So far as their designation for purposes of the register is concerned, they may well be classed as candidates whether they are holding positions or not and it is in this sense that the term is used in the passage above quoted.

"And as I interpret the decisions rendered in Mann v. Tracy, 185 Cal. 272, 196 Pac. 484, and Uhte v. Rosenthal, 37 Cal. App. 519, 174 Pac. 83, it is within the discretion of the commissioners to strike any name from the list of elegibles after the lapse of two years from the time when the name was first entered as that of a candidate elegible for an appointment.

"In the Gilbert Case it is set forth that Gilbert's name was stricken from the register on July 15, 1921, though at that time and thereafter until August 2, 1921, he was doing temporary work in the auditor's office. It is unnecessary to consider whether or not the commissioners' action concerning him was premature. A proceeding such as this is concerned with the protection of an actual subsisting right. It is not to be invoked in support of an abstract right that once existed but no longer endures. There is nothing in the petition of * * * plaintiff showing any present right to the writ."

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

ELLIOTT & HORNE CO. v. CHAMBERS LAND CO. (Civ. 4087.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑104½—Limitation does not run where right to sue is prevented by act of debtor or paramount authority.

Where the right to bring an action is prevented by the act of the debtor or by paramount authority, the period embraced within such restraint is to be excluded from any period of limitation affecting the right to sue as made by statute.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑530—Payment of assessment may be enforced so long as assessment lien continues.

The time within which payment of a street assessment may be enforced is the same as the duration of the lien to secure the payment of the assessment.

3. Limitation of actions 🔑111—Time during which statutory assessment lien must be foreclosed is suspended during injunctive relief granted to owner attacking assessment procedure.

The running of Henning's General Laws 1920, § 9, requiring foreclosure of assessment lien within two years after recording of assessment, is suspended, as respects the holder of a warrant acquired in street assessment proceedings under the Vrooman Act, during the period of injunctive relief granted to the owner of the property assessed, in a suit by him attacking the assessment proceedings.

4. Municipal corporations 🔑530—Holder of warrant for assessment over $25 on which no bond issues may enforce it as if assessment was below $25.

Bond Act of 1893 (Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, Act 3932), providing for the issuance of bonds where assessments exceed $25 except where the owner requests that no bond issue, and how such assessments may be collected by the warrant holder, and the Vrooman Act, providing that an assessment lien continues in force for two years from the recording of the warrant, assessment, and diagram, when read together contemplate that at any time before the issuance of the bond property owners, assessed in excess of $25, may give notice and prevent the issuance of the bond, in which event the assessment is to be considered as though it had been of an amount less than $25, and the warrant holder would become possessed of the same rights as to means of collection as he had with respect to assessments which originally fell below $25.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Suit by the Elliott & Horne Company against the Chambers Land Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with direction.

Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. W. Hyams, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment denying any relief in its suit to foreclose certain liens alleged to have been acquired through street assessment proceedings taken under the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147). Several assessments, covering different parcels of land owned by the defendant corporation, were alleged to have been made, each of which involved an amount in excess of $25. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint upon the sole ground, as appears from the argument of counsel, that the suit had not been commenced within two years after the recording of the assessment diagram and warrant. Henning's General Laws 1920, § 9. The assessment proceedings provided for the issuance of bonds on assessments exceeding $25 agreeable to the provisions of the bond act of 1893 (Deering's General Laws 1915, p. 1761, Act 3932). The Vrooman Act provides that, from the date of the recording of the warrant, assessment, and diagram, a lien against the property assessed arises and continues in force for a period of two years. Where bonds are to be issued under the bond act, the latter provides, first, that "in case the amount of the unpaid assessment or reassessment upon any lot or parcel of land shall be less than $25, then the same shall be collected as is provided in said Street Work Act." For amounts in excess of $25 it is provided that, after the lapse of 35 days, bonds shall be issued, the principal and interest of which shall be payable in installments covering a term of years (in this case six). It is then provided that, in case of a bondable assessment, if the owner shall, before the bond is issued, make affidavit of his ownership and furnish certificate of title in proof thereof, and request that no bond issue, then no such bond shall issue, and that the holder of the warrant or his assigns "shall retain his right for enforcing collection of said assessment or reassessment as if said lot or parcel of land had not been so listed by the street superintendent." The list last referred to is the list required to be made by the street superintendent and delivered to the treasurer, of assessments amounting to more than $25.

The assessment, warrant, and diagram, as they affected the property of the defendant, were recorded in the office of the street superintendent of the municipality of Manhattan Beach on the 24th day of January, 1917. On the 30th day thereafter, to wit, February 23, 1917, the defendant brought an action against the city of Manhattan Beach and other interested defendants, the purpose of the suit being to have declared void all of the proceedings upon which the assessment was based. On the same day the superior court issued a restraining order to prevent the city treasurer of Manhattan Beach from issuing the bonds, and this injunctive restraint was continued in force until May 8, 1918. On May 1, 1918, the defendant filed with the city treasurer its notice requiring that no bonds be issued on the assessment and supplied the necessary affidavit and certificate of title. This action was commenced by the filing of the original complaint on February 6, 1920. By comparison of dates it will be seen that a little over three years had elapsed at the time the suit was commenced from the date of the filing of the warrant, assessment, and diagram in the street superintendent's office. The suit was commenced within two years after the recording of said warrant, if we exclude that period of time from February 23, 1917, to May 8, 1918, during which time the collection of the assessment was restrained by the injunction which prevented any bonds from issuing. The Vrooman Act provides that, as to the collection of assessments, the right to collect by suit shall exist for the duration of the lien which is imposed upon the property as security for the payment of the amount assessed. Vrooman Act, § 12.

[1-3] Very little argument is made here on behalf of respondent against the proposition that, where the right to bring an action is prevented by the act of the debtor or by paramount authority, the period embraced within such restraint is to be excluded from any period of limitation affecting the right to sue as made by statute. The authorities are ample and full in affirmance of that rule. 17 R. C. L. p. 872, par. 229; Steele v. Bliss et al., 166 Mich. 593, 132 N. W. 345, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 859, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 1020. In the latter case it is said that it appears as a "fundamental principle recognized by all the authorities which hold that the running of a statute of limitations is interrupted by an injunction." City of Hutchinson v. Hutchinson et al., 92 Kan. 518, 141 Pac. 589, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1165. It is contended, however, that a statutory lien is bound by fixed and inflexible limits, and cannot be extended unless, perhaps, by a change in the statute itself. The statute of limitations is a thing having equally definite points of beginning and ending. In the case of the street assessments under consideration, the law gives the same duration to the right to enforce payment of the tax as has the lien to secure the same. We have express authority in this state that a lien given by statute may be extended in duration where the act of the debtor prevents the creditor from foreclosing upon the same. In Dewey v. Latson et al., 6 Cal. 131, the court held that a judgment lien, which, under the terms of the statute, was given life for two years from the date of the docketing of the judgment, was extended beyond the period of two years where the judgment creditor was prevented from having execution by reason of an appeal taken. The court there said:

> "The obvious intention was to charge the estate of the judgment debtor, and to give the creditor two years to make his money. The statute intended that this time should run from date of the judgment, or period at which the plaintiff was in a situation to take out execution, and pursue his remedy to final satisfaction. By the defendant's own act, the force of that judgment has been suspended, and the lien, which is merely an incident, must share a like fate."

The above case was referred to in subsequent decisions, sometimes criticized, but never overruled. The reasoning of it is consistent with that adopted by the courts in the decisions referred to the tolling of the time fixed by statutes of limitation. It would be unjust to so construe the law as to allow a property owner to deprive the warrant holder of his right to a lien as security for the payment of a valid assessment, by invoking injunctive authority of the courts in an attack upon the validity of the assessment proceeding. If the property owner were successful in having the injunctive restraint continued until two years had elapsed from the recording of the warrant, the lien would be utterly destroyed and the property might pass into the hands of other owners free from assessment charges. Such a result is certainly not contemplated by the law and may not be countenanced by a court of justice if, upon logical reasons, a different conclusion can be arrived at.

[4] The two statutes read together contemplate that, at any time before the issuance of the bond, property owners who are assessed in excess of $25 will, if they so desire, give their notice and prevent the issuance of the bond; in that event the assessment is to be considered as though it had been of an amount less than $25 and the warrant holder would become possessed of the same rights as to means of collection as he had with respect to assessments which originally fell below the amount of $25.

Our conclusion is that plaintiff's suit was in time; that the demurrer to its complaint was improperly sustained.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to overrule demurrer of the defendant as interposed to the amended complaint of the plaintiff, and to allow said defendant to file an answer, if it so desire.

In re CRUTCHER. (Civ. 3784.)

1. Adoption 🔑1—Unknown at common law; strict compliance with statute necessary.

The proceeding to adopt a child was unknown to common law, and to give the court jurisdiction a strict compliance with the statute is necessary.

2. Statutes 🔑239—Rule requiring strict compliance with statute novel, so far as the common law is concerned, does not compel strained or technical interpretation.

The rule which requires strict compliance with all conditions of a statute, novel in so far as the common law is concerned, does not compel a court to cripple the free functioning of a legislative plan, however new, by applying a strained or technical interpretation of a statute, and no more than a liberal interpretation, with a view to effect the objects of the statute and promote justice, is required (Civ. Code, § 4).

3. Adoption 🔑7—Orphan child may be adopted with approval of court without consent of manager of orphan asylum.

Under Civ. Code, § 224, providing "a legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of its parents, if living, * * *" an orphan child not maintained in orphan asylum may be adopted with the consent of the court without the consent of the manager of an orphan asylum, as is required in the cases of abandoned children which have been maintained at such asylum.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Bertin A. Weyl, Judge.

In the matter of Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Jr., a person under the age of 21 years. From an order denying a petition of Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Sr., that Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Jr., be declared a ward of the juvenile court, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Douglas L. Edmonds, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from an order of the juvenile department of the superior court of Los Angeles county, denying the petition of appellant for an order declaring Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Jr., a ward of the juvenile court. Petitioner is the uncle of the minor, and the respondents James D. and Kate L. Campbell are the parents of the child by adoption, under a decree of the superior court entered on the 26th day of June, 1914, upon which date the natural father and mother were both deceased. The mother died when Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Jr., was an infant, and the father's death occurred on the 3d day of June, 1914, up to which date the child had been cared for by the respondents. In enumerating those who are subject to the jurisdiction of the juvenile court, subdivision 2 of section 1 of the Juvenile Court Law (St. 1915, p. 1225) includes:

> "Those who have no parent or guardian; or who have no parent or guardian willing to exercise or capable of exercising proper parental control; or who have no parent or guardian actually exercising such proper parental control and who is in need of such control."

Therefore this infant is one who may be regarded as a proper subject for juvenile court guardianship unless the existence of some other fact or condition prevents it.

The petitioner contends that the decree of adoption is void. If so, this proceeding falls within the jurisdiction of the juvenile court, as the child would then have no parent or guardian. But respondent invokes the doctrine of res adjudicata, based upon the entry of the decree of adoption and the following additional facts: On the 2d of July, 1914, Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Sr., the child's uncle and petitioner here, made a motion to vacate and annul the decree of adoption. This motion was later amended. Thereafter, on the 5th day of August, 1914, it was denied. A second motion to vacate the adoption was filed by Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Sr., which was also on August 20, 1920, denied No appeal was ever taken from either of these orders.

On the 1st day of December, 1914, Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Sr., filed a petition in the juvenile court, which, after alleging, among other matters, the fact that James D. Campbell and Kate L. Campbell claimed the right to the care and custody of the infant under the adoption proceeding above mentioned, and that the natural parents were deceased, prayed that the child be adjudged a ward of the juvenile court. This petition was, on January 6, 1915, denied and the proceeding dismissed, and no appeal was taken from said judgment and order.

However, the question of res adjudicata is of little importance in determining this appeal, for we do not understand respondent to seriously contend that it is applicable if the decree of adoption is held void upon its face, and appellant insists that it is utterly void in that he asserts that there is no provision in the law of this state for the adoption of a minor orphan child except one who has been maintained in an orphan asylum or charitable institution. This question is therefore squarely presented for our decision.

[1] It is true that the proceeding to adopt a child was unknown to the common law. To give the court jurisdiction in such a matter, compliance with all conditions required by the statute is necessary. This is decided in the Matter of Cozza, 163 Cal. 514, 126 Pac. 161, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 214. But section 221 of our Civil Code states that—

> "Any minor child may be adopted by any adult person, in the cases and subject to the rules prescribed in this chapter."

By section 224 of the Civil Code the consent of the parents is required as a condition essential to a valid adoption in certain cases, and expressly made unnecessary in others, by the following provisions:

> "A legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of its parents, if living; nor an illegitimate child without the consent of its mother, if living; except that consent is not necessary from a father or mother (1) deprived of civil rights or (2) adjudged guilty of (a) adultery or cruelty, and (b) for either cause divorce, or (3) adjudged to be habitually intemperate in the use of intoxicants, or who, (4) has been judicially deprived of the custody of the child on account of (a) cruelty or (b) neglect; (abandoned child) neither is the consent of any one necessary in the case of an abandoned child; provided, however, that any such child, being a half orphan, and kept and maintained in any orphan asylum in this state for more than two years, may be adopted with the consent of the managers of such orphans' home without the consent of the parent unless such parent has paid toward the expenses of maintenance of such half orphan at least a reasonable sum during the said time, if able to do so. (Deserted child.) Any child (1) deserted by both parents, or (2) left in the care and custody of another by its parent or parents (a) without any agreement or provision for its support, (b) for a period of one year, is deemed to be an abandoned child within the meaning of this section, and where the parent is a nonresident of this state such child may without the consent of either parent be adopted with the consent of the managers of such home whenever it has been left in such home for more than one year."

Surely, to hold that consent is necessary to the adoption of a legitimate child whose parents are not living, except in the instances specified in the Code section, would be adding a requirement not contained in it.

Except by inference, section 224 of the Civil Code concerns itself with the regulation of the adoption of the child who, being legitimate, has one or both of its parents in esse, or being illegitimate has its mother living. In such cases consent is made necessary in some instances and dispensed with in others. As far as its express provisions are concerned, one parent must be living in order that the section shall have any application. But by necessary implication section 224 of the Civil Code includes and provides for legitimate children whose parents are deceased. Can it be doubted that, by the phraseology of the first clause, "a legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of the parent, if living," it was the legislative intent to provide that no parental consent is necessary in the adoption of a legitimate child whose parents are not living? It was probably regarded as superfluous to expressly and solemnly decree that, when the parents are dead their consent to the adoption of their offspring may be dispensed with. If we give due regard to the subject-matter of this legislation, it is apparent that, by the provision last quoted, the Legislature has said in effect "a legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of the parents, except that where the parents are not living such consent is unnecessary." Logic compels the conclusion that, by adding the words "if living" to the inhibition contained in the preceding part of the sentence, it was not intended to exclude legitimate orphans from adoption, but rather to indicate that the bar to adoption without consent should have no application in cases where the parents are not living.

It is said that, because the institution of adoption was not found in the common law, nothing can be supplied by inference. To apply this rule strictly would eliminate the entire provision in question. It is only by way of implication that the section allows a legitimate child to be adopted, even with the consent of its parents. The language does not expressly state this may be done, and yet no one has questioned that the right is impliedly created by the statement that such adoption cannot occur without the parent's consent.

Appellant quotes the Supreme Court in Ex parte Chambers, 80 Cal. 216, 22 Pac. 138, as saying "the power to adopt minor children is a creation of the statute which was unknown to the common law, and the mode must be held to be the measure of the power." The same court in In re Johnson, 98 Cal. 531, 541, 33 Pac. 460, loc. cit. 463, 21 L. R. A. 380, referring to this quotation from Ex parte Chambers, said:

> "The court simply meant by this expression that the statute having made the consent of certain parties necessary, there could be no valid adoption without such consent."

[2] The opinion in the Johnson proceeding also holds that the law regulating adoption—

> "is to receive a sensible construction, and its intent is to be ascertained not from the literal meaning of any particular word or single section, but from a construction of the entire scope, spirit and purpose of the statute."

And the rule which requires compliance with all conditions of an enactment, novel in so far as the common law is concerned, does not compel a court to cripple the free functioning of a legislative plan, however new, by applying a strained or technical interpretation. No more strict or different rule of construction can be required in such cases than is established for the construction of a provision of the Code in derogation of the common law, namely, a liberal interpretation with a view to effect its objects and promote justice. Section 4, Civ. Code.

If we are allowed to infer that the negative provision that "a legitimate child cannot be adopted without the consent of the parents if living," means that a legitimate child may be adopted with the consent of such parents, although the section does not expressly so state, it is equally permissible to recognize and give effect to the intent, clearly implied, that if the parents are not living, except in those cases otherwise classified in section 224, the adoption may proceed without parental or other consent, except that of the judge of the superior court. It is pertinent to observe here that the adoption of infants by proper adults willing to confer a home, parental care, and the right of inheritance upon an orphan in need of these advantages is a beneficent provision of the law and one obviously in the interest of public good (Estate of McKeag, 141 Cal. 403, 74 Pac. 1039, 99 Am. St. Rep. 80), and further, that the law has fully secured the infant, whose parents are deceased, against such tragedies as those suggested by petitioner, for example, a nurse having possession of a child for a few days fraudulently conniving with some one who might adopt him without the knowledge of his parents. Section 226 of the Civil Code makes the approval of the judge of the superior court essential to an adoption. It is not strange that this important responsibility should have been committed to such an officer, nor can we consider this safeguard inadequate for the protection of infants against improper adoption, for the common law has always reposed confidence and trust in the hands of judicial officers as in those of no other class of citizens. It may be further suggested that, as against such a fraudulent adoption as that supposed, if a superior court judge should be so imposed upon as to permit it, our law affords ample remedy by appropriate proceedings.

[3] The intent of the legislative mind which enacted this law may be substantially aided by noting the mode of expression employed in other provisions contained in it. Indeed, we need not look beyond this particular section of the Code for a striking illustration of a similar provision, whose wording necessitates an interpretation through the same mode of reasoning which we are confident should be applied to the provision being construed in the instant case. We have here another example of enactment by inferential expression. In dealing with the subject of abandoned half orphan children, section 224 above quoted contains this language:

> "Provided, however, that any such child, being a half orphan, and kept and maintained in any orphan asylum in this state for more than two years, may be adopted, with the consent of the manager of such orphans' home, without the consent of the parent unless such parent has paid toward the expenses of maintenance of such half orphan at least a reasonable sum during the said time, if able to do so."

By the use of the closing qualification, "if able to do so," it is inferentially provided that, if the parent is unable to pay for any part of the support of "such half orphan," even if kept and maintained in an orphan asylum for more than two years, and although the parent has in fact paid nothing to the asylum, the infant cannot be adopted without the parent's consent, and the consent of the manager of the asylum is insufficient and ineffectual to confer jurisdiction upon the court to permit an adoption.

It seems clear that the provision requiring the parent's consent as an essential condition to adoption contains an exception, excluding the necessity for such consent unless the parents are living. Ex parte Chambers, cited by petitioner, involved the construction of another part of the law concerning adoption. The court in that case held that the act of 1878, enacted to authorize managers of orphan asylums to give their consent to the adoption of certain children under their care, provides for the adoption of a distinct class of minors, to wit, abandoned and orphan children in orphan asylums. The infant in whose behalf a writ of habeas corpus was granted had been in the custody of the Protestant Orphan Asylum for more than one year and it was held that the child was therefore within the class established by the act of 1878.

Nothing more is involved in the instant proceeding than a construction of the language of sections 221 and 224 of the Civil Code, and we are convinced that, through their provisions, jurisdiction existed in the court which entered the decree of adoption of Lewis Pinkerton Crutcher, Jr., on June 26, 1914; hence, the juvenile court properly denied the petition for an order declaring him its ward.

The order is affirmed.

CREDIT CLEARANCE BUREAU v. GUARANTY LOAN CO. (Civ. 4413.)

Appeal and error ⚷882(11) — Absence of proof of freedom from fraud in contract between attorney and client does not preclude recovery where such evidence stricken on defendant's motion.

In an action by an assignee to recover for attorney's services rendered defendant by plaintiff's assignor, where plaintiff has sought to introduce evidence showing that the alleged contract was free from fraud or undue influence, which evidence has been stricken on motion of defendant, who admitted the contract, but denied only the amount agreed upon, held that such defendant after an adverse judgment could not invoke the rule requiring proof that the attorney's contract with his client was free from fraud and undue influence.

Action by the Credit Clearance Bureau against Guaranty Loan Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin H. Williams, of San Leandro, for appellant.

Edward J. Lynch, of San Francisco, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff commenced an action against the defendant to recover as assignee, on a claim for legal services rendered by the plaintiff's assignor. The plaintiff pleaded its cause of action in two counts, in the first count an agreed value of $1,000, and in the second count a reasonable value of $1,000. On the trial of the case Fabius T. Finch, plaintiff's assignor, was called to the stand as the plaintiff's first witness. He stated in detail the circumstances of his employment and the services which he rendered to the defendant. From his testimony it appeared that he was employed by J. W. Treadwell orally at a time when Mr. Treadwell was the president, a director, and general manager of the defendant corporation. The services rendered consisted of the advice given and also services performed in maintaining an action to establish the title of the defendant to the Hotel Wilson, which is located at Mason and Eddy streets in San Francisco. After the case had been finally terminated Mr. Finch and Mr. Treadwell agreed upon the amount of the fee, and set the figure at $1,000. The witness further gave testimony of and concerning the reasonable value of the services which he had rendered. While the witness was testifying the attorney for the defendant moved to strike out the evidence as to reasonable value, but the motion was denied. When the direct examination of the witness had been finished, and just before the cross-examination commenced, the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. Williams: I want to make a motion to strike out all of the testimony of the witness in relation to the reasonable value of the alleged services, and I base my motion on the ground of the witness' own testimony given here at this time shows that he made an express contract with the Guaranty Loan Company through its duly authorized officer, for the payment to him of $1,000, and further I want to make this statement in open court, as attorney for the Guaranty Loan Company, that at the time that alleged contract was entered into Mr. Finch had already arranged with the corporation, but it was for the payment of $250, not for $1,000.

"The Court: That is the only issue in the case?

"Mr. Williams: That is the only issue in the case.

"The Court: You concede that an agreement was entered into between the company and Mr. Finch, and the only issue in the case is as to the amount?

"Mr. Williams: The amount of the agreement that was entered into.

"The Court: Under that statement of fact I will grant the motion to strike out."

The appellant now contends that, in an action by an attorney against his client on a contract made during the existence of the employment, the burden of proof is upon the attorney to show that the contract so made is free from fraud or undue influence, and that this case falls within that rule. The respondent replies that he did assume the burden of proof and did introduce evidence showing that the alleged contract was based on a sufficient consideration, and that the defendant corporation and its officers were free from undue influence, but that the appellant caused the trial court to strike out the testimony, and that the appellant may not now complain of the ruling made by the trial court. That reply is quite sufficient.

After the proceedings had in the trial court, which we have set forth in hæc verba, the appellant argued in the trial court, and now argues, that it made no stipulation or admission in the trial court which limited its right to attack the making of the contract between the appellant and Mr. Finch. The argument is wholly unsupported by the record. The language shows that Mr. Williams' statement in the trial court was to the effect that an express contract had been made, and that the express contract was for $250, and not for $1,000. The trial court did not misunderstand nor misinterpret the language used by the attorney appearing for the defendant during the trial.

The appellant complains of certain rulings made by the trial court regarding the admission of certain testimony. No one of the rulings was erroneous. As the trial proceeded both parties delineated to the trial court their respective theories. The trial court accepted the statements so made to it in open court and acted thereon.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

DE BAKCSY v. STRAIN. (Civ. 3792.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 26, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 24, 1923.)

1. Sales 🔑181(11)—Finding that seller had failed to deliver grapes as per contract held not sustained by evidence.

In an action to recover the initial payment on a contract to purchase grapes after alleged default of the vendor in making delivery, findings that plaintiff had never received the grapes nor bill of lading for them, and that defendant refused and was unable to deliver, held not supported by the evidence where according to the contract delivery could have been made to plaintiff's agent at another place, and there was no showing that such a delivery had not in fact been made.

2. Sales 🔑82(3)—Contracts for sale of grapes held to intend concurrent delivery by seller and payment by purchaser.

Two contracts, each for the sale of a carload of grapes, and reciting receipt of an initial payment of $200, and providing that bill of lading shall be surrendered "on payment for car," and that the balance of the purchase price "shall be payable on surrender of B/L by" vendor, held to intend that the seller should offer the bill of lading to the buyer, and thereupon be entitled to receive the balance of the purchase price; that is, the parties were to perform their respective parts concurrently.

3. Sales 🔑392—Tender by purchaser after lapse of time within which seller could perform unnecessary.

In an action to recover money paid under a contract for the purchase of grapes after failure of the vendor to deliver, where it is established that the time within which the vendor could comply with the contract is past, a tender by the vendee before bringing suit becomes unnecessary.

4. Sales 🔑391(1) — After abandonment by seller purchaser may also abandon and sue to recover money paid in action for money had and received.

Upon a breach of an executory contract of purchase by the vendor, the vendee may treat the vendor's breach as an abandonment and may abandon himself and sue to recover what he has paid in an action for money had and received.

5. Sales 🔑128—No formal rescission necessary by buyer after failure of consideration of executory contract or where seller becomes unable to perform.

Where there is a total failure of consideration for an executory contract of purchase, and the vendee has received nothing of value, and the vendor has become unable to perform, no formal rescission is necessary, and the vendee, by instituting an action to recover the consideration paid, in effect rescinds the contract, as he has a right to do under Civ. Code, § 1689, subd. 4.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Cornelius De Bakcsy, doing business under the name Hungarian Grape & Fruit Company, against Thomas Strain, Jr., doing business under the name National Fruit Exchange. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Prescott & Prescott and Frank G. Falloon, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Harold E. Thomas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered against the defendant. The parties entered into two written contracts for the sale to plaintiff by defendant of muscat grapes. At the time of the execution of each contract plaintiff paid defendant $200 as part of the purchase price. Upon the trial these facts were shown. No evidence was offered for the defense. The action is for money had and received, and the findings are of the facts customarily found in such actions where judgment is for the plaintiff.

Appellant contends, as he did upon the trial, that the evidence does not sustain the findings, and that the facts proved fail to make a prima facie case against him. The contracts are identical in form. Those portions of them which are relevant here are as follows:

"This agreement, made and entered into this 8th day of July, 1920, by and between National Fruit Exchange of Los Angeles, Cal., the party of the first part, and Hungarian Grape & Fruit Company, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the said party of the first part agrees to sell and deliver to the said party of the second part one carload of muscat grapes to be delivered by the party of the first part to the party of the second part on board cars at Hanford or San Bdo districts, and bill of lading to be surrendered by the said party of the first part to the second party's representative at Fresno or Los Angeles on payment for car. * * *

"The purchase price agreed to be paid by said party of the second part to said party of the first part for the aforesaid grapes in the sum of eighty-six ($86.00) dollars per ton, f. o. b. shipping point, payment to be as follows: Two hundred dollars ($200.00) per car or a total of two hundred dollars on the execution and delivery of this agreement, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged.

"The balance of the purchase price for each car, after deducting said sum of two hundred dollars ($200.00) on each car aforesaid, shall be payable on surrender of B/L by party of the first part to party of the second part.

"Shipments to commence as soon as grapes are properly matured for Eastern shipment, and to continue daily."

[1] Among the findings claimed by appellant to be unsupported by the evidence are the following:

"III. The court finds * * * that defendant agreed to deliver said car on demand and as soon as grapes were properly matured for shipping; that plaintiff has never received said car of grapes, and no bill of lading for said car has ever been offered to plaintiff covering said car of grapes; * * * that defendant refused to and is unable to deliver to plaintiff any muscat grapes.

"IV. That defendant has at all times since the execution of said contract failed and refused to deliver said car of grapes or said or any bill of lading for said car of grapes to plaintiff or the or any agent of plaintiff; that plaintiff after muscat grapes were matured demanded the delivery of said car of grapes; and that said car was not delivered to plaintiff, and no bill of lading was ever tendered to plaintiff therefor."

We think the contention of the appellant in this behalf must be upheld. The evidence introduced in the instant case was extremely meager. There was no testimony concerning the matter of delivery. The nearest and only approach to information supplied the court on this point was the statement of the witness De Bakcsy that he did not receive any grapes or bills of lading from the defendant during the year 1920, and, further, that Thomas Strain did not talk to the witness or write to him during the year 1920. But the contract provides that the grapes shall be delivered on board cars at Hanford or San Bernardino districts, and to say that the witness did not receive the fruit is entirely insufficient to prove default in complying with the condition for delivery on board cars.

The agreement concerning the bills of lading is that they might be surrendered to the vendee's representative at Fresno or Los Angeles. The contract contemplates that the vendee had such a representative, and this fact appears affirmatively from a mere reading of the instrument. No attempt was made to show that the surrender of the bills of lading was not made under this provision. So that for all that is disclosed by the record the grapes may have been delivered f. o. b. cars and the bills of lading surrendered to the vendee's representative as expressly stipulated.

Objection was made to the testimony of the witness De Bakcsy above quoted, but for the purpose of this decision we have assumed that such evidence was properly admitted.

[2] In view of the expectancy of a retrial, it is necessary to discuss other points argued. The contracts are executory and contemplate two things to be done by the seller, to wit, the delivery of two carloads of grapes, and the surrender of the bills of lading. They require the buyer to pay a stipulated price. There is no room to doubt that the balance not paid upon the execution of the contracts was to be paid concurrently with the surrender of the bills of lading. In one part of the contract it is provided that the bills of lading shall be surrendered "on payment for car." Later we find the provision that the balance of the purchase price "shall be payable on surrender of B/L by party of the first part to the party of the second part." Reading these provisions together, and considering the circumstances involved in such a sale, the intent seems to have been that the seller should offer the bills of lading to the buyer, whereupon he should be entitled to receive the balance of the purchase price; that is, the parties were to perform their respective parts concurrently.

[3] Appellant's answer admits that the muscat grape crop for 1920 had matured, as alleged in the complaint, before the bringing of suit. This fact is important, for it results from it that, if upon another trial the vendor's default should be shown, a tender by the vendee, before bringing suit, became unnecessary because it would have been futile. The time had passed in which the vendor could comply with the contract. This element places this case in the same class as Carter v. Fox, 11 Cal. App. 67, 103 Pac. 910.

Nothing is shown to have been done by either party except the payment by the vendee of $400. The vendee received nothing, and hence had nothing to return. Under such circumstances he is entitled to bring an action for the recovery of the sum paid as money had and received by the vendor, providing the vendor's default be establishd.

[4] The rule is well settled in this state as announced in Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 10, 55 Pac. 716, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, that upon breach of an executory contract by the vendor the vendee may treat the vendor's breach as an abandonment, and then "he (the vendee) may * * * abandon it," and, "sue * * * to recover what he has paid in an action for money had and received."

[5] By instituting this action to recover the consideration paid to the appellant the respondent has rescinded the contract, as he had a right to do, if the allegations of his complaint be true. Subdivision 4, § 1689, of our Civil Code provides:

> "A party to a contract may rescind the same in the following cases only: * * * If such consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in a material respect, from any cause." Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39.

Where there is a total failure of consideration for an executory contract, and the vendee has received nothing of value, and the vendor has become unable to perform, no formal rescission is required. Grotheer v. Panama Pacific Land Co., 41 Cal. App. 19, 181 Pac. 667; Carter v. Fox, supra. Another case which holds that under such circumstances an action for money had and received is an appropriate remedy is Fontaine v. Lacassie, 36 Cal. App. 175, 171 Pac. 812.

This is not such a case as Hanson v. Slaven, 98 Cal. 377, 33 Pac. 266, where the mutual covenants of the parties were concurrent, and there was no evidence of lack of continued ability on the part of the vendor to comply with his part of the contract by delivering stock, and therefore it was held that either must offer to perform in order to place the other in default.

Because the evidence is insufficient to support the findings in the particulars pointed out, the judgment is reversed.

POSZ v. TAYLOR, County Treasurer.
(Civ. 4435.)

1. Schools and school districts 🔑67—Statute as to construction of building by high school district inapplicable to district established some time and having constructed building.

Pol. Code, § 1755, relating to proceedings for the construction of a building by a high school district in the September next succeeding its formation or next succeeding a termination of a lease of temporary quarters, is applicable only to the time of organization of the district; and, where a high school district has been organized for a considerable time and has already constructed and maintained a building, the provisions thereof are not available for raising moneys to construct a new one.

2. Schools and school districts 🔑110—Expense of electrical fixtures for high school building may be paid from maintenance fund raised by special tax levy pursuant to statute.

The board of directors of a high school district have the power, if they deem it necessary, to install electrical fixtures in a high school building, and the expenses therefor may be paid from moneys raised by the special tax levy under Pol. Code, § 1756, which provides for filing of an estimate of the amount required for maintaining school for the current year, including "additions to the plant already constructed," and for itemizing, among other things, "sites, buildings and furniture" and other "miscellaneous expenses."

3. Schools and school districts 🔑90—Claim for balance of work, under contract payable in installments, completed and accepted during fiscal year, held not invalid under limitation of indebtedness which district might incur.

Where a contract contemplated progressive work to be paid for by a district in installments as performed, and part was done during the fiscal year in which the contract was made and paid for out of the funds of that year, a claim for payment for the balance of the work performed and accepted during the following fiscal year is not invalid under Const. art. 11, § 18, limiting the amount of indebtedness which the district might incur in a single year to the income and revenue provided for such year, since the indebtedness contemplated thereby was not incurred, until the work was completed and accepted, and the claim, therefore, is based on a liability incurred during that fiscal year and is a proper charge on the funds of that year.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Mandamus by Louis Posz against James Taylor, as Treasurer of the County of Monterey. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Rosendale, of Salinas, for appellant.

J. H. Andresen, of Salinas, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus commenced in the superior court to require the defendant, as treasurer of the county of Monterey, to pay the claim of plaintiff, amounting to $498.75, based on a contract with the trustees of Salinas union high school district for the furnishing and installation of certain electrical fixtures in the high school building of said district. The facts are that on the 7th day of January, 1921, the plaintiff contracted with the trustees of the school district to furnish and install certain electrical fixtures in the high school building at the total contract price of $1,876.25. Some time during the month of March, 1921, this contract, with the consent of all parties, was modified. The full contract price was made to be $1,498.75, of which sum $1,000 was to be paid at the time of the modification of the contract and the balance thereof was to be paid upon the completion and acceptance of the work. In accordance with the modified contract, the sum of $1,000 was then paid and the major portion of the work was performed during that fiscal year—1920–21. Subsequent to July 1, 1921, the remainder of the work required to be done under the contract was performed and the work was fully completed and accepted by the trustees on the 7th day of December, 1921. The trial was held on May 12, 1922, and the judgment was rendered on the 23d of the same month. It appeared that at the time of the trial there were sufficient moneys in the school district over and above the other necessary expenditures for other school purposes to meet the plaintiff's demand. The presentation and approval of the demand in due form by the proper officials was admitted, and the only question involved is whether it is legally payable out of the general fund of the school district. The trial court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount of his demand, and from this judgment defendant has appealed upon the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

Appellant urges as grounds for the reversal of the judgment that payment of the warrant is restricted to the proceeds of the sale of bonds for the erection of the school building, and that the maintenance fund of the school district is not available for the payment of the claim. Also, that payment of the claim out of the funds of the 1921–22 levy is a violation of article 11, § 18, of the Constitution.

[1] In support of the first ground appellant argues that the Political Code provides two distinct methods for raising money to construct school buildings and that these methods are exclusive. It is argued that the provisions of section 1745 et seq. provide for the issuance of bonds for that purpose, and that section 1755 provides for the levy of a special tax when bonds have not been issued. It is true that these two methods have been provided by the Code, but there is nothing in the Code provisions covering either plan which makes either an exclusive method. Section 1755 plainly relates only to the time of organization of the school district. It requires the school board to file an estimate of the cost of construction of a school building when bonds have not been issued for that purpose, but such estimate must be made "on or before the first Monday of September next succeeding the formation of said district." Another provision of the section is that—

> "If such high school board shall have secured or leased such temporary quarters, they shall, on or before the first Monday of September next before the termination of such lease or arrangement, * * * make and file with the board * * * an estimate of the cost * * * of erecting a suitable building."

It will be noted that the provisions of this section are mandatory. That is to say, it is made the duty of the high school board to make and file such an estimate in the September next succeeding the formation of the district or next before the termination of a lease of temporary quarters. No provision is made in the section for the filing of such an estimate at any other period of the life of the district. From this it follows that if a school district has been organized for a considerable period and has constructed and maintained a high school building, the provisions of the section are not available for the purpose of raising moneys to construct a new building.

When this situation arises, the school trustees have two courses which they may pursue—to call for the issuance of bonds to raise sufficient funds for the construction of a new building, or to proceed under section 1756 to raise money by a special tax levy sufficient for that purpose. This section, it will be noted, provides for the filing of an estimate of the amount of money required for maintaining the high school district for the current school year, including "additions to the plant already constructed." Such estimate is required to be itemized so as to show the amount necessary, among other things, for "sites, buildings and furniture" and "other miscellaneous expenses."

[2] In the case before us the contract called for the furnishing and installation of certain electrical fixtures in the high school building which had been constructed by the school district from moneys raised by two separate bond issues authorized under the provisions of section 1745 et seq. of the Political Code. It is apparent that a high school building could be used for school purposes without electrical fixtures. In fact, at the time when the original section was adopted their use was scarcely known. If, however, the board of trustees of the high school district deem it necessary to install electrical fixtures in a high school building, they have the power to do so, and the expenses thereof may be paid from moneys raised under section 1756 of the Code.

It is very plain that when the Legislature in 1915 amended section 1756 of the Political Code by adding the words quoted above, it did so for the purpose of meeting a situation such as has arisen in this case. Where the moneys raised under the bond issue or under a special tax levy in accordance with the provisions of section 1755 are insufficient to meet the small items which the trustees deem to be necessary, the amendment to section 1756 authorizes the trustees to include such items in the general estimate made under section 1756. If appellant's contention were correct, a special tax would have to be levied upon all the taxable property in the school district under section 1755 to raise money sufficient to meet respondent's claim, which is less than $500. If such were done, the cost of levying and collecting the tax would be greater than the amount collected.

[3] The only other point requiring consideration is that the claim is invalid under article 11, § 18, of the Constitution. As appears from the statement of the facts, the contract contemplated progressive work, to be paid for in installments as the work was performed. A part of the work was done during the fiscal year in which the contract was made and was paid for out of the funds of that fiscal year. The balance of the work was performed and accepted during the fiscal year of 1921–22. Respondent's demand covers an amount due for the work that was completed and accepted on December 7, 1921. The indebtedness contemplated by the constitutional section was not incurred until the work was completed and accepted. Respondent's claim, therefore, is based upon a liability incurred during the fiscal year 1921–22 and is a proper charge upon the funds of that fiscal year. Wyckoff v. Force (Cal. App.) 214 Pac. 489, and cases cited.

Ex parte LAMB. (Cr. 929.)

1. Licenses 🔑18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Seller of equitable title to oil lands held by title company held not issuing securities of trust in violation of Securities Act; "trustee."

A title company holding the legal title to an interest in oil lands held not a "trustee" within Corporate Securities Act, § 2, subd. 5, whose securities the owner of the equitable interest would be guilty of issuing in violation of that act by a sale of a portion of his equitable interest without a permit from the corporation commissioner; not every confidence reposed in and accepted by one for benefit of another constituting a voluntary trust within Civ. Code, § 2216.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trustee.]

2. Trusts 🔑1—Mere personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for benefit of another does not constitute a trust.

Though every voluntary trust arises out of a personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for the benefit of another, not every obligation arising out of a personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for the benefit of another is a trust; it being necessary in order for a trust to result there must be a trust res or subject-matter under Civ. Code, § 2221.

3. Licenses 🔑18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Agreement by owner of equitable interest in oil land to secure transfer of legal title held not to constitute him trustee selling securities in violation of Securities Act.

An agreement by the owner of an equitable interest in oil lands and others desiring to become associated with him so as to participate in future profits held to impose a purely personal obligation on him to cause the holder of the legal title to convey certain interest to such other persons and not to constitute him a trustee and as such a company within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act, whose sale of such interests without a permit from the corporation commissioner was a sale of securities in violation of that act.

4. Trusts 🔑159—Creator of trust may name himself trustee.

It is not essential that the creator of a trust should constitute a third person trustee and transfer the legal title to him, but he may create a trust in his own property by constituting himself a trustee if his words and acts clearly and unequivocally denote an intention to hold henceforth as trustee for another.

5. Licenses 🔑18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Deed by equitable owner of interest in oil land held not to constitute him trustee within Securities Act.

A deed by the owner of the equitable title to an undivided interest in oil lands to others desiring to join in the enterprise, wherein he conveyed such interest absolutely and personally covenanted to pay to each grantee a certain part of the proceeds of possible future profits subject to certain reservations in favor of others, held not to constitute him a trustee and as such a company within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act, and such sale without a permit from the corporation commissioner a violation of that act.

6. Licenses 🔑18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Sale of equitable interests in oil land held not sale of securities of company within Securities Act.

An agreement between the equitable owner of an interest in oil lands to secure a conveyance by the holder of the legal title of a part of such equitable interest to eight others desiring to join in the enterprise, and deeds to two of such persons of equitable interests, held not to constitute such particular persons an association within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act, and therefore a company, and make the vendor of such equitable interests a seller of securities of such company without a permit from the corporation commissioner in violation of that act.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by E. A. Lamb to be directed to the Sheriff of Los Angeles County. Writ granted.

Ben S. Hunter and Earl D. Killion, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., Tracy C. Becker, Deputy Dist. Atty., and Farrand & Slosson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a habeas corpus proceeding wherein the petitioner seeks his discharge from imprisonment under a warrant of arrest issued on a complaint against him in the justice's court. The complaint attempts to charge him with a violation of the Corporate Securities Act. The ground of his application is that the pleading does not charge him with a public offense.

The pertinent provisions of the Corporate Securities Act (Stats. 1917, p. 673, amended 1919, p. 231, 1921, pp. 1008, 1114) are the following: Section 2 defines certain of the words and phrases used throughout the act. Subdivision 3 of section 2 declares that—

> "The word 'company' includes all domestic and foreign, private corporations, associations, joint-stock companies, and partnerships, of every kind, and also trustees, as hereinafter defined."

By subdivision 4 it is provided that—

> "The word 'trust' as used in this act includes all voluntary trusts, as the same are defined in the Civil Code, expressly created by or declared in an instrument in writing, * * * to carry on any business or to secure the payment or repayment of money."

Subdivision 5 declares that—

> "The word 'trustee' * * * includes only persons or companies executing trusts as hereinbefore defined."

Section 3 provides that—

> "No company shall sell * * * any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do."

The complaint was drawn upon the theory that petitioner is a "trustee" within the meaning of the act, or that the eight persons with whom he entered into the agreement hereafter described constituted an "association," that in either event there was a "company," within the definition of the act, and that petitioner sold the "securities" of such "company" without having secured from the corporation commissioner the necessary permit.

The case disclosed by the complaint filed in the justice's court is substantially as follows: Attached to the pleading and made a part thereof are two exhibits, marked respectively "A" and "B." The latter bears date September 11, 1922. Exhibit A is a blank form of deed. It gives the form of the "securities" which it is claimed petitioner illegally issued. Exhibit B is the copy of an agreement executed by petitioner, as the party of the second part, and by eight other persons as the parties of the first part. It seems to be conceded that the gist of the "offense" attempted to be charged in the criminal complaint lies in the fact that petitioner executed to two of the eight persons with whom he executed Exhibit B, namely, D. R. Beatty and A. Frank, deeds which, as to form, were substantially replicas of Exhibit A. Whether the complaint states a public offense or not is largely, if not entirely, dependent upon the character of these two exhibits.

Exhibit B, whose execution evidently preceded the deeds to Beatty and Frank, recites the following: (1) Petitioner is drilling an oil well on a certain piece of real property in the county of Los Angeles; (2) the eight parties of the first part desire to become associated with petitioner in the enterprise and to participate in the future possible profits; (3) the legal title to 1890/4000 of the land is vested in the State Torrens Title Company (hereafter for brevity referred to as the Title Company); (4) the Title Company holds such legal title in accordance with an agreement between it and petitioner, by the terms of which the Title Company agrees to grant to petitioner, or to his nominee or nominees, on petitioner's request and after the completion of the well-drilling then in progress, various undivided interests; and (5) the times when the Title Company shall grant such undivided interests to petitioner, or to his nominee or nominees, are specifically set forth in a written agreement between petitioner and Philip A. Grohs and Edward L. Journigan.

Following these recitals Exhibit B provides: The Title Company, when requested by petitioner, is to convey to the eight parties of the first part at least an undivided 390/4000 of the property "as per form of deed attached." The form of deed referred to is, we assume, that which is afforded by Exhibit A. Then follows a paragraph setting forth the proportionate amount of the 390/4000 which is to be granted to each of these eight persons. For example, of the 390/4000 there is to be granted to D. R. Beatty and A. Frank 150/4000 and 75/4000, respectively. It then is declared that the 390/4000 so to be granted to the parties of the first part by the Title Company is given by petitioner as a bonus for $26,000 which the parties of the first part agree to "advance" to petitioner for the purpose of completing the well then being drilled upon the property. Then follows a covenant on the part of petitioner, as the party of the second part, whereby he agrees that out of the net proceeds of all oil and gas produced on the property and accruing to him by virtue of his ownership of the equitable title to the 1500/4000 which will remain in him he will pay to the parties of the first part the sum of $39,000. From the recitals and covenants in Exhibit B it appears, inferentially, that at the date of its execution petitioner was the equitable owner of the 1890/4000 the legal title whereto was in the Title Company, and that if there should be granted to the eight parties of the first part an undivided 390/4000, petitioner would remain the equitable owner of an undivided 1500/4000 of the land.

Exhibit A is, in part, as follows:

> "Grant Deed. E. A. Lamb [petitioner] * * * does hereby grant to ——— all that real property situate in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: ———/4000ths undivided interest in [here follows the description of 8 lots], subject to: (1) A reservation of one-eighth of all oil and gas produced on the above-described property, in favor of George Bowman. * * * (2) A reservation of one-eighth of all oil and gas produced on the above-described property, in favor of Philip A. Grohs and Edward L. Journigan. * * * (3) A reservation by E. A. Lamb * * * of the right to prospect and drill for oil and gas on the aforesaid land, to mine and extract the same, and to sell and dispose of the oil and gas produced from such operations; yielding and paying to the grantee his proportion of seventy-five (75) per cent. of the net proceeds of all oil and gas produced, accounting therefor to the grantee every sixty days for the net proceeds from the operations during the preceding sixty days; and the right hereunder reserved to continue in force so long as oil and gas be produced in paying quantities, the net proceeds to be computed from, and begin at, the time the first well is completed and put on production by E. A. Lamb, the intent being that E. A. Lamb shall not charge to production the cost of drilling one well to a depth of 4,500 feet, unless oil be obtained in paying quantities at less depth. No part of the cost of the first well shall, in any case, be charged to the grantee herein. Witness my hand this ——— day of ———, 192—."

In the body of the criminal complaint substantially the following is alleged: On September 11, 1922, petitioner "was conducting a business of an association" composed of a number of persons whose names are unknown. As a part of the agreement under which the "association" was operating (exhibit B), petitioner "was then and there trustee for each and all of said persons." The "rights and interests of said persons so being members of said association and the capital stock and property of said association and of each of said members were represented by certain certificates of interest into which the whole of said property * * * was divided." Said certificates of interest are fully evidenced and set forth in a grant deed which was to be executed by petitioner to all the persons who purchased an interest in the association and became members thereof. Exhibit A is a copy of the form of such deed. "The estate and interest of the said E. A. Lamb in and to the real estate and property, and in and to the oil and gas produced on said property * * * and covered by said certificate and grant deed, then and there were and are determined, prescribed and fully expressed in a certain agreement in writing [Exhibit B] made and entered into the 11th day of September, 1922." "Said association was a company and a corporation carried on for profit." For the company and the association and the members thereof "said E. A. Lamb was a trustee as hereinbefore set forth, and as fully evidenced * * * by said Exhibits A and B." (Italics ours.) Petitioner, on September 11, 1922, for a valuable consideration, executed and sold "certain securities of said association and of said E. A. Lamb" by executing to D. R. Beatty a deed to an undivided 150/4000 of the land and to A. Frank a deed to an undivided 75/4000 thereof.

These allegations in the body of the complaint must be read in the light of the two exhibits attached thereto and made a part thereof. So read, it is manifest that it is from those exhibits that we must determine the precise nature of the rights and interests alleged to have been sold by petitioner to Beatty and Frank; also, the status of petitioner, i. e., whether he was a "trustee" within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act, and whether the eight persons named in Exhibit B as the parties of the first part constituted an "association" within the meaning of the act.

The theories advanced in the brief filed on behalf of the officer to whom the writ of habeas corpus was directed are: (1) The Title Company was a "trustee" within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act, and in executing the deeds to Frank and Beatty petitioner aided that "trustee" in issuing and selling its "securities"; (2) petitioner himself was a "trustee" within the meaning of the act, and as such "trustee" he issued and sold "securities" when he executed the deeds to Beatty and Frank; and (3) the eight persons with whom petitioner entered into the agreement (Exhibit B) constituted an "association," within the meaning of the act, and in executing the deeds to Beatty and Frank petitioner issued and sold the "securities" of that "association." Petitioner disputes, and, as we think, correctly disputes, the validity of each of these theories.

[1] But little space need be given to the claim that the Title Company was a "trustee" whose securities petitioner issued. The criminal complaint was not drawn upon that theory. Its charge is that, as a part of the agreement under which the "association" was operating (Exhibit B), petitioner, not the Title

Company, "was then and there the trustee for each and all of said persons so being members of said association." Moreover, it is clear that whether the Title Company was or was not a "trustee," the complaint is barren of any showing that petitioner did anything to aid in the execution of any trust which the Title Company may have assumed. A "trustee," as that word is used in the Corporate Securities Act, includes only persons or companies "executing trusts as hereinbefore defined." Section 2, subd. 5. When petitioner deeded to Beatty an undivided 150/4000 and to Frank an undivided 75/4000 of the land, subject to the reservations contained in each deed, he but conveyed his own equitable title to certain undivided interests in the land, and nothing was done in the execution of any trust which the Title Company may have accepted. So far as that company's title is concerned no change was effected by the deeds which petitioner executed. Indeed, it is expressly alleged in the criminal complaint that petitioner's estate and interest "were and are determined, prescribed and fully expressed" in Exhibit B —showing that the Title Company was still the holder of the legal title at the date of petitioner's deeds to Beatty and Frank.

[2, 3] Petitioner was not a "company" in the sense that he was a voluntary "trustee" within the meaning of the act. He was not a voluntary trustee unless he became such by his execution of one of the exhibits. Exhibit B did not create a "trust" in any sense of the word. Section 2216 of the Civil Code declares that—

> "A voluntary trust is an obligation arising out of a personal confidence reposed in, and voluntarily accepted by, one for the benefit of another."

It is argued by counsel opposing petitioner here that Exhibit B imposed upon petitioner an obligation in favor of the eight persons with whom he contracted; that such obligation arose out of a "personal confidence" reposed in and voluntarily accepted by petitioner; and that therefore Exhibit B did create a voluntary trust, as that word is defined by the Civil Code.

It is true that every voluntary trust is an obligation arising out of a personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for the benefit of another. But the converse is not necessarily true. That is, not every obligation arising out of a personal confidence reposed in and voluntarily accepted by one for the benefit of another is a trust, within the legal meaning of the term. It often happens that a purely personal obligation, unconnected with any property or with any trust res, arises out of a "personal confidence" —an obligation in no wise connected with any estate or title held by the obligor for the benefit of the obligee. Such personal obligations do not constitute "trusts" in any true sense of the word. To the creation of a trust, a trust res or subject-matter is a sine qua non. Martin v. Powell, 200 Ala. 46, 75 South. 358; Bay Biscayne Co. v. Baile, 73 Fla. 1120, 75 South. 860: 39 Cyc., p. 34. "In order for trusts to exist there must be an estate to vest in the trustee, and the property must be clearly and definitely pointed out." In re Johnson's Estate, 100 Or. 142, 196 Pac. 385, 1115. Section 2221 of the Civil Code declares that—

> "A voluntary trust is created * * * by any words or acts * * * indicating with reasonably certainty * * * the subject, purpose, and beneficiary of the trust."

> "Trusts arise when property has been conferred upon one person and accepted by him for the benefit of the other. In order to originate a trust, two things are essential: First, that the ownership conferred be connected with a right or interest or duty for the benefit of another; and, second, that the property be accepted on these conditions." Carr v. Harrington, 107 Ark. 535, 155 S. W. 1166.

> "A trust implies two estates or interests—one equitable and one legal; one person, as trustee, holding the legal title, while another, as the cestui que trust, has the beneficial interest." Hospes v. Car Co., 48 Minn. 174, 50 N. W. 1117, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637.

> "To the constitution of every valid express trust it is essential that there should be a trustee, an estate conveyed to him, a beneficiary, a legal purpose, and a legal term." In re Walkerly, 108 Cal. 650, 41 Pac. 776, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97.

[4] True, it is not essential that the creator of a trust should constitute a third person trustee and transfer the legal title to him. It is well settled that one may create a trust in his own property by constituting himself a trustee, provided his words or acts clearly and unequivocally denote an intention to hold the property henceforth as trustee for the benefit of another; and as the nature and effect of such a transaction is that the title remains in the settlor who constitutes himself a trustee for the benefit of the other, no transfer or assignment of the title is necessary. 39 Cyc. 66. But even so, it still is necessary that there be specific property to be held by the settlor as trustee, and an absolute parting by him with that beneficial interest which had been his up to the declaration of the trust. Taylor v. Coriell, 66 N. J. Eq. 262, 57 Atl. 810.

Nowhere in Exhibit B does petitioner undertake to hold any property in trust for or for the benefit of another. He simply entered into the purely personal obligation to cause the holder of the legal title, the Title Company, to convey certain interests to the eight persons with whom he was dealing. It follows, therefore, that Exhibit B did not constitute petitioner a "trustee," in any true sense of the term.

[5] Nor was petitioner made a trustee by

Exhibit A or by either of the deeds which he executed to Beatty and Frank, each of which followed the form set forth in Exhibit A. By these deeds petitioner, as grantor, deeded to each grantee a certain undivided interest in the land, with reservations, namely, a reservation in favor of one Bowman of one-eighth of all the oil and gas produced on the land, a reservation of another one-eighth of all oil and gas in favor of Grohs and Journigan, and a reservation to himself of the right to prospect and drill for oil and gas on the land and to sell the same. In connection with the reservation to himself, each deed contains a clause whereby petitioner personally covenants to pay to his grantee the latter's proportion of the net proceeds of the oil and gas.

By each of these deeds petitioner did the following: (1) Subject to the reservations, he conveyed absolutely to each grantee his own equitable title to a certain undivided part of the land; and (2) he personally covenanted to pay to each grantee a certain fractional part of the proceeds of possible future sales of oil and gas. Such a deed left nothing in the grantor which could be the subject of a trust. With respect to the interest actually conveyed to each grantee, petitioner parted with all of the title which he possessed. No title remained in him which could be held in trust for the grantee. The clause whereby he personally covenanted to account for and pay to his grantee a certain proportion of the proceeds of future sales of oil and gas was but a promise to pay over moneys which, possibly, he might thereafter receive. "A mere promise to obtain money and thereupon hold it in trust does not create a trust until it is at least so far executed that the money has been obtained in accordance with the promise." Molera v. Cooper, 173 Cal. 262, 160 Pac. 232.

For these reasons we conclude that the criminal complaint fails to show that petitioner was a "company" in the sense that he was a "trustee" within the meaning of the Corporate Securities Act.

[6] It next is claimed by counsel opposing the writ that if petitioner was not a "trustee" the eight persons who executed Exhibit B as parties of the first part constituted an "association," within the meaning of the act, and that therefore they were a "company," as defined by the act, and that petitioner sold the "securities" of each company.

The word "association," a word of vague meaning, is not specifically defined in the Corporate Securities Act. It has been defined as "a body of persons acting together without a charter but upon methods and forms used by incorporated bodies for the prosecution of some common enterprise." People v. Brander, 244 Ill. 26, 91 N. E. 59, 135 Am.St. Rep. 301, 18 Ann. Cas. 341. See, also, 5 C. J. 1333. For the purposes of this decision we shall assume that the eight persons with whom petitioner executed Exhibit B did constitute themselves an "association" within the meaning of the act, when they entered into the agreement evidenced by that instrument. But even so, there is nothing in the criminal complaint tending to show that petitioner ever issued or sold or aided in the issuance or sale of any of the "securities" of that association.

The "securities" which may not be issued or sold without the permission of the corporation commissioner are the "shares, or other interests or rights, into which the * * * property of companies * * * or rights of * * * members thereof are divided, * * * and all certificates and other instruments issued by them or their authority, evidencing or representing such shares, interests or rights"; also, "any instrument issued or offered to the public by any company" evidencing any right to participate in the profits or earnings or the distributions of assets of any business carried on for profit by the company. According to these definitions it is unlawful (1) to sell, without the requisite permission, any interest in property which is owned by an association or by its members; (2) to issue, without such permission, any instrument evidencing an interest in property owned by the association or by its members; or (3) to issue or offer to the public any instrument evidencing any right to participate in the profits or earnings or the distribution of the assets of any business carried on by the association for profit.

Petitioner did nothing that amounted to the issuance or sale of a "security," within the foregoing definitions. There is some question as to whether the deeds to Beatty and Frank may be regarded as having been made in furtherance of the agreement evidenced by Exhibit B. By that agreement petitioner did not agree that he would convey property to any one. What he did undertake to do was to cause the Title Company, the holder of the legal title to an undivided 1890/4000, to convey to the eight parties of the first part, just as soon as it should be free to do so, an undivided 390/4000 of the property, free and clear of all incumbrances, except taxes, and subject to certain reservations.

If petitioner's deeds to Beatty and Frank may not be deemed to have been executed pursuant to Exhibit B, then petitioner was but conveying his own equitable title to an undivided 150/4000 and an undivided 75/4000, respectively, to each of two grantees, as he had the right to do without securing the permission of any one. If, on the other hand, the deeds to Beatty and Frank may be deemed to have been executed pursuant to the terms of Exhibit B, and if the eight persons designated therein as the parties of the first part did constitute an "association," then by his deeds to Beatty and Frank petitioners simply conveyed certain interests to two members of that association, either for their own exclusive use and benefit or for the benefit of themselves and the six other members of the association. But in either case the deeds were conveyances, not by but to members of the association. There was therefore no conveyance of any interests owned by the association or by its members. The language of the act is:

> "No company shall sell * * * or offer for sale * * * any security of its own issue until it shall have first applied for and secured from the commissioner a permit authorizing it so to do." Section 3.

Nor did petitioner by either of his deeds to Beatty and Frank issue an instrument evidencing an interest in property owned by the association or by its members. On the contrary, each deed was, as we have shown, an instrument evidencing an interest thereby conveyed to, not by, members of the association. Nor was either deed an instrument "issued or offered to the public" by the association.

It may be that if hereafter any member of the association shall attempt to sell to third parties any part of the 390/4000 without the permission of the corporation commissioner he would thereby subject himself to the pains and penalties of the act. But that is not this case. It is not necessary to decide, and we do not decide, whether such permission would be necessary in that event.

There is no conflict between these views and those set forth in Matter of Girard, 186 Cal. 722, 200 Pac. 593, and Agnew v. Daugherty (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 34. In the Girard Case the petitioner and three other persons were trustees for a "company." As one of such trustees Girard issued and sold to third persons certain interests of the company. That case might be applicable if the petitioner here had executed to a person not a member of the association a deed or other instrument conveying any interest belonging to the association or to its members. In the Agnew Case the petitioner had conveyed mining property to certain persons as trustees under an instrument which provided for the negotiation and sale of trust certificates evidencing 3,000 "interests" in the property. Agnew proposed to begin the sale of the "interests" represented by such certificates. That is, he proposed to sell the property of the "company." In the instant case the utmost that can be claimed is that petitioner vested the association or members thereof with its or their rights and title to the property.

For the foregoing reasons we are constrained to hold that the facts set forth in the complaint against petitioner fail to show that he has violated any provision of the Corporate Securities Act.

Petitioner should be discharged from custody, and it is so ordered.

HENLEY v. BURSELL et al. (Civ. 2587.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷757(1)—Statute, requiring printing in brief of record and evidence, directory only.

Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, as amended by St. 1919, p. 261, requiring printing in the briefs of the record and evidence relied on on appeal must be regarded as for convenience of appellate tribunals and therefore directory only, and should be disregarded wherever substantial justice so requires it.

2. Trial ⚷165—Rule as to construing evidence in motion for nonsuit stated.

In passing on a motion for nonsuit, the trial court must accept, as true, evidence that is favorable to plaintiff, disregarding any conflicting or contradictory evidence, and indulge every inference and presumption therefrom favorable to plaintiff.

3. Insane persons ⚷66—Nonsuit erroneous in suit to quiet title based on deed of insane grantor.

It was error to grant a nonsuit in an action to quiet title, where plaintiff's evidence showed that defendant's title was based on a deed from plaintiff while insane, to one in a fiduciary relation, and without consideration; and in such case plaintiff was not required to return any consideration before bringing suit.

4. Deeds ⚷195—Burden on grantees claiming under deed of incompetent to prove consideration therefor.

In deed by one incompetent to transact business, the inference of no consideration therefor arises on proof of a fiduciary relation between grantor and grantee and casts on grantee and those claiming under her the burden of proving the contrary.

5. Trial ⚷163—Motion for nonsuit should specify grounds relied on.

A motion for nonsuit should specify grounds on which it is made, and ordinarily a ground not stated is not considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action to quiet title by S. E. Henley against H. H. Bursell and others. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

BURNETT, J. [1] Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment of nonsuit. No brief has been filed by respondents, and on the oral argument their learned counsel relied for affirmance of the judgment chiefly upon the point that appellant should not be heard because he had not printed fully in his brief the evidence as required by section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1919. In People v. Woods, 213 Pac. 951, however, it is said by the Supreme Court:

> "The statute requiring the printing in the briefs of the record and evidence relied upon on appeal (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.), particularly since the amendment of 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 261), must be regarded as one for the convenience of the appellate tribunals, and for that reason directory only, and should be disregarded by the court wherever substantial justice requires it to be done."

Moreover, when the cause was pending in the Supreme Court, respondents moved the court "to require appellant to print and serve upon respondents and file with said court, a supplement to his brief in which shall be set forth in full that portion of the record relied upon by such appellant, including a copy of all of the evidence taken in the court below." Thereafter a supplementary brief—so ordered by the Supreme Court, according to the admission of counsel at the oral argument herein—containing, as stated by appellant, "the parts of transcript relied upon by appellant," was filed, which he claims is sufficient to meet the requirement of the rule; but respondents seem to be of the opinion that it should contain all the evidence received at the trial. To understand the evidence therein set out we must bear in mind that the action was brought primarily to quiet title to certain real property and to have set aside and canceled certain deeds therefor, and it was alleged in the complaint that—

> "All the claim of said defendants, and each and every of them, is based upon a certain instrument purporting to be a deed dated the 17th day of February, 1911, and recorded March 10, 1911, * * * Tulare county records; that said instrument herein referred to if made and executed as herein indicated, was so made, executed and delivered while this plaintiff was ill and afflicted and incompetent to transact business, all of which was well known to each and every of said defendants; that shortly thereafter a guardian was duly appointed for this plaintiff, and plaintiff was committed to the state hospital for the insane at Stockton, Cal., and plaintiff was discharged from the state hospital at Stockton and his competency legally restored on the 21st day of September, 1916; that during plaintiff's incompetency, as aforesaid, defendant Laura M. Henley attempted to convey certain of said real property on the 30th day of November, 1912, to her sister, Anna M. Bursell, * * * and this plaintiff alleges on information and belief that said conveyance was without any consideration whatever and was done for the purpose of defrauding this plaintiff out of the lands therein described and sought to be conveyed.
> "That any and all persons claiming any interest whatever in or to said described premises owned by plaintiff as aforesaid, plaintiff alleges on belief, base their claim wholly either upon the alleged instrument so procured from plaintiff during his incompetency aforesaid, or from defendant Laura M. Henley, a party thereto, and during the incompetency of this plaintiff and without adequate valuable consideration and without any consideration whatever to plaintiff."

It thus appears that the attack upon the deeds was based upon the vital facts, that plaintiff was at all times incompetent to transact business, that his incompetency was known to all the parties, and that both deeds were entirely without consideration. The complaint is undoubtedly subject to some criticism, but in the determination of this appeal we are not concerned with that question.

In said supplementary brief appellant, to show that there was evidence of a lack of consideration for the deed, quotes from the testimony of plaintiff as follows:

> "Mr. Edwards: Q. Did you ever receive any money for any of this land or the water stock? A. No, sir. Q. Have you ever received any rent, issues, or profits of this real estate? A. No, sir. Q. Has any one, to your knowledge, received any rent, issues, or profits for you? A. Well, I don't know who received it. It was rented. Q. So far as you know, you never received any benefits directly or indirectly from the rent, issues, or profits since you returned from the asylum? A. No, sir."

Also this appears from the deposition of Laura M. Henley:

> "Q. On February 17, 1911, he deeded to you various real property in and near Porterville, Cal. What consideration was there for that deed, or for what purpose was it made? A. I don't know. Q. State whether or not you afterwards deeded this property away, and, if so, to whom? A. Yes, sir; I did deed it away to Annie Bursell and H. H. Bursell. Q. Mrs. Bursell never has paid you anything for that conveyance? A. No, sir. Q. No one ever paid you any money for any of the Henley lands you conveyed, nor for any stock in the Pleasant Valley Ditch Company? A. No, sir."

As indicative of the mental incapacity of plaintiff, he exhibits the order of Hon. J. A. Allen, judge of the superior court of said county, dated October 14, 1912, "that said Stephen Edward Henley, because of old age, physical debility and mental infirmities, is physically and mentally incompetent to manage his property and is incapable of taking care of himself and of managing his property," also an order of commitment to the state hospital for the insane, dated April 28, 1915, concluding as follows:

> "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said Stephen Edward Henley is insane and that he be committed to and confined in the state hospital at Stockton, Cal."

Quotation is also made from the testimony of plaintiff to the effect that he did not remember conveying the property in question, that he first ascertained that he had conveyed it when he came back from the asylum and examined the records; from the testimony of his daughter, Mrs. Maud Wyer, that plaintiff was not of sound mind on February 17, 1911, that he threatened to kill the family with a knife, he was growing worse mentally from 1907 to 1911; the testimony of M. B. Gibson, an intimate acquaintance, that plaintiff was entirely "without understanding, didn't know what he was doing" in 1911, that plaintiff was not competent to go about the streets alone, the witness assigning his reasons for the opinion. In addition is the testimony of two physicians, based upon hypothetical questions, that the plaintiff was of unsound mind, and of plaintiff himself that he suffered for years with an enlargement of the prostate gland, which condition one of the physicians testified would be likely to produce "mental abnormalities oftentimes bordering on actual insanity."

The particular portion of said section 953c applicable herein is as follows:

> "In filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court.
> "No appeal shall be dismissed nor shall any appeal be decided adversely to any party for failure to print in his brief the portion of the record or any part thereof in support of his points, but in such case the court hearing the appeal shall direct such party to print and serve on the adverse party and file with it a supplement to his brief in which shall be set forth in full that portion of the record relied on by such party and not printed in any brief."

Appellant attempted to comply with this requirement, and our examination of the transcript convinces us that he has been fairly successful except in the omission to print any portion of the pleadings. Of this omission respondents complain, and they also assert, as already declared, that appellant should have printed the entire testimony in the case. In this connection it may be stated that appellant at the oral argument offered to print any additional matter that this court might deem appropriate, but we see no necessity for requiring any further expense. The whole record, which is not voluminous, is before us, and we perceive no reason why we may not look into it for information as to the pleadings and to ascertain whether appellant's supplementary brief is fairly representative of the showing made at the trial.

[2] Our examination leaves us in no doubt that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit. The rule that should be followed in passing upon a motion for nonsuit is so well settled as scarcely to require comment. It is sufficient to refer to In re Daly, 15 Cal. App. 329, 114 Pac. 787; Marron v. Marron, 19 Cal. App. 326, 125 Pac. 914; and Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. Briefly stated, the trial court must accept as true the evidence that is favorable to plaintiff, disregard any conflicting or contradictory evidence, and indulge every inference and presumption favorable to the plaintiff, which fairly arises from the evidence produced.

[3] Applying this rule, the trial court was certainly required to assume that plaintiff made the conveyance in question without consideration, that he was at the time of unsound mind, that he sustained to the grantee a fiduciary relation, and that the subsequent grantees took without consideration and with notice of the infirmity of the conveyance of February 17, 1911.

That thus was presented a case for relief in a court of equity is not and cannot be disputed. Numerous cases are cited by appellant, which sustain this view, but it seems hardly necessary to even cite them in view of the silence of respondents and the practical unanimity of the authorities. However, we may quote from Williamson v. Williamson, 41 Cal. App. 723, 183 Pac. 302, as follows:

> "At the time when defendant made the deed conveying the property to plaintiff the parties were husband and wife; hence, as declared in section 158 of the Civil Code, the transaction was subject to the general rules applicable to dealings in property between a trustee and his beneficiary. Among these rules are the following: All transactions entered into between a trustee and cestui que trust by which the former secures any benefit are presumed to be without sufficient consideration and under undue influence. Civ. Code, § 2235. A trustee may not use the influence which his position gives him to obtain any advantage of the beneficiaries. Civ. Code, § 2231. And if he does, it constitutes fraud for which a court of equity will grant relief. Civ. Code, § 2224; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189, 17 Pac. 689; Jackson v. Jackson, 94 Cal. 446, 29 Pac. 957. By virtue of these provisions of the law the position of plaintiff at the time the conveyance was made to her must be deemed that of a trustee for her husband, and since she as a result of the transaction obtained title to the property from one whose relation to her was that of cestui que trust, the transfer is presumed not only to have been made without sufficient consideration, but as a result of undue influence. It therefore devolved upon plaintiff not only to show the execution of the grant, but also to produce evidence showing a sufficient consideration and that it was not obtained by undue influence."

[4] The foregoing is a sufficient answer to the claim of respondents, made at the oral argument, that plaintiff should have returned or offered to return the consideration before beginning the action. We may add that not only does the inference that there was no consideration arise from the proof of the fiduciary relation, casting upon respondents the burden of proving the contrary, but, as we have seen, there was positive evidence of the want of consideration.

[5] Another reason why the trial court should have denied the motion is found in the circumstance that there was no specification of the grounds of the motion. The record shows that "the motion for nonsuit was made on behalf of defendants upon the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case." In Daley v. Russ, 86 Cal. 114, 24 Pac. 867, it is said:

> "It is undoubtedly the settled rule that a motion for nonsuit should specify the grounds upon which it is made, and ordinarily a ground which is not stated cannot be considered."

In Warner v. Warner, 144 Cal. 615, 78 Pac. 24, it is stated that—

> "The reason for the rule * * * is, that if other grounds were specified, the plaintiff might overcome the objection by additional evidence, but if the defect is inherent in his cause of action, and cannot be cured, the reason for the rule ceases to exist, and the rule itself has no application."

In the Williamson Case, supra, the motion for nonsuit was made "on the ground that they (the plaintiff) have failed to make out a prima facie case; and on the further ground that they have failed to make out such a case, if the case were tried before a jury, as would warrant them in returning a verdict for the plaintiff." This was held to be insufficient, the court stating that the defendant should have pointed out specifically his objection and thereby have given his opponent "an opportunity to introduce evidence to meet the same, subject to the ruling of the court upon an application so to do." Such practice is, of course, commendable, as it encourages the trial of causes upon their merits. The number of cases reversed on appeal from a judgment of nonsuit should be a warning to counsel to exercise the greatest care in the matter of such motions.

We feel confident that under well-established principles the judgment is erroneous, and it is therefore reversed.

PEOPLE v. MITCHELL. (Cr. 949.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1159(2, 4)—Credibility of witnesses and weight of their testimony for jury.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, the degree of credibility accorded witnesses and the power of judging of the effect and value of evidence are matters exclusively for the jury.

2. Rape 🔑52(1)—Evidence warranted verdict of guilty.

In a rape prosecution, evidence and inferences properly deducible therefrom held to warrant a conviction of statutory rape.

3. Criminal law 🔑404(4)—Admitting in evidence nightgown worn by prosecutrix held not error.

In a rape prosecution., where prosecutrix identified by blood spots the nightgown she wore on the night of the alleged offense and stated there were no blood spots thereon when she went to bed the night before, but they were there when she got up the next morning, and no restriction was placed on defendant as to cross-examination as to where the garment had been kept after the offense, or whether the spots thereon were in the same condition as immediately after the offense, there was no error in admitting it in evidence.

4. Criminal law 🔑452(4)—Defendant's handwriting proved by one who had seen him write.

In a rape prosecution, where a letter from defendant to his wife was introduced by the state, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1943, it was proper to prove his handwriting by one who stated he had seen him write on numerous occasions, and that he believed the handwriting in the letter to be defendant's

5. Witnesses 🔑191—Evidence of letter from defendant to his wife properly received.

In a rape prosecution, evidence of a letter written by defendant to his wife, which was found on the cabin floor shortly after the wife removed therefrom, was properly admitted, notwithstanding that by Pen. Code, § 1322, the wife would not have been a competent witness as to its contents.

6. Criminal law 🔑885—Verdict recommending sentence of not over 5 years held sufficient.

In a rape prosecution, verdict finding defendant guilty, and recommending to the court that his sentence be not over 5 years, held to find him guilty as charged in the information, and such recommendation did not render it nugatory within Pen. Code, § 1151, providing that a general verdict is either guilty or not guilty.

7. Criminal law 🔑893—Rule as to construction of verdicts stated.

A verdict is to be construed like other instruments, by taking it in its entirety; and, if the meaning intended to be conveyed may be clearly ascertained by common understanding, it is sufficient, notwithstanding any surplusage, or that there may be included therein irregularities in spelling or awkward or incorrect expressions from a grammatical standpoint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Frank W. Mitchell was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Samuel Rosenthal, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Lorrin Andrews, of Los Angeles, for the People.

HOUSER, J. Defendant was convicted of having committed the crime of rape on the person of a girl of the age of 14 years. He appeals from the judgment, and urges the following reasons why he should be granted a new trial:

(1) That the evidence is insufficient to justify the rendition of a verdict of guilty.

(2) That errors of law in the admission of evidence were committed by the trial judge, and the evidence so admitted was prejudicial to defendant.

(3) That the verdict of the jury was not such a verdict as is contemplated by law.

[1] With reference to the first specification, the evidence which the jury had a right to consider in making up the verdict showed that the mother of the prosecuting witness and her younger brother and their stepfather were living in a tent in the town of Johannesburg; that on the 20th of August, 1922, the mother and the stepfather went to the town of Huntington Beach for a stay of a few days, leaving the children alone in the tent; that defendant was well acquainted with all the parties, lived in their immediate neighborhood, knew of the temporary absence of the mother and the stepfather of the girl; that the next day after the departure of the mother and stepfather he visited the girl at least twice, and probably three times, and that it was on the evening of that day when the offense was committed; that on the latter or the last of the occasions on which he visited the girl he found her sleeping alone in one of the beds in the tent which she occupied; that, according to his own testimony, earlier in the day he had had some conversation of an improper nature with the prosecuting witness; that on one occasion he had seen the girl and her stepfather go into a bathroom to take a bath together; that his own wife had told him that the prosecuting witness had confessed to her that she had been intimate with several different men. The prosecuting witness testified that the first knowledge she had of defendant's presence in the tent was when she was awakened by defendant, who was in bed with her, with his arms around her, and that the act of which complaint is made then occurred; that both the nightgown worn by the prosecuting witness at that time, as well as the under garments of defendant which he wore on that occasion, and which were exhibited to the jury, had on them spots of blood; that defendant made damaging admissions with reference to his guilt to the stepfather of the prosecuting witness, and that defendant also wrote a letter to his wife which contained statements from which his guilt might be inferred.

[2] While defendant denied many of the foregoing statements, and made some effort to establish an alibi, it is a well-settled rule of law that the degree of credibility which shall be accorded to a witness, or to all the witnesses, as well as the power of judging of the effect and value of evidence, are matters which lie exclusively within the province of the jury. Section 1847, Code Civ. Proc.; People v. Bush, 68 Cal. 629, 10 Pac. 169; People v. Cesena, 90 Cal. 381, 27 Pac. 300; People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 56 Pac. 44; People v. Preston, 19 Cal. App. 675, 127 Pac. 660. The jury by its verdict clearly indicated to which testimony and evidence it gave credence. From the evidence and from the inferences properly deducible therefrom the jury was warranted in returning a verdict of guilty. In such a case, that an appellate court will not pass upon questions of the credibility of witnesses, or the preponderance of the evidence, has been announced with practical unanimity by all the decisions of this state having a bearing on the subject.

[3] Appellant specifies as error the receipt in evidence of a certain nightgown which the prosecuting witness testified she wore on the occasion in question. After the witness had testified to the fact that she was wearing the nightgown, and that after the act complained of had taken place there was blood upon her person, the following questions were put and the following answers given thereto:

"Q. You say you were wearing a nightgown? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Would you be able to recognize that if you saw it? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. When had you put that nightgown on? A. Just before I went to bed.

"Q. Had you worn that the night before that? A. No.

"Q. That is the first night you had worn that nightgown—I don't mean that. I withdraw that. You had worn a different nightgown the night before that? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And put this nightgown on the night of this occurrence, is that right? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. I show you, I ask that this be marked Exhibit 1 for identification; I ask that you examine this nightgown, and ask you to testify whether or not that is the nightgown you wore on that night? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Were any of these spots on there when you went to bed—on this nightgown? A. No.

"Q. When you got up the next morning were these spots there? A. Yes, sir."

The nightgown was then offered in evidence, and counsel for defendant objected thereto on the ground "that no proper foundation has been laid, no proper identification," which objection was by the court overruled. While no attempt was made by the prosecution to account for the whereabouts of the garment between the date of the alleged offense and the time the witness was giving her testimony on the witness stand, nor to show that its condition had remained unchanged in the meantime, there was no restriction in the matter placed by the court on counsel for defendant, and there is nothing in the record which indicates that any request was made by counsel for defendant to examine the witness for the purpose of ascertaining her knowledge on the subject. Certainly the correctness of the statements of the witness regarding the spots and the identification of the garment were open to a full and fair test on cross-examination, had counsel desired to avail himself of the opportunity. The record shows that he asked the witness no questions on the subject. The identification of the nightgown and the spots thereon was sufficient to admit it in evidence. Where the garment had been kept after the alleged offense was committed, or whether either it or the spots thereon were in exactly the same condition that they were immediately thereafter, is of no great materiality. The point was not whether they had remained unchanged, but rather was that no spots were on the gown before the alleged offense was committed, but were there immediately thereafter.

[4] Over the objection of defendant, a letter from defendant to his wife was received in evidence. Defendant's handwriting was partly proved by the stepfather of the prosecuting witness, who testified that he had seen the defendant write on numerous occasions, and that he believed the handwriting in the letter to be that of defendant. The objection is completely covered by section 1943, Code of Civil Procedure, which permits handwriting of a person to be proved by any one who "believes it to be his, and who has seen him write."

[5] While defendant's wife was not a witness on the trial, counsel for defendant contends that the letter was inadmissible under the provisions of section 1322 of the Penal Code, which provides, in effect, that the wife is not a competent witness against the husband in a criminal action. The evidence shows that this particular letter was found on the floor of a cabin shortly after defendant's wife had removed therefrom. If it may be assumed that defendant's wife could not have testified as to the contents of the letter, it does not follow that no one else who read the letter might not do so. It is analogous to the situation of testimony by a witness who overheard a conversation between husband and wife. People v. Chadwick, 4 Cal. App. 72, 87 Pac. 384, 389; People v. Swaile, 12 Cal. App. 196, 107 Pac. 134.

[6] Counsel for defendant also objects to the form of the verdict which was rendered by the jury. It was as follows:

> "We, the jury impaneled to try the above-entitled cause, find the defendant guilty as charged in the information, and recommend to the court that his sentence be not over 5 years."

Section 1151 of the Penal Code provides that—

> "A general verdict upon a plea of not guilty is either 'Guilty' or 'Not guilty.'"

The effect of defendant's contention is that the recommendation of the jury annexed to the verdict, that the sentence be not over five years, is not mere surplusage, but is a condition which renders the verdict nugatory.

In the case of People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 50 Pac. 675, it appears that a verdict was returned which, among other irregularities, prayed "the extreme mercy of the court in its sentence and punishment." The verdict was upheld on the ground that it should have a reasonable construction, and be given effect according to its manifest intention. And see People v. Cornell, 29 Cal. App. 430, 155 Pac. 1026, in which the California authorities bearing upon the subject are reviewed. In People v. Bowman, 24 Cal. App. 781, 142 Pac. 495, where one of the verdicts returned by the jury was, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of the crime charged and leave to the mercy of the court," it was held that such a verdict was not rendered invalid by reason of the concluding clause.

[7] The only matter to be considered here is the effect which the verdict, if any, produced by the recommendation as to the sentence to be imposed on defendant. A verdict is to be construed like any other instrument, and the rule is that, taking the verdict in its entirety, if the meaning intended to be conveyed may be clearly ascertained by common understanding, the verdict is sufficient, notwithstanding any surplusage, or that there may be included therein irregularities in spelling or awkward or incorrect expressions from a grammatical standpoint. From the language used in the verdict in the instant case there is no difficulty in ascertaining the fact that the jury found the defendant guilty as charged in the information.

PEOPLE v. SAUNDERS. (Cr. 933.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 12, 1923.)

1. Physicians and surgeons 🔑6(1)—Physician may "treat" or "prescribe" for sick person without first making a diagnosis within statute requiring license.

A physician may treat or prescribe for a sick person in violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, making it unlawful to "diagnose, treat, operate for, or prescribe for any disease," without a license, without first making a diagnosis of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First Series, Treat; First and Second Series, Prescribe.]

2. Criminal law 🔑810—Instructions held not inconsistent; "willfully."

In a prosecution for "willfully and unlawfully" practicing medicine without a license, under Medical Practice Act, § 17, an instruction in the language of Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 1, that "the word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent by which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law or to injure another or to acquire any advantage," held not erroneous as against the contention that the last sentence was inconsistent with other instruction in the language of section 20 that "in every crime or public offense there must exist a union or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence," since the word "it" in the last sentence of the first instruction refers back to the word "willfully."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Willful—Willfully.]

3. Criminal law 🔑822(1)—Sentence of charge should be read in the light of its context.

A sentence of the court's charge should not be considered as standing by itself, but should be read in the light of its context.

4. Physicians and surgeons 🔑6(10)—In prosecution for practicing without license, defendant had burden of proving he had license.

In a prosecution for practicing medicine without a license, in violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, the defendant had the burden of proving that he had a license.

5. Physicians and surgeons 🔑6(11)—In prosecution for practicing without license, instruction not to consider favorable results of defendant's treatment held proper.

In a prosecution for practicing medicine without a license, in violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, in which there was evidence tending to show that the defendant's treatment of his patients had produced favorable results, it was proper for the court to instruct the jury that they were not to be affected in their deliberations by any evidence to the effect that defendant's practice had succeeded with his patients.

6. Criminal law 🔑1172(1)—Instructions stating self-evident proposition held harmless.

In prosecution for violation of Medical Practice Act, § 17, making it a crime to "practice * * * any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted" without a license, an instruction that a person who is suffering from a misplaced vertebra is sick and afflicted, and that one who engages in the occupation of adjusting or replacing such misplaced vertebra into its normal position is practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted, and an instruction that one who is suffering from nervousness, headaches, pains, or any other malmental or malphysical condition is sick and afflicted, within the statute, and that one who as an occupation manipulates the bones or kneads the muscles or tissues of such a person to relieve such condition is practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted, if erroneous as instructions on matters of fact, were harmless, since there could be no possible dissent from the propositions so stated.

7. Criminal law 🔑1178—Point not argued by appellant not considered.

A point stated but not argued by the appellant will not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

H. C. Saunders was convicted of practicing medicine without without a license, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur E. Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., and C. D. Ballard, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without a license, a misdemeanor. He appeals from the judgment of conviction.

[1] Appellant's first point is that the evidence at the trial was insufficient to show that he had made a diagnosis in any of the cases in which it was claimed by the people that he had practiced his system of treating the sick. This point is based upon the erroneous view, for which appellant, however, is far from being wholly responsible, that one does not practice medicine or treat the sick unless, as a preliminary to ministering to the necessities of his patient, he makes a diagnosis. In support of this view of the law appellant cites People v. Jordan, 172 Cal. 391, 156 Pac. 451, and People v. Parish, (Cal. App.) 210 Pac. 633. The first-named case does not announce such a rule, but only that diagnosis is a part of the practice of medicine. The effect of the decision there rendered is faithfully epitomized in a sentence of the opinion as follows:

"To diagnose a case is as much a part of the practice of medicine as the drawing of pleadings or the giving of advice are parts of the practice of law."

People v. Parish, however, does state the rule for which appellant contends, and, moreover, People v. Jordan is in that case cited as authority for the statement. The same erroneous estimate of the effect of People v. Jordan is taken in People v. Cochran (Cal. App.) 205 Pac. 473. Under these conditions it becomes necessary for us to pass upon the legal question which is the foundation for appellant's point, although we should not otherwise be called upon to do so, for the evidence in the present case is unquestionably sufficient to support a finding that, beyond a reasonable doubt, appellant did make diagnosis in each of the cases upon which the charge in the information is based.

Irrespective, then, of People v. Jordan, do People v. Parish and People v. Cochran state the correct rule of law? The Medical Practice Act, so called, the enactment for violation of which appellant was convicted (Stats. 1913, p. 722), provides in section 17 (italics ours) that—

> "Any person who shall practice * * * any system or mode of treating the sick or afflicted in this state, or who shall diagnose, treat, operate for, or prescribe for, any disease, injury, deformity," etc., without having a license, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

It is at once apparent from this language that the Legislature intended to denounce the act of any one who, not having a license, might diagnose without treating or prescribing, or who might treat or prescribe without diagnosing. Not only so, but the enactment is based upon reason and logic. Physicians are often called as consultants in cases in which diagnosis has already been made by others. They doubtless often prescribe for cases in which they never see the patient and upon the diagnosis of others. Suppose a physician in Pasadena should write or telephone to a physician in Los Angeles, stating that he has under his care a patient who is afflicted with a certain disease, that he has prescribed certain remedies without avail, and asking the Los Angeles physician if he can suggest a remedy. If the latter should thereupon write a prescription and send it to the Pasadena physician, could it possibly be said that he would not be practicing medicine in doing so? The answer to the question is manifest. We conclude that a physician may treat or prescribe for a patient, within the meaning of the statute, without making diagnosis of his case.

[2, 3] The trial court instructed the jury in the words of subdivision 1 of section 7, Penal Code, that—

> "The word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage."

Appellant, wrenching the last sentence of this instruction from its context and taking it as if it stood alone, contends that by that sentence the jury was erroneously instructed as to the law of intent. The trial court also instructed the jury, in the language of Penal Code, § 20, that—

> "In every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence."

Appellant insists that the sentence to which he objects is inconsistent with the terms of the instruction in the words of section 20. If we take the sentence alone the statement is true, but it cannot properly be taken alone. Reading it in the light of its context, the last part of subdivision 1 of section 7 is to the effect that—

> "The word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted. * * * does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage."

When taken as a whole the instruction was but a definition of the word "willfully." Moreover, it was a definition which was not improper to be given to the jury, even though it be granted that the giving was not strictly necessary. It was proper for the reason that the information charged that appellant "willfully and unlawfully" committed the acts alleged against him. As it was not error to define to the jury the word "willfully," we cannot conceive it to have been improper to give a definition formulated by the Legislature. There is a vast difference between the meaning of the words "willfully" and "unlawfully." The language of subdivision 1 of section 7 of the Penal Code defines the meaning of the former, while section 20, although not strictly a definition, has a direct application to the latter as used in connection with the former in an information or indictment. We can see no error in a trial court giving them both to the jury in proper cases. We are aware that in People v. Stennett, 51 Cal. App. 370, 197 Pac. 372, and in People v. Tomasovich (Cal. App.) 206 Pac. 119, it was said that an instruction in the words of subdivision 1 of section 7 is misleading, and that such an instruction should not be given. We cannot agree with what is said on the subject in the opinions in those cases. It is to be noted that no reversal resulted in either of the cases mentioned because of the point.

[4] The trial court instructed the jury that it was not necessary for the people to prove that appellant had no license to practice his system of healing and that the burden was on him to prove that he had such a license. Appellant complains of the instruction as error, but it has been settled by the Supreme Court that such an instruction is proper. People v. Boo Doo Hong, 122 Cal. 606, 55 Pac. 402.

[5] The jury was instructed that they were not to be affected in their deliberations by any evidence to the effect that appellant's practice of his system had succeeded with his patients, and this instruction also is complained of. The instruction was entirely proper. There was some evidence in the record tending to show that appellant's treatment of his patients had produced favorable results. It was not only proper, but necessary, to instruct the jury that this evidence must be given no weight in determining whether appellant had practiced without a license. Otherwise the jury might have lost sight of the real question in the case.

[6] It is contended that the trial court erred in giving to the jury two other instructions. The first of these was:

> "That a person is sick and afflicted who is suffering from a misplaced vertebra, and that any one who engages in the business or occupation of adjusting or replacing, or who in the pursuit of an occupation attempts to adjust or replace, such misplaced vertebra into its normal position, is practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted."

The second was:

> "That one who is suffering at all with nervousness, headaches, pains or any other malmental or malphysical condition whatever, is sick and afflicted within the meaning of section No. 17 of the State Medical Practice Act, and that any one who engages in the business or occupation of manipulating the bones or kneading the muscles or tissues of such person for the purpose of relieving or healing such person of any such condition is practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted."

It is insisted that these instructions relate to matters of fact and not to matters of law. If for the sake of argument we concede, what we by no means decide, that the two instructions are to be so regarded, the giving of them to the jury was harmless. There can be no possible dissent from the proposition that one laboring under the disabilities named in the instructions is sick and afflicted, or that he who attempts to relieve such an one from his disabilities by the means mentioned in the instructions is practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted.

[7] Appellant states one other point, but as it is not argued it is not to be considered.

Judgment affirmed.

OGDEN v. LEE. (Civ. 4406.)

1. Municipal corporations 🔑706(7)—Contributory negligence of one injured by automobile requires nonsuit, though automobile on wrong side of street.

In an action for personal injuries against the driver of an automobile, where it is conceded that defendant at the time of the accident was driving on the wrong side of the street, yet, if by the uncontradicted testimony of plaintiff himself it is shown that he was also negligent and that such negligence contributed proximately to the injuries, a motion for nonsuit is properly granted.

2. Municipal corporations 🔑706(5)—Evidence held to establish contributory negligence of one injured by automobile while crossing street in rain.

In an action for personal injuries against the driver of an automobile, evidence that it was raining and blowing and that plaintiff endeavored to cross a street while holding an umbrella in such a manner that he could not see well, and the fact that he saw, through the top of the umbrella the approaching lights, but was unable to determine whether they were moving or not, and evidence that after seeing them he proceeded directly into their path, held to establish contributory negligence and warrant a nonsuit.

3. Appeal and error 🔑1057(1)—Exclusions of part of deposition held not prejudicial where uncontradicted evidence to same effect admitted elsewhere.

In an action for injuries from being struck by an automobile, the exclusion of parts of a deposition, to the effect that the driver of the automobile had admitted he was on the wrong side of the street at the time of the accident, held not prejudicial if erroneous, where such effect was established by other testimony without contradiction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by G. B. Ogden against Don Lee. Judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hearing denied by Supreme Court; Lawlor, J., dissenting.

E. J. Talbott and John W. Bantz, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Plaintiff, while crossing Webster street, at its intersection with Grand avenue, in the city of Oakland, was struck and injured by an automobile, driven by an employee of the defendant.

This action was commenced by plaintiff for damages as a result of those injuries, and upon trial, before the court sitting with a jury, a motion for a nonsuit was granted, and judgment was entered in favor of defendant, for the reason and upon the ground that the evidence given by plaintiff proved that he was guilty of contributory negligence. Plaintiff appeals.

The record discloses that at the time of the accident defendant's automobile was being driven on the wrong side of the street, and it is upon that ground that plaintiff contends that defendant was negligent. It may be conceded that this contention of plaintiff is sound, and yet if, by the uncontradicted testimony of the plaintiff himself, it is shown that he was also negligent and that such negligence contributed proximately to the injuries complained of, the motion for a nonsuit was properly granted.

The accident occurred on the night of December 21, 1920, shortly before the hour of 8 o'clock. It was raining and blowing at the time. The wind was blowing from the north sufficiently strong to drive the rain before it. Plaintiff was dressed in a black suit and was carrying an opened black umbrella. As he stood on the westerly curb of Webster street, which runs in a northerly and southerly direction, he raised the open umbrella and looked to the north and to the south for approaching vehicles. He observed lights on the easterly side of Webster street, up near Twenty-Third street, at a distance of approximately 125 feet from him, but was unable to say whether they were the lights of an automobile or not. He was asked whether or not the lights were moving at the time he saw them, and with some considerable degree of uncertainty he first answered that if they were moving they were "not moving very much," and, afterwards, in reply to a direct question, "Were they moving, yes or no," he answered, "I couldn't say." Later he stated, "I could not tell positively that it (the light) was not moving." He stated that he then pulled the umbrella down over his head to protect himself from the rain, and proceeded to cross the street. When he reached the center of the street he still had the umbrella well down over his head and tilted to the north for the purpose of shedding the rain; that he then looked to the south under the edge of the umbrella and saw no vehicle approaching from that direction, and he then looked to the north through the "roofing" of the umbrella and observed that the light on the easterly side of Webster street was then within 75 or 80 feet from him. Nevertheless, he continued on his course and walked directly into the pathway of the moving automobile, and was struck and injured.

[1] In view of these facts, which were established by the plaintiff's own testimony, we are convinced that the trial court was correct in holding that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. The motion for a nonsuit was therefore properly granted.

[2] Plaintiff endeavors to justify his contention that he was not guilty of contributory negligence upon the grounds that he believed in good faith that the light which he observed was stationary, and that he did all that the law required him to do when he looked to the right and to the left before attempting to cross to the easterly side of the street.

It is doubtless true that plaintiff did believe that the light he saw was not moving toward him; otherwise he would not have walked squarely in front of the moving machine. But we are constrained to hold, as a matter of law, as did the trial court, that under the circumstances here shown plaintiff did not act as a prudent person in forming and acting upon such belief, particularly in view of the fact that when he was in the middle of the street the light was approximately 50 feet closer to him than it was when he left the curb. If he had paused only a few seconds in the middle of the street, it is plain that he would then have known that it was the light of an approaching automobile.

A complete answer to the second proposition is that even though plaintiff did look to the right and to the left when he reached the middle of the street and before he attempted to cross to the easterly side thereof, he obviously did not heed what he saw. He admits that when he stepped from the curb he saw a light 125 feet from him, and that when he reached the middle of the street this same light was within 70 or 80 feet from him, and without pausing for a few seconds to ascertain whether or not it was the light of an automobile, he continued on, with the umbrella pulled down over his face, until he was struck by the machine.

In the case of Moss v. Boynton Co., 44 Cal. App. 474, 186 Pac. 631, the rule is stated as follows:

> "It was a duty devolving upon plaintiff, as the act of an ordinarily prudent man, immediately before placing himself in a position of danger, to look in the direction from which danger was to be anticipated. This was a continuing duty, and was not met by looking once and then looking away. In the exercise of ordinary care it is the duty of a pedestrian 'to look to the right and to the left whenever he has voluntarily put himself in a position which may be one of peril coming from either direction.' Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474–479."

Measuring the facts of this case by the rule thus stated, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Finkle v. Tait (Cal. App.) 203 Pac. 1031; Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 Pac. 175.

[3] Appellant also complains of a ruling of the trial court excluding, upon the objection of the defendant, certain testimony given by plaintiff in the form of a deposition. Plaintiff's deposition was taken at the request of the defendant prior to the trial.

Plaintiff also testified as a witness at the trial. At the conclusion of plaintiff's testimony, before the court and jury, plaintiff offered in evidence said deposition. Defendant objected to certain answers therein given, which were made in response to questions propounded by the defendant, and the court sustained the objection. The substance of those answers is that the driver of the machine admitted to plaintiff, while plaintiff was being taken, to the hospital, that he, the driver of the machine, was on the wrong side of the street. This ruling, even though it be error, was not prejudicial to plaintiff's case, for the reason that by plaintiff's testimony, given before the court and jury, it was established without contradiction that said automobile was, at the time of the accident, being driven on the wrong side of the street.

(61 Cal. App. 464)

In re HOLT'S ESTATE. (Civ. 2567.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 19, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 17, 1923.)

1. Taxation 🔑864—Voluntary declaration of trust by devisee does not affect inheritance tax.

If there was no valid existent trust at the moment of decedent's death, an acknowledgment of a trust subsequently executed by a devisee with reference to the property devised amounts to no more than a voluntary transfer by her, and cannot affect the amount of inheritance tax due the state.

2. Trusts 🔑96—Devise on promise of devisee to use in particular manner creates a trust.

Where a testator makes known to a devisee his desire that the property shall be disposed of in a particular manner, and that he relies on the devisee to carry the desire into effect, and the devisee uses words and does acts calculated to cause, and which he knows do in fact cause, testator to believe he assents thereto, and the testator in consequence thereof makes the devise, a constructive trust is created.

3. Evidence 🔑317(4)—Declarations of testator not communicated to devisee are not binding on him.

The declarations of testator, not made in the presence of a devisee and not communicated to the devisee, relating to the disposition the testator desires to have made of the property devised, are not binding on the devisee, and are incompetent as mere hearsay.

4. Trusts 🔑110—Evidence held not to show devisee's promise to hold property in trust.

Evidence in proceedings to assess an inheritance tax held not to sustain an allegation that the devisee had promised testator to carry out his desires with reference to the property, so as to establish a constructive trust which would result in a lower tax.

5. Judgment 🔑735—Finding in probate proceeding not binding, in determining liability for inheritance tax.

The right of a state to collect inheritance tax cannot be prejudiced by any finding of the court in proceedings to probate a will.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Benjamin Holt, deceased, in which Anna Brown Holt and others were executrix and administrators. From an order of the superior court fixing the amount of the inheritance tax, Myra A. Holt appeals, naming as respondents the executrix and executors and Ray L. Riley, State Controller. Order affirmed.

Harding & Monroe, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Neumiller & Ditz, of Stockton, for petitioners and respondents.

James L. Atteridge, of Sacramento, for other respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from an order fixing the amount of inheritance tax chargeable against the property given by the will of decedent to appellant.

The only part of the will material here is the seventh clause, which reads as follows:

> "I give, bequeath and devise unto my sister, Myra A. Holt, of Concord, New Hampshire, the other one-third (1/3) share or portion of said rest, remainder and residue of my said property and estate."

There is nothing in the will to limit or qualify this clause. The value of the property thus passing to appellant is the sum of $335,502.32.

The petition for probate of the will alleged that decedent, during his lifetime, requested and directed appellant that the income of such property—

> "should be enjoyed by her during her natural life, and out of said income thereof, she should provide for her sister Anna M. Holt, during the natural life of said sister Anna M. Holt, and upon the death of said Myra A. Holt, said property * * * should go to the children of said Benjamin Holt, deceased, * * * and to the survivor or survivors of them, share and share alike, and said Myra A. Holt, heretofore by an instrument in writing, which is herewith presented to said superior court, has acknowledged and accepted said trust and declared her intention to accept said property and estate impressed and charged with said trust."

The acceptance and acknowledgment of the alleged trust, so presented, was executed after the death of decedent. The court found the facts alleged in the petition to be true and admitted the will to probate.

The inheritance tax appraiser in due time filed his report containing two exhibits, the one showing the amount of the inheritance tax due if appellant received the property free of any trust, and the other showing the amount of such tax if the property was impressed with a binding trust at the time of the death of decedent. The difference between the respective amounts so estimated is, in round numbers, the sum of $20,000. Appellant filed her objections to the report and alleged that the decedent had requested her to accept the property under the terms of the alleged trust, and that she had promised him to do so, and that she had executed the aforesaid acknowledgment and acceptance of such trust. The court overruled appellant's objections and fixed the amount of the inheritance tax irrespective of the alleged trust.

Appellant contends that, by reason of the alleged oral trust, her only beneficial interest in the property is that of a life estate, that the beneficial interest in the remainder is in the decedent's children, and that therefore the tax should be computed separately upon such interests. It is argued that In re Murphy, 4 Misc. Rep. 230, 25 N. Y. Supp. 107, and In re Farley's Estate, 15 N. Y. State Rep. 727, directly sustain this contention. On the other hand, the state controller relies on the later decision of In re Edson, 38 App. Div. 19, 56 N. Y. Supp. 409, affirmed, 159 N. Y. 568, 54 N. E. 1092. In addition to the cases cited that of Cullen v. Attorney General, L. R. 1 H. L. 190, 144 L. T. Rep. (N. S.) 44, tends to support the controller's position, and People v. Schaefer, 266 Ill. 334, 107 N. E. 617, and In re Romney's Estate (Utah) 207 Pac. 139, directly sustain the contention of appellant. The statute under consideration in Cullen v. Attorney General imposed a tax only upon property passing by "will or testamentary instrument," while the California tax is imposed in case of any transfer made in contemplation of death. The decision, therefore, is not entitled to great weight as an authority in support of the order appealed from. While the reasoning of the court in the Illinois case is persuasive in support of appellant's contention, the question of law under consideration need not be decided because the implied finding against the existence of the alleged oral trust is justified by the evidence.

The testimony tending to establish the alleged trust is short and will be given in full. Counsel for the controller objected to any testimony as to statements made by the testator, "on the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial—what was said. And it is an attempt to vary the terms of a will in probate." The objection was overruled and the witnesses testified as follows:

C. L. Neumiller:

"Q. Was there anything said by Mr. Holt at that time about it (the bequest to appellant)? A. Of course he discussed the general disposition of his property, and discussed this share that went to his sister Myra in the will, to her and her sister Anna during their lives, and at the death of Myra to go to his children, substantially I think as the acknowledgment and declaration of trust sets forth. Q. Was there anything said in regard to the form in which he was leaving it? A. No; he was making that bequest for his sisters during their lives, and at the death of Myra to go to his children. Q. Was there anything in regard to the knowledge of this on the part of his sisters? A. Judge Jones, who drew the will—and, of course, I was present, and Mr. Eccleston was present; at that time why the question arose of inserting those provisions in the will; that is, as to the trust he was establishing, and at that time he told us his sister Myra understood that thoroughly, he had discussed the matter with her. There was Mr. Eccleston, Judge Jones, myself, and Benjamin Holt present."

O. H. Eccleston:

"Q. What did Mr. Benjamin Holt say at that time, if anything? A. That he wished that share of his property to go to his sisters Anna and Myra, and desired the younger, Myra, to handle the property during their lifetime, and after they had the use of it, it was to go to his children."

Mrs. Anna Brown Holt:

"I am the wife of Benjamin Holt. Q. Did Benjamin Holt ever converse with you in regard to the bequest which he made to his sister Myra Holt? A. He always said Myra was to have it, and then when she passed away it was to go to the children. That is the way it was always understood."

Myra Holt:

"I am a sister of Mr. Benjamin Holt. I am the Myra Holt to whom this legacy was left. I executed the declaration of trust which is on file here in court. Q. Why did you do that? A. I did it because it was my brother's request."

The acknowledgment and acceptance of trust was then admitted in evidence. The controller then introduced in evidence the will, the petition for letters testamentary, and the order admitting the will to probate.

[1, 2] If there was not a valid existent trust at the moment of decedent's death, then the acknowledgment and acceptance executed by the appellant could amount to no more than a voluntary transfer by her to decedent's children and could not affect the amount of inheritance tax due the state. Estate of Rossi, 169 Cal. 148, 146 Pac. 430. Appellant cites 39 Cyc. 177, as follows:

"Where a testator or ancestor makes known to his devisee, legatee, or heir his desire that his property shall be disposed of in a particular manner, and that he relies upon him to carry his desire into effect, and such devisee, legatee or heir uses words, or does acts, calculated to cause, and which he knows do in fact cause, the testator or ancestor to believe that he fully assents thereto, and, where in consequence thereof, the testator or ancestor makes, or omits to make a will or such particular disposition of his property in his lifetime as will carry out his desire, a constructive trust is created."

The rule thus stated is in effect that, if the testator, in the disposition of his property, has acted or refrained from acting in reliance upon the promise of the devisee or legatee, express or implied, to hold the property in trust, the trust will be binding upon such devisee or legatee.

> "While a testator may make a gift to a legatee solely for the purpose of enabling him, if he sees fit, to dispose of it in a particular way, still, if there is no promise by him, either express or implied, to so dispose of it, and the matter is left wholly to his will and discretion, no secret trust is created, and he may, if he chooses, apply the legacy to his own use." Amherst College v. Ritch, 151 N. Y. 323, 45 N. E. 887, 37 L. R. A. 305; O'Donnell v. Murphy, 17 Cal. App. 625, 120 Pac. 1076.

Counsel for appellant recognized the necessity of showing such a promise by alleging, in the objections filed to the report of the inheritance tax appraiser, that "the said Benjamin Holt asked the said Myra A. Holt if she would accept the said bequest under the terms as above stated, and the said Myra A. Holt accepted the said trust and told him that she would hold the property under the terms first above set forth." The evidence, however, is singularly silent upon the issue thus tendered. There is no evidence that appellant even knew, during the lifetime of decedent, that her brother intended to create the alleged trust.

[3-5] The declarations of the testator, not made in the presence of appellant, or communicated to her during his lifetime, were not admissible to prove such knowledge on her part. Evidence of such declarations is not competent proof of past events, being mere hearsay. Estate of Carson, 184 Cal. 437, 445, 194 Pac. 5, 17 A. L. R. 239. Appellant did not testify that she had such knowledge prior to her brother's death. Her statement that she executed the acknowledgment and acceptance of the alleged trust "because it was my brother's request" is not inconsistent with the assumption that she may have acquired knowledge of such request, for the first time, after her brother's death. It is not unreasonable to assume that, if she had made the alleged promise to her brother she would have positively so stated in her testimony. In the order admitting the will to probate, introduced by the controller, the court found that the decedent, during his lifetime, requested and directed appellant to use and dispose of the property in accordance with the terms of the alleged trust. There was no finding therein, however, that appellant, expressly or impliedly, by conduct or otherwise, promised to comply with such request and direction. Furthermore, the rights of devisees, legatees, heirs and other claimants are not to be determined in a proceeding for the probate of a will. 28 R. C. L. 377. Certainly the right of the state to collect an inheritance tax cannot be prejudiced by any finding of the court in such a proceeding. The finding relative to the alleged trust is wholly foreign to any matter then before the court for determination. The order, therefore, is not competent evidence that the decedent requested appellant to hold and dispose of the property in accordance with the terms of the alleged trust, and a court is not required to base a finding on incompetent evidence. Hutchings v. Castle, 48 Cal. 152. If it can be said that the evidence possibly is such that either of two opposite conclusions might be drawn therefrom, it certainly cannot be held that it is so conclusive in favor of appellant's contention as to require a finding in her favor. The admissions of appellant, made after her brother's death, may be sufficient to establish the alleged trust as against her, but they can be given no weight in her favor as against the state. Independent of such admissions, the evidence in support of the trust is exceedingly slight.

The order is affirmed.

MANSFIELD v. PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION, Inc., et al. (S. F. 10578, 10576, 10577, 10575.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 8, 1923.)

1. Election of remedies 🔑1—Does not estop party to dismiss and pursue another remedy unless injury to adverse party is shown; "election of remedies."

The doctrine of election of remedies is based on the doctrine of estoppel, and in order for it to operate so as to estop one who has made an election from changing it and pursuing a different remedy a disadvantage constituting a real injury to the adverse party and amounting to fraud must be shown; an election of remedies being defined as the choosing between two or more different or coexisting modes of procedure and relief allowed by law on the same state of fact.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Election.]

2. Venue 🔑22(1)—Right to change of venue to county of defendant's residence not absolute.

A defendant being sued in a county other than his residence has a right, upon a proper showing and in the absence of a sufficient countershowing, to a change of venue to its own county, but this is not a right to an absolute transfer, but only a right to be protected against being compelled to proceed to trial in a county other than the one designated by law for the trial of such actions.

3. Election of remedies 🔑12—Action held not barred by commencement and dismissal of previous action in different county.

The commencing of an action against a defendant stage line to recover for personal injuries in one county and its dismissal and the bringing of suit in another county, neither of which was the county of defendant's residence, held not sufficiently prejudicial to defendant so as to make applicable the doctrine of election of remedies and bar the second action.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Four actions by D. W. Mansfield, Mrs. J. H. Weider, Edward Leitert, and Lester Lawrence against the Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, Inc., and others. From orders denying its motion for a change of venue, the named defendant appeals. Orders affirmed.

B. P. Gibbs, of Los Angeles, and Barry J. Colding and Theodore Hale, both of San Francisco (J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MYERS, J. The defendant in each of the above-entitled actions prosecutes these appeals from orders denying its motion for a change of venue from Monterey county to Los Angeles county. Each action is for damages for personal injuries sustained in an accident which occurred in Monterey county. The defendant, a corporation, had its principal place of business, and therefore its legal residence, in Los Angeles county. Prior to the commencement of these actions in Monterey county each of the plaintiffs filed a complaint upon the same cause of action in the city and county of San Francisco, whereupon the defendant moved for a change of venue to Los Angeles county, the county of its residence, and the plaintiff thereupon dismissed the action and refiled the same in Monterey county. Defendant's sole contention on this appeal is that when plaintiff filed the action in the city and county of San Francisco the defendant thereupon had an absolute right, upon proper procedure, to change the place of trial to its home county, that the plaintiffs sought to deprive defendant of this right by dismissing and refiling the actions in Monterey county, and that under these circumstances plaintiffs should be held to have made an irrevocable election of remedies, and to be estopped thereby to resist defendant's motion for a change of venue from Monterey county to Los Angeles county.

"An election of remedies is defined as the choosing between two or more different and coexisting modes of procedure and relief allowed by law on the same state of facts." 9 R. C. L. p. 956.

"Election of remedies has been defined to be the right to choose or the act of choosing between different actions or remedies where plaintiff has suffered one species of wrong from the act complained of. Broadly speaking, an election of remedies is the choice by a plaintiff to an action of one of two or more coexisting remedial rights, where several such rights arise out of the same facts, but the term has been generally limited to a choice by a party between inconsistent remedial rights, the assertion of one being necessarily repugnant to or a repudiation of the other." 20 C. J. p. 2.

The general rule is that the remedy first sought must be pursued to judgment. Many cases go to the extent of holding that, where a party has brought his action in pursuit of one remedy, he cannot, by dismissing it before judgment, be permitted to pursue another and different remedy, but that the commencement of the first is a conclusive election by which he is bound. Hines v. Ward, 121 Cal. 115, 120, 53 Pac. 427.

"The doctrine of election, as applied to a choice of remedies, which precludes a party from claiming repugnant rights, is but an extension of the general principles of equitable estoppel, and proceeds upon a like theory, that the inconsistent attitude of the party will put his adversary to some disadvantage." Hines v. Ward, supra."

Of course, under the well-settled principles of the doctrine of estoppel, the disadvantage here referred to must be a real injury, such as would, in contemplation of law, amount to a fraud upon the party invoking the estoppel. When it is of this character, the doctrine of election of remedies will be applied by the courts. Buckmaster v. Bertram, 186 Cal. 673, 678, 200 Pac. 610.

[1] The sole injury claimed to have been suffered by the appellant herein is that it was put to the expense of preparing to present to the San Francisco court its motion for change of venue. If this should be held such an injury as to give rise to an estoppel, the logical conclusion must be that the plaintiff by having filed and then dismissed his action in San Francisco should be barred thereby from thereafter prosecuting the same in any court.

"The rule has long been established that a judgment of dismissal given upon motion of the plaintiff, before the hearing or trial of any issue of law or fact and without any determination of the merits of the cause, is no bar to a subsequent suit in any court upon the same cause of action." Carr v. Howell, 154 Cal. 383, 97 Pac. 885.

[2, 3] It has been held that where one brings an action for the recovery of the purchase money paid upon the theory that the contract was rescinded and a judgment of nonsuit is rendered because no rescission of the contract had been proved, the plaintiff may afterwards bring an action for specific performance of the contract (McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 Pac. 460); also that the bringing of an action for rescission of a contract for exchange of properties in which a nonsuit is granted because of a failure to tender a deed to defendant before suit brought is not a bar to an action for damages for fraudulent representations. Herdan v. Hanson, 182 Cal. 538, 189 Pac. 440. Manifestly the defendant in each of the foregoing cases was put to vastly more expense and inconvenience than was the defendant herein.

The fallacy in appellant's position herein rests upon its assumption that the commencement of the actions in San Francisco county conferred upon the defendant an "absolute right, upon proper procedure presented to change the place of trial to its home county," which "right could not be taken from defendant by any change in election of remedies by plaintiff." It is true that upon the commencement of the actions in San Francisco county defendant had a right upon a proper showing, and in the absence of a sufficient countershowing, Sheffield v. Pickwick Stages (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 852, to a change of venue to its home county, but, in its essence, this was not a right to a transfer to its home county, but a right to be protected against being compelled to proceed to trial in a county other than one designated by law for the trial of such actions. Monterey county is a proper county for the commencement and the trial of these actions. Code Civ. Proc. § 395; Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 138 Pac. 355; Rains v. Diamond Match Co., 171 Cal. 326, 153 Pac. 239.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

CITY STREET IMPROVEMENT CO. v. QUIGLEY. (S. F. 9815.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹514(11)—Reassessment for street improvements irregularly levied held void.

Where a reassessment for a street improvement does not comply with the order of the board of supervisors, is not levied at the uniform rate per front foot, is not levied at the rate specified in the assessment itself, and is not levied for the amount of the work done with the expenses therefor, but only for a fraction thereof, it is void.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹459, 472—Assessment for more than 50 per cent. of assessed value of property, and not spread uniformly, held void.

Assessments for street improvements not restricted to 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the property, and not spread uniformly for the entire cost of the work, held void.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the City Street Improvement Company against Thomas D. Quigley to foreclose a street assessment lien. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Platt Kent, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an action to recover a street assessment for the improvement of Moraga avenue between Eighth and Ninth avenues. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant appeals. The assessment is a frontage assessment levied under the street improvement ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, No. 2685, new series, the provisions of which ordinance have been before this court in a number of recent cases. Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 Pac. 225; City Street Improvement Co. v. Pearson, 181 Cal. 640, 185 Pac. 962, 20 A. L. R.

1317; Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson, 186 Cal. 267, 199 Pac. 512; and Federal Construction Co. v. Newhouse, 186 Cal. 284, 199 Pac. 519. The street assessment first made under the provisions of this ordinance on March 24, 1916, exceeded half the assessed value of the defendant's lot as shown on the tax assessment roll for the previous year. Such assessment was expressly prohibited by the charter of the city and county of San Francisco (section 8 of chapter II of article VI and section 33 thereof), and by section 28 of the street improvement ordinance, as no provision was made in the proceedings for the payment of the assessment in installments as required by said section 33 of the charter.

In the absence of such provision we have held that the assessment is void (City Street Improvement Co. v. Pearson, supra; Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson, supra), and that no appeal need be taken from such an assessment by the property owner to the board of supervisors for the reason that the supervisors are powerless to correct the error.

Notwithstanding that fact, in the case at bar the board of supervisors, upon an appeal by the defendant, set aside the original assessment and ordered a second assessment "to cover the cost and expense of the street work described in the complaint." The amount of this second assessment upon the defendant's property is exactly one-half of the assessed value of his property as shown by the assessment roll of the preceding year, to wit, $200. In view of this situation, it is necessary to state additional facts. Only two lots front on the work, which was done on only one side of the street and for part of a block. One lot is 25 feet by 70 feet, fronting on Eighth avenue (the 70 feet fronting on the work on Moraga avenue), and the other, the lot of the defendant, fronting 25 feet on Moraga avenue. As a result only 95 feet of frontage is assessed for the improvement in question. The total cost and expense of the work, together with incidental expenses in connection with the improvement, is $994.50, giving the rate per front foot $10.468421. At this rate the lot with 70 feet frontage was assessed $732.79, and the defendant's lot of 25 feet frontage was assessed but $261.71 in the original assessment. By the new assessment dated May 31, 1917, made by the board of public works after the order of the board of supervisors on appeal, the amount of the assessment on the 70-foot lot was reduced to 50 per cent. of the assessed valuation of that lot, to wit, $260, and the assessment upon defendant's lot was reduced to 50 per cent. of the assessed valuation, to wit, $200, and thus the entire assessment was reduced to $460. It is true that by this method the board of public works has so adjusted the assessment that it does not violate the particular provisions of the street improvement act and of the charter prohibiting the assessment of any lot for certain improvements at more than 50 per cent. of its assessed value, but by so doing the board has violated the provisions of the ordinance with regard to the method of assessment in several particulars, a few of which need only be mentioned.

[1, 2] The assessment does not comply with the order of the board of supervisors. The assessment is not levied at a uniform rate per front foot. It is not levied at the rate specified in the assessment itself, which is the rate hereinabove stated. It is not levied for the amount of the work done with expenses therefor, but only for a fraction thereof. For these reasons the assessment is void, and, inasmuch as the supervisors could not levy an assessment which complied with the provisions of the law restricting the amount of the assessment to 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the lot and also with the provisions requiring that the assessment be spread uniformly for the entire cost of the work, the remedy by appeal is not availing, and the new assessment as well as the old was void.

Judgment reversed.

LEUSCHEN v. SMALL CLAIMS COURT OF HIGHLAND TP., SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY, et al. (L. A. 7670.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 7, 1923.)

Courts 🔑175—Small claims court held to have jurisdiction of actions ex delicto as well as ex contractu.

A small claims court, operating under Code Civ. Proc. § 927, as added by St. 1921, p. 117, with a justice of the peace presiding, has jurisdiction of actions ex delicto as well as ex contractu.

In Bank.

Application by F. R. Leuschen against the Small Claims Court of Highland Township, San Bernardino County, and another for a writ of prohibition to prevent the court from assuming jurisdiction of an action in tort. Writ denied.

David R. Faries and John R. Berryman, Jr., both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Chas. D. Pennock, in pro. per.

WILBUR, C. J. This is an original proceeding in prohibition to prevent the respondent from proceeding with the trial upon a claim of $30.10 damages due to alleged negligence of the petitioner. Section 927 of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted May 16, 1921 (Stats. 1921, p. 117), provided as follows:

> "All justices of the peace shall exercise the jurisdiction conferred by this title and while sitting in the exercise of said jurisdiction shall be known and referred to as the small claims court; provided, that the jurisdiction of such justices court, when sitting as a small claims court, shall be confined to cases for the recovery of money only where the amount claimed does not exceed fifty (50) dollars and the defendant named is a resident of the township or city and county in which the action is to be maintained."

It is claimed by the petitioner that the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace when sitting as a small claims court does not include claims for tort. It is clear that an action for tort is included in the phrase "cases for the recovery of money only," and unless there is something in the statute which limits or modifies this provision, it is clear that the respondent is authorized to proceed in the matter now pending before him, as a justice of the peace sitting as a small claims court. It is claimed that the affidavit filed by the party instituting the proceeding in the so-called small claims court indicates that it was not the intention of the Legislature to include in the jurisdiction of the small claims court actions for tort. This claim is based upon the formal affidavit by which the proceedings were instituted, which requires the claimant to make oath—

> "that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $——; that this affiant has demanded payment of said sum; that the defendant refused to pay the same and no part thereof has been paid."

Section 927h, added by St. 1921, p. 119, provides that:

> "No formal pleading, other than the said claim and notice, shall be necessary and the hearing and disposition of all such actions shall be informal, with the sole object of dispensing speedy justice between the parties."

By section 927g, added by St. 1921, p. 119, it is provided that the parties shall not be represented by any party other than themselves.

Assuming that the word "debt" applies only to claims arising ex contractu, it is argued that the form of affidavit is inapplicable to actions for tort. We think, however, that this is too narrow a view of the scope of the legislation. For some purposes it has been held that a judgment resulting from a tort is a debt. See Ex parte Prader, 6 Cal. 239, wherein it was held a violation of the Constitution of 1849 to imprison a defendant for the nonpayment of a judgment for an assault and battery. It is, we think, too narrow a view of the legislation and its purpose to hold that the use of the word "indebted" in informal and nontechnical affidavits filed to initiate the proceeding is a controlling factor in the determination of the jurisdiction.

The movement for small claims courts is not new. 3 Blackstone, p. 81. In 1605 the English Parliament passed an act "for the recovering of small debts, and for the relieving of poor debtors in London." This statute provided a summary method of collecting debts of less than 40 shillings, by "tradesman, victualler or labouring man." This act provided:

> "That if an action of debt, or action upon the case upon an assumpsit for the recovery of any debt, to be sued or prosecuted against any the person or persons aforesaid, in any of the King's courts at Westminster, or elsewhere, out of the said court of requests, it shall appear to the judge or judges of the court where such action shall be sued or prosecuted, that the debt to be recovered by the plaintiff in such action doth not amount to the sum of forty shillings, and the defendant in such action shall duly prove, either by sufficient testimony, or by his own oath, to be allowed by any the judge or judges of the said court where such action shall depend, that at the time of the commencing of such action such defendant was inhabiting and resiant in the city of London, or the liberties thereof, as above, that in such case the said judge or judges shall not allow to the said plaintiff any costs of suit, but shall award that the same plaintiff shall pay so much ordinary costs to the party defendant, as such defendant shall justly prove before the said judge or judges, it hath truly cost him in defence of the said suit." 3 Jac. 1, c. 15.

A similar statute was passed in 1741. 14 Geo. II, c. 10. This statute provided:

> "That from and after the twenty-fourth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and forty one, it shall and may be lawful to and for every citizen and freeman of city of London, and every other person and persons inhabiting, or that shall hereafter inhabit, within the said city or the liberties thereof; and all and every person or persons who do or shall rent or keep any shop, shed, stall or stand, or seek a livelihood in the said city or liberties thereof, which now have or hereafter shall have any debt or debts owing unto him, her or them, not exceeding the sum of forty shillings, by any person or persons whatsoever inhabiting or seeking a livelihood within the said city or liberties thereof, during their respective inhabiting within the said city or liberties thereof, or seeking a livelihood as aforesaid, to cause such debtor or debtors to be warned or summoned by any of the bedels, or officers of the said court of requests for the time being, by writing left at the dwelling house, lodgings, shop, shed, stall, or stand, or any other place of seeking a livelihood of such debtor or debtors, or by any other reasonable warning or notice to be given to the said debtor or debtors, to appear before the commissioners of the said court of requests, holden in the Guildhall of the said city, and that the said commissioners, or any three of them, or more, shall after such summons as aforesaid have power and authority by virtue of this act, from time to time to set down, or cause to be set down such order or orders, between such party or parties, plaintiff or plaintiffs, and his, her or their debtor or debtors, defendant or defendants, touching such debts not exceeding the said sum of forty shillings in question before them, as they shall find to stand with equity and good conscience, all such order or orders to be registered in a book as they have been accustomed to be; which order or orders so made as well the party plaintiff as the debtor or defendant shall observe, perform and keep in all points; any thing in any act contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding."

These acts undoubtedly applied only to actions ex contractu, but the present movement for small claims courts apparently originated in Chicago. Journal of American Judicature Society, vol. 2, p. 23. The plan there adopted was to transfer all the litigation in which $35 or less was claimed, to one justice of the municipal court, "on a special calendar to be heard in a separate branch to be known as the small claims branch." These small claims, of course, included claims ex delicto as well as ex contractu. Apparently it was the success of the Chicago court and of the small claims court in Portland, Or., that brought about the new legislation for such court in this state. An original draft of the bill is found in the transactions of the Commonwealth Club of California, vol. 15, No. 3, p. 165. Assemblyman Rosenshine, who introduced the bill in the state Legislature, discussed the subject on page 127 of the same publication. It appears from this discussion that the main purpose of the legislation was to provide a similar procedure for all litigation involving small claims, and no distinction is suggested between actions ex contractu and ex delicto.

The state of Massachusetts, in providing for the small claims court, authorized justices of the district courts, etc., to make rules providing for a simple, informal, and inexpensive procedure for the determination of claims in the nature of contracts or torts other than slander or libel in which the plaintiff does not claim as debt or damages more than $35. Stats. Massachusetts, 1920, p. 553. See, also, Gen. Laws of Massachusetts, 1921, vol. 2, c. 218, § 21, p. 2352.

The editor of the Journal of the American Judicature Society, in commenting upon the statute recently adopted in California (issue of June, 1921, vol. 5, p. 29), in summing up the California law, said:

> "It will amount, in operation, substantially to this: That a person having a claim less than fifty dollars will proceed under the Small Claims Act if he has confidence in the justice of the peace, otherwise he will follow the customary procedure and demand a jury."

We are satisfied that this summary is a correct construction of the act, and that the jurisdiction of the court included actions ex delicto as well as ex contractu.

In discussing a somewhat similar statute, the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in Flour City Fuel & Transfer Co. v. Young, 150 Minn. 452, 185 N. W. 934, said:

> "The theory from the standpoint of a small debtors' court is that litigation by the common-law method over small claims is wasteful, and fails to bring practical justice because of an expense out of proportion to the amounts involved, the time of the parties consumed in the litigation when they should be engaged otherwise, and the attendant delay in reaching a result. The legal profession notes the waste more clearly than laymen. It is recognized that to some extent defendants decline to pay, knowing that the smallness of the claim practically insures against compulsory payment. It is recognized that some persons having small claims submit to a denial of payment because they cannot incur the expense and await the termination of the ordinary trial. Under the act the expense is put upon the taxpayers of the city, and the trial is speeded. It is all over in a few days. The effort is to avoid contention and a prolonged controversy, and lawyers are excluded. While it is recognized that litigation without expense may encourage the assertion of doubtful or unfounded claims, or claims that might as well go unasserted, the thought of the statute is that on the whole justice is best subserved by a summary consideration of small controversies without expense to the parties. This is not the place to discuss the character and history and policy of such courts. We are interested in them here only as they affect the legal questions presented. A study of them is given under the title of Justice and the Poor in bulletin No. 13, Carnegie Foundation, 41–67. See, also, Renaud v. State Board, 124 Mich. 648, 83 N. W. 620, 51 L. R. A. 458, 83 Am. St Rep. 346; 26 Harv. Law Rev. 302, 310; 64 Pa. Law Rev. 356; bulletin No. 8, Am. Jud. Soc. In an article in 1 Minn. Law Rev. 107, written shortly prior to the passage of the Minneapolis Act, and in 2 Minn. Law Rev. 491, written shortly after, William R. Vance, then dean of the University Law School, writes of such courts, their purposes and working, and gives their historical background; and he mentions the constitutional question which now engages our attention."

In Olson's Oregon Laws, 1920, vol. 1, p. 900, § 948—33, providing for the organization of a department of the district court, to be known as the small claims department, it is provided that said courts "shall have jurisdiction, but not exclusive, in cases for the recovery of money only where the amount claimed does not exceed twenty dollars ($20)," etc. The section in regard to making the claims differs from that in California, for it provides for a statement in a brief and concise form of the nature and amount of said claim, etc. Section 948—37. The law of Kansas upon the subject (General Statutes of Kansas, 1915, § 3319) gives jurisdiction to the small debtors court of small debts and amounts not exceeding $20. In this court the plaintiff appears before the judge personally and states his case orally. Section 3321.

It is apparent that the Legislature of California intended to formulate a method of procedure for small claims of all kinds which would obviate the expense and delay due to ordinary methods of litigation and that this system was intended to operate for the rich and poor alike. We have freely referred to publications and reports with reference to small claims courts, not because they should influence us in interpreting doubtful provisions of the statute, but merely to show that their obvious construction agrees with the general purpose indicated by such publications and the statutes of other states growing out of the demand for more simple, less expensive, and more speedy decisions of cases involving small amounts.

GAVER v. EARLY et al. (S. F. 9716.)

1. Guardian and ward 🔑54—Interest allowable on funds misappropriated by guardian's attorney from date of each misappropriation.

Where the attorney of a guardian misappropriated funds of the estate, interest should be allowed on the various sums misappropriated from the date of each misappropriation.

2. Guardian and ward 🔑54—Where guardian's misappropriation of trust funds is willful, he is liable for legal interest compounded annually.

Where the misappropriation of trust funds is willful, instead of careless, and it is not shown that a larger sum was realized therefrom, the limit of the liability of the guardian is the return of the principal sum with legal interest thereon compounded annually.

3. Trusts 🔑103(1)—Guardian's attorney misappropriating funds held trustee of owner of estate for an accounting.

A voluntary relation of personal confidence and trust exists between a guardian and her attorney, and the attorney becomes a trustee for the owner of the estate under Civ. Code, § 2219, for the purpose of an accounting.

4. Guardian and ward 🔑54—Simple interest only will be charged guardian where misappropriation of funds not willful or intentional.

Where an attorney of a guardian has misappropriated funds, but the guardian has not been guilty of any willful or intentional wrongdoing, simple interest only will be charged to the guardian.

5. Trusts 🔑234—Trustee surrendering or limiting his control over funds which are lost is liable.

If a trustee enters into any arrangement in relation to trust funds which surrenders or limits his control over them, he becomes a guarantor of the fund, irrespective of his motive, or whether his surrender of control was the cause of the loss of the fund.

6. Guardian and ward 🔑37—Guardian delegating administration of trust to another is responsible for the action of such other.

When a guardian delegates the administration of the trust to another, he must be held responsible for the action of each person.

7. Guardian and ward 🔑65—Guardian confiding application of trust fund to attorney is responsible for its loss.

While a guardian may employ attorneys or agents to reduce the estate to possession and to protect it, if he confides the application of the trust fund to the care of an attorney or even a cotrustee, he will be held personally responsible for any loss that may result.

8. Guardian and ward 🔑54—Denial of interest compounded annually against guardian on sums misappropriated by her attorney held abuse of discretion.

Where a guardian confided the care of the trust funds to her attorney, who misappropriated the funds, and it appeared that the guardian failed to examine and inquire into the correctness of the accounts submitted by the attorney, and failed to supervise the management of the ward's property, it was an abuse of discretion for the trial court to deny to the owner of the estate interest compounded annually on the sums misappropriated.

Myers, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; A. B. Mackenzie, Judge.

Action by Andrew Poe Gaver against William H. Early and Lulu I. Steitz, executrix of the estate of Ellen Gaston, deceased, substituted in place of deceased defendant for an accounting. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Crook, of San Francisco, and W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa (R. C. Young, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, and F. A. Meyer, of Petaluma, for respondents.

WASTE, J. The appellant instituted the action out of which this appeal arose against his former guardian, the respondent Ellen Gaston, now deceased, and her attorney, the respondent William H. Early, for the recovery of certain moneys received by them during the administration of appellant's guardianship estate, which, he alleged, were fraudulently concealed and omitted from the accounts of his guardian, and never accounted for. The trial court found that the guardian abandoned all control over the guardianship matters to the attorney, who misappropriated a large part of the funds of the estate, and fraudulently converted them to his own use. Judgment was entered in favor of appellant and against the said respondents for $21,084.77, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the date of the judgment until paid. From this judgment both of the defendants appealed, and in each instance the judgment of the lower court was affirmed. Gaver v. Early (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 390; Gaver v. Early et al. (Cal. App.) 209 Pac. 394. Petitions for hearing in this court after decision in the District Court of Appeal were denied.

Plaintiff appealed from that portion of the judgment which allowed interest only from the date of its rendition until paid, which portion of the judgment was also affirmed by the District Court of Appeal. The petition of plaintiff to have the cause heard and determined by this court was granted, and the cause was transferred for hearing and decision. A full and complete statement of the facts of the case germane to the appeal will be found in the two decisions of the District Court of Appeal, above referred to. For this reason we do not recite them here.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the appellant that the trial court should have allowed him interest on the various sums which were misappropriated and used by respondent Early from the dates of such misappropriation. This contention must be upheld, and the only question to be determined is the rate of interest to be charged. The rule is now well established in this state that, where the misappropriation of trust funds is willful, instead of careless, and it is not shown that a larger sum was realized therefrom, the limit of the liability of the guardian is the return of the principal sum, with legal interest thereon compounded annually. Estate of Elizalde, 182 Cal. 427, 435, 188 Pac. 560; Estate of Piercy, 168 Cal. 755, 757, 145 Pac. 91; In re Guardianship of Hamilton, 139 Cal. 671, 73 Pac. 578.

[3] Respondent Early received the funds belonging to appellant's estate for and from the guardian knowing their character. A voluntary relation of personal confidence and trust existed between Mrs. Gaston and her attorney, and the latter became a trustee for the appellant, under the provisions of section 2219 of the Civil Code, for the purpose of an accounting. Aldrich v. Willis, 55 Cal. 81, 85; Montgomery v. Rauer, 125 Cal. 227, 230, 57 Pac. 894. His conversion of the funds was willful, but it is not shown what, if any, amount he realized by reason of his fraudulent misuse of the minor's estate. Consequently he should be charged with legal interest from the dates on which the money was converted to his own use, compounded with annual rests.

[4, 5] It is contended that a different rule holds in the case of the respondent Mrs. Gaston by reason of the findings of the trial court that she was not guilty of any willful or intentional wrongdoing in the matter. In such cases, and without other intervening circumstances, the general rule is that where the trustee has not been guilty of some positive misconduct or willful violation of duty, simple interest only will be charged. Wheeler v. Bolton, 92 Cal. 159, 172, 28 Pac. 558; Estate of Cousins, 111 Cal. 441, 452, 44 Pac. 182. Both of these cases recognize, also, that where the trustee has mingled money belonging to his trust with his own funds, and used them for his own advantage, courts have almost universally charged him with compound interest. On this appeal the question of the liability of Mrs. Gaston for the fraudulent acts of Early does not arise. Indeed, it could not, for it is well settled that, if a trustee enters into any arrangement in relation to trust funds which surrenders or limits his control over them, he becomes a guarantor of the fund, irrespective of his motive, or whether his surrender of control was the cause of the loss of the fund. In such case, in the event of loss, the court will not enter upon an inquiry whether the loss is due to such abdication of control. Estate of Wood, 159 Cal. 466, 472, 114 Pac. 992, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 252.

[6, 7] When a guardian delegates the administration of the solemn trust imposed by the guardianship to another, the guardian must be held responsible for the other's action in the premises. Hence the action of the guardian's chosen agent must be, as a general rule, imputed to the guardian in all matters relating to the administration of the guardianship trust. Rittenberry v. Wharton, 176 Ala. 390, 406, 58 South. 293. In collecting and assuming to take charge of the assets of the estate of the appellant, Mrs. Gaston in some instances seems to have received such assets and to have indorsed and delivered them to her attorney. In other instances the latter seems to have collected the assets himself. The trial court found that these sums were paid to and received by respondent Early as the attorney and agent of Mrs. Gaston, for and on account of the estate of the minor, while acting within the scope of his authority as such agent. Early thereby became the agent of Mrs. Gaston, to whom she attempted to delegate her duties as trustee. She had no right to shift her duty to him. If a trustee confide the application of a trust fund to the care of another, whether a stranger, or his own attorney or solicitor, or even cotrustee, he will be held personally responsible for any loss that may result. Under such circumstances a trustee may employ attorneys or agents, according to the usual course of business, to reduce the estate to possession and protect it; but when once in his hands his personal duty to dispose and manage it begins, and this duty is not to be delegated.

Abrams v. U. S. Fidelity & Guar. Co., 127 Wis. 579, 584, 106 N. W. 1091, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, 115 Am. St. Rep. 1055; Bermingham v. Wilcox, 120 Cal. 467, 472, 52 Pac. 822.

The question presented, therefore, is: Should the respondent Mrs. Gaston be charged with simple or with compound interest? Section 2239 of the Civil Code provides that a trustee is responsible for the wrongful acts of a cotrustee to which he consented or which, by his negligence, he enabled the latter to commit. In re Osborn, 87 Cal. 1, 6, 25 Pac. 157, 11 L. R. A. 264; Fox v. Tay, 89 Cal. 339, 348, 24 Pac. 855, 26 Pac. 897, 23 Am. St. Rep. 474.

Notwithstanding the effect of some of the findings which tend to relieve Mrs. Gaston of any intentional or willful wrongdoing in the matter of the administration of the estate, other findings are that she negligently, and without due regard for her duties as guardian, turned over and abandoned to the respondent Early the management and control of the possession of the moneys, securities, and properties of her ward, and failed and neglected to supervise the management of her ward's property. She also failed to examine and make any inquiry concerning the correctness of the several accounts proposed by Early, filed by her as such guardian, and presented to the court. Regarding Early either as agent for or cotrustee with Mrs. Gaston, his acts were imputable to her. He fraudulently misappropriated the funds of the estate to his own use, and, by imputation, his principal or cotrustee is liable for the amount misappropriated, with legal interest from the date of such misappropriations at the legal rate compounded annually.

[8] We think, therefore, it was an abuse of the discretion of the trial court to deny appellant interest compounded annually.

The cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the judgment in the particulars indicated, and, as so modified, it will stand affirmed.

We concur: WILBUR, C. J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

MYERS, J. I dissent from so much only of the judgment and of the opinion of Mr. Justice Waste as holds the estate of Mrs. Gaston liable for compound interest. Inasmuch as the trial court found that she was guilty of negligence merely, and not of any willful misconduct, I think that her estate should be charged only with simple interest. Civ. Code, § 2262, and section 1917 prior to its repeal in 1919 (Laws 1919, p. lxxxiii). I concur with the remainder of the opinion and the conclusions thereof.

WILSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. LAND CO.

(Civ. 2569.)

1. Principal and agent 🔑190(3)—Evidence justified finding that purchaser's agent was secretly vendor's agent also.

In action for rescission of a land sale contract, evidence held to justify finding that purchaser's agent for the purchase of the property was, without purchaser's knowledge, agent for vendor also.

2. Principal and agent 🔑70—That purchaser's agent secretly acted for vendor justified judgment of rescission and recovery of payments.

In a land sale contract, where, unknown to the purchaser, his agent secretly acted for vendor in the sale, such facts justified a judgment of rescission and recovery of the moneys paid by purchaser.

3. Evidence 🔑271(18)—Purchaser's memorandum admissible to show agency of another in purchase of property.

In action to rescind a land sale contract and recover moneys paid thereon, because of agent acting in double capacity, evidence of a memorandum made by purchaser at the time of the transaction was admissible as tending to show that another acted for him in negotiating the purchase.

4. Principal and agent 🔑70—Where agent without principal's assent acts in double capacity, transaction voidable at principal's election.

Where an agent without assent of his principal has acted in a double capacity, no question of fairness or unfairness can be raised, but the transaction will be held constructively fraudulent and voidable at principal's election.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Fannie L. Wilson, as executrix of the estate of Charles S. Wilson, deceased, substituted in the place of said Charles S. Wilson, against the Southern Pacific Land Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Thunen, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Young & Young, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

C. E. Spencer and H. L. McNair, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This appeal is from the judgment rendered at the second trial of the action. At the first trial the court granted defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The judgment was reversed on appeal. 46 Cal. App. 738, 189 Pac. 1040. In the opinion of the appellate court, the issues and the law applicable thereto are stated. Appellant's principal contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and it is sufficient herein to examine the evidence produced at the second trial.

[1] Plaintiff testified that H. C. Farnum purchased the lands in controversy for plaintiff in January, 1914; that plaintiff did not view the lands or make any investigation thereof but relied on Farnum's representations; that he did not know prior to the purchase that Farnum was the agent of defendant to sell the lands. He further testified:

> "At the time the applications were signed in my behalf for the purchase of these properties, there had been a conversation between me and Mr. Farnum as to my giving him an interest in the profits if the land was sold. When I made up my mind to purchase the property I fixed up that memorandum for Mr. Farnum, which is Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 5, bearing date February 2, 1914. I wrote the memorandum in pencil first. Later it was copied and I put down the date."

The memorandum referred to by the witness reads as follows:

> "Memorandum of Charles S. Wilson regarding the following described land: The east half of section 25, 4 south, 5 east, S. B. M., Riverside county, Cal. The above-described land was acquired through H. C. Farnum as my agent, and he is to have one-fourth of the profits which may be realized on sale thereof, after deducting all moneys paid or expended thereon by me, and interest at 10 per cent. per annum, provided said land can be sold at a profit on or before one year from date of contract of sale, and Farnum can have a one-fourth interest in the land by paying one-fourth of all money expended, with 10 per cent. interest on same within same time.
> "Charles S. Wilson, February 2, 1914."

Plaintiff testified that he did not inspect the land until in April, 1916; that he first learned that Farnum had acted as agent of defendant in the sale of the land and had received a commission for the sale in February, 1917, and that he immediately offered to reconvey the property to defendant and demanded the return of the moneys paid by him on the purchase price thereof.

H. R. Burns was defendant's agent for the sale of its lands. Prior to the sale to plaintiff, Burns, had agreed to pay Farnum a commission on any sales made by the latter and did pay him a commission on the sale made to plaintiff. Farnum's testimony, given at the former trial, was read in evidence. He there testified that he bought the land for plaintiff; that he told Burns, at the time of the purchase, that he was acting as the agent of plaintiff and doing business for him; that he signed plaintiff's name to the application to purchase the land; and that Burns said:

> "You are his agent; it is perfectly proper for you to sign them."

Farnum further testified:

> "We didn't say anything to Mr. Wilson about the commission, and Mr. Burns suggested that I shouldn't."

[2] The foregoing evidence justifies the finding that Farnum, with defendant's knowledge, acted as plaintiff's agent in the purchase of the property, and, without plaintiff's knowledge, also acted as defendant's agent in the sale of the property. Under such circumstances the judgment of rescission and for recovery of the moneys paid by plaintiff was proper.

[3] The admission in evidence of the memorandum quoted, Plaintiff's exhibit No. 5, is assigned as error. The instrument was clearly admissible as tending to show that Farnum was plaintiff's agent. Other errors in the admission and rejection of evidence relating to the value of the land and similar questions are assigned. The value of the land and the fairness of the transaction are not issues necessary to be determined in a case of this character.

[4] As stated in the opinion on the former appeal, where the agent, without the assent of his principal, has acted in a double capacity, no question of fairness or unfairness can be raised, but the transaction will be held constructively fraudulent and voidable at the election of the principal. The admission or rejection of such evidence, therefore, could not have changed the result. There are 56 assignments of alleged errors. It is not necessary to consider them all specifically. None of them could have prejudiced defendant's rights.

It is not necessary to determine whether want of knowledge by defendant of Farnum's double agency would be a defense. The evidence shows that defendant had such knowledge.

The judgment is affirmed.

KLARQUIST v. SECURITY TRUST & SAVINGS BANK. (Civ. 4154.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 30, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷629—To warrant relief from default in failure to file transcript within court rule No. 2, burden on appellant to show good reason.

Where an appellant is shown not to have complied with Court Rule No. 2 (176 Pac. vii), regarding the filing of transcripts on appeal, the burden is upon him to show good reason for his failure in order to warrant relief from his default.

2. Appeal and error ⚷628(3)—Relief from default in failure to file transcript held unwarranted.

A showing, as grounds for relief after default by failure to file transcript on appeal, that respondent's counsel had stated, while discussing a possible settlement, that appellant "need not be in any rush to file a transcript," held not equivalent to a stipulation for an extension of time such as would warrant relief from the default.

3. Appeal and error ⚷628(1)—Unusual pressure of other work not legal excuse for failure to file transcript within required time.

The fact that counsel for appellant was under "an unusual pressure of work" during the period immediately preceding the time when the transcript should have been filed is not a legal excuse warranting relief after failure to file within the required time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by W. E. Klarquist against the Security Trust & Savings Bank. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion granted.

Page & Hurt and Arthur F. Coe, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. G. Redwine, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HOUSER, J. This matter involves, first, a motion by respondent to dismiss an appeal, and, secondly, a motion by appellant that it be relieved from its default in failing to file its transcript on appeal within the time permitted under the rules of this court. A lapse of 66 days occurred between the settling and filing of the bill of exceptions in the superior court and the date of the notice to dismiss the appeal, and the transcript on appeal was not offered for filing until 2 weeks later.

An affidavit by counsel for appellant in opposition to the motion to dismiss the appeal, as well as in support of its motion to be relieved from its default in not having filed the transcript within the 40-day period permitted under rule 2 of this court (176 Pac. vii), shows that—

> "Both prior and subsequent to the 18th day of December, 1922, affiant had conversations with Mr. Redwine, attorney for the respondent, the substance of which was that Mr. Redwine wanted to know if the case could not be settled, if the bank would not consider a compromise, etc., to which affiant replied that he wished to look more thoroughly into the law on the question and would like to have a little more time to look into the matter, to which Mr. Redwine answered that that would be all right and that affiant need not be in any rush to file the transcript, or words to that effect."

The affidavit also shows that counsel for appellant had been under "an unusual pressure of other work" during the period immediately preceding the time when the transcript should have been filed.

Counsel for respondent in his answering affidavit vigorously denies ever having had any such conversation or conversations either in substance or effect.

[1-3] Respondent having shown that appellant has not complied with the rule of this court in the matter of filing its transcript on appeal, the burden rests upon appellant to show good reason for its failure in order that it should be relieved from its default. Assuming that counsel for appellant is correct in his recollection of what occurred, the fact that there was a possible compromise of the judgment discussed, and that counsel for respondent stated that "affiant need not be in any rush to file the transcript," is not equivalent to a stipulation for an extension of time to do so; although this court does not wish to be understood that by either words or by acts may one counsel lull the other into a sense of security and thus take an unfair advantage. So far as this court is aware, there is no way by which it may be determined which counsel is correct; but, at most, the alleged conversation goes no further than a general statement that there was no great hurry to get the transcript filed, and the fact that counsel was under "an unusual pressure of other work" is, of course, no legal excuse.

As is said in Erving v. Napa Valley Brewing Co., 16 Cal. App. 43, 116 Pac. 332:

> "To accept this as a legal justification for the failure to comply with a rule of court designed to expedite and facilitate the disposition of causes upon their merits would be to discourage diligence in the prosecution of appeals and establish a precedent that might lead to vexatious delays in the future."

In order that rules may have some force it is necessary that a compliance therewith be insisted upon. POE v. DONLEY. (Civ. 3841.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 3, 1923.)

Exceptions, bill of ⟹50—Party failing to present proposed bill and amendments to judge within 10 days after service of latter on him cannot settle bill thereafter.

A party failing to present to the trial judge his proposed bill of exceptions and proposed amendments thereto within 10 days after service of the latter on him, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, cannot have the bill settled thereafter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by S. R. Poe against G. W. Donley. From an order refusing to vacate an order dismissing a proposed bill of exceptions, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. Seymour, of El Centro, for appellant.
C. L. Brown, of El Centro, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. This is an appeal from an order of the superior court of the county of Imperial refusing to vacate a previous order of the same court dismissing defendant's proposed bill of exceptions. The bill of exceptions was prepared by the defendant, served upon plaintiff, and filed and presented to the judge on the 20th day of October, 1919.

Defendant, appellant herein, claims that no amendment or amendments to this proposed bill of exceptions were ever served upon him by plaintiff, and that therefore he had performed all the acts required of him by law for the settlement of his bill of exceptions. He insists that it was the duty of the court to proceed with the settlement of the bill without any further action on his part, and that the court had no authority to dismiss the same. Plaintiff, on the other hand, claims that, by stipulations given to him by defendant, his time within which to prepare amendments to defendant's proposed bill of exceptions had been extended to January 10, 1920, and that within said time certain proposed amendments were prepared by him and served upon the defendant, and that no action to have said bill of exceptions settled by the court was thereafter taken by defendant. On October 14, 1921, over 21 months after the serving of said amendments upon defendant, plaintiff filed his motion to have the bill of exceptions dismissed. At the time the court made the order appealed from it had before it the affidavits of the parties, setting forth their respective claims as hereinbefore set out.

It is evident from the ruling of the court that it found that plaintiff had served upon the defendant amendments to the proposed bill of exceptions, and that defendant had never presented to the court for settlement the proposed bill and amendments thereto. Upon this condition of the record the court ruled that the defendant had no right to have his bill of exceptions settled and dismissed the same. We think the court was right in its ruling. Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the party seeking the settlement of the bill of exceptions must, within 10 days after the proposed amendments are served upon him, present to the judge who tried the case the proposed bill of exceptions and the proposed amendments thereto. No attempt was made by the defendant to comply with this section of the Code. A compliance therewith is essential to the right of a party to have his bill of exceptions settled, and if he fails to comply his right is gone. Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 376, 81 Pac. 1112.

The order is affirmed.

MAIER et al. v. LUCE, Judge et al. (Civ. 4157.)

1. Injunction ⟹148(1)—Bond properly required as condition precedent to restraining order.

When a complaint was filed seeking to restrain defendants from operating taxicab company under certain name and using certain style of cabs, court as condition precedent to issuing restraining order properly required bond from petitioners under Code Civ. Proc. § 529.

2. Injunction ⟹235—Bond issued on application for temporary restraining order held to apply only thereto, though stating it was issued for injunction.

Where, on filing of complaint for injunction, the court issued a temporary restraining order on which it required plaintiffs to give an undertaking, such bond related only to the restraining order, though it recited that plaintiffs had applied for an injunction and that it was given in consideration of the issuing of said injunction, and such bond expired with the restraining order and could not bind the sureties until the final disposition of the case.

3. Injunction 🔑219—Contempt of court must rest on proceedings of record and not oral announcement by the judge.

Under Code of Civ. Proc. §§ 1209–1212, contempt of court is a specific criminal offense, and the defendant in injunction could not be held guilty of such offense by violating an order having no support in the record, but resting solely on an oral announcement by the judge.

4. Contempt 🔑23—Order nunc pro tunc cannot be made basis for contempt proceeding.

An order made nunc pro tunc, including therein requirements different from those expressed in existing court records, cannot be made the basis of a contempt proceeding until after such changes in the order have been brought to the personal attention of the person thereby affected.

5. Injunction 🔑148(1) — Bond prerequisite whether or not order made on ex parte application.

In those cases in which the court must require written undertaking on the part of applicant to indemnify party enjoined by reason of wrongful issuance of the injunction, such undertaking is a prerequisite to the order, and it is immaterial whether the restraining order be made on ex parte application or on an order to show cause previously made.

6. Contempt 🔑21—May not be based on void order.

One may not be punished for contempt because of disobedience of a void order.

Application by William Maier and another for a writ of prohibition against E. A. Luce, as Judge of the Superior Court, and another, to prevent contempt proceedings against petitioner. Writ granted.

A. Rosenthal, of San Diego, for petitioners.

George H. Stone and Wright & McKee, all of San Diego, for respondents.

HOUSER, J. In this matter petitioners seek to prohibit the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of San Diego, and E. A. Luce, as judge thereof, from proceeding with the punishment of one of the petitioners, under an order to show cause why he should not be punished for a contempt of said court.

In a suit pending in said court, an injunction was sought enjoining and restraining defendants, who are the petitioners herein, from operating under the name of "San Diego Cab Company," as well as from using in their business taxicabs known as "yellow cabs." On the filing of the complaint, the court issued an order to show cause why the defendants should not be so enjoined, and at the same time issued a temporary restraining order, on which the court required the plaintiffs to give, and they did give, an undertaking in the usual form, excepting that instead of reciting that the plaintiffs therein had applied, or were about to apply for a restraining order, the bond recited that plaintiffs had applied for an injunction, and the undertaking provided that the sureties therein, "in consideration of the premises and of the issuing of said injunction, do jointly and severally undertake in the sum of $500, and promise to the effect that they will pay to the parties enjoined such damages, not exceeding the sum of $500, as such parties may sustain by reason of said injunction, if the said superior court finally decides that plaintiff was not entitled thereto." On the hearing of the order to show cause therein, the court held that defendants had no right pending the hearing of the case to use cabs painted a yellow color. The cause was thereupon set for hearing two days later. No new bond was required by the court, nor was one ever given upon the temporary injunction, and on the subsequent hearing of the cause the court granted a motion for nonsuit. Thereafter a motion for new trial was made on behalf of plaintiffs, and because of the fact that between the date of the granting of the motion for nonsuit, and the time of filing the motion for new trial, counsel, who was related to the judge before whom the action previously had been heard, had been substituted as attorney for plaintiffs, the cause was transferred to another department of the superior court of said county presided over by Honorable E. A. Luce. The motion for new trial was granted, and the court included within the order therefor a provision that "the said temporary injunction is hereby continued in full force and effect pending the further order of this court." Thereafter, on a showing made by plaintiffs in that action, defendants were ordered to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court because of their alleged violation of the terms of said temporary injunction. On the hearing of said order to show cause, it appearing that through inadvertence and mistake in preparing the written minutes of the court covering the order for the temporary injunction, the full, true, and correct order of the court was not entered in the minutes of the court, the judge who had issued the temporary injunction made and entered a nunc pro tunc order correcting said minutes so that such minutes as corrected showed that in addition to restraining the defendants from the use of yellow cabs and taxicabs, the bond in the penal sum of $500 given upon the temporary restraining order which had theretofore been approved by the court, was ordered continued in full force and effect as a bond upon the temporary injunction. The court found that defendant William Maier had violated the terms of the temporary injunction, and consequently that he was guilty of a contempt of the court; and it was ordered that because of said contempt of court the said William Maier be punished by a fine of $200, and that in default of payment thereof he be confined in the county jail for a period of five days.

[1, 2] The only point relied upon by counsel for petitioners is that the court was without jurisdiction to issue a temporary injunction before a new bond had been given by plaintiffs. When the complaint was filed in which petitioners here were made defendants therein, the court, as a condition precedent to the issuing of a restraining order, properly required from plaintiffs an undertaking indemnifying defendants from any damage which they might sustain by reason of such restraining order if it should be finally decided by the court that plaintiffs were not entitled thereto. Section 529, Code Civ. Proc.; Neumann v. Moretti, 146 Cal. 31, 79 Pac. 512; San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co., 101 Cal. 216, 35 Pac. 651; McCracken v. Harris, 54 Cal. 81. Although that undertaking refers to an "injunction," it will be presumed that all persons connected with its issuance were aware of the law requiring that a bond be given before the restraining order could issue. The fact that an undertaking was given at that time would indicate that the "injunction" referred to therein was the restraining order which was then signed by the judge of the court. The restraining order directs defendants to refrain from the commission of particular acts, and it constituted an injunction as thoroughly and effectively as would any other order given by the court directed to defendants. The fact that it is denominated a restraining order in no wise affects the nature of the command. Neumann v. Moretti, 146 Cal. 32, 79 Pac. 512.

The restraining order in this case forbade the commission of certain acts until the further order of the court, but the almost universal trend of authorities, including the early case of Hicks v. Michael, 15 Cal. 107, is to the effect that its force was expended on the hearing of the order to show cause. In the case just cited the order restrained defendants "until the hearing of the whole matter," but the court, by Field, C. J., said that such words did not operate to change it into an injunction pending the suit, and that the restraining order expired by its own limitation, which was only until the propriety of granting the temporary injunction could be determined on the hearing of the order to show cause; and to the same effect see Cohen v. Gray, 70 Cal. 86, 11 Pac. 508; San Diego Water Co. v. Pacific Coast Steamship Co., and Neumann v. Moretti, supra. The ruling in the foregoing cases effectually disposes of respondents' contention to the effect that the bond, taken in connection with the restraining order, bound the sureties until the final disposition of the case. Sureties have a right to stand on the letter of their bond. Carter v. Mulrein, 82 Cal. 169, 22 Pac. 1086, 16 Am. St. Rep. 99, citing cases. The sureties on the bond in question here only obligated themselves with reference to the restraining order, and the judge was powerless to extend their liability beyond the precise terms of their contract.

[3, 4] It will be remembered that at the time the order to show cause why defendants should not be punished for contempt of court was issued, neither by the court's minute order, nor by written order of any sort, was either the original restraining order or the undertaking given as the basis for its issuance, kept or attempted to be kept in force—the nunc pro tunc order to that effect not being signed by the judge who heard the order to show cause in the matter of the temporary injunction until a period of two months had elapsed after the hearing thereon, and being after the time when defendants were ordered to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court. Contempt of court is a specific criminal offense, made such by the provisions of sections 1209-1212 of the Code of Civil Procedure (Ex parte Gould, 99 Cal. 360, 33 Pac. 1112, 21 L. R. A. 751, 37 Am. St. Rep. 57; Cosby v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 52, 42 Pac. 460; McClatchy v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 419, 51 Pac. 696, 39 L. R. A. 691; Reymert v. Smith, 5 Cal. App. 380, 90 Pac. 470); and one may not be held guilty of such an offense by reason of his violation of an order of court having no tangible existence of record, but resting solely in a mere oral announcement by the judge. Interested parties have a right to stand upon the permanent written record of such orders. An order made nunc pro tunc, including therein requirements different from those expressed in existing court records, cannot be made the basis of a contempt proceeding until after such changes in the order have been brought to the personal attention of the person thereby affected. Cosby v. Superior Court, 110 Cal. 52, 42 Pac. 460.

[5] As has been heretofore stated herein, on granting an injunction, excepting in certain enumerated instances, the court must require a written undertaking, on the part of the applicant, indemnifying the party enjoined for any damage which he may sustain by reason of the wrongful issuance of the injunction. Such undertaking is prerequisite to the order. In other words, any injunctional order issued in the absence of such undertaking is inoperative (Elliott v. Osborne, 1 Cal. 396), and it is immaterial whether the restraining order be made on an ex parte application or upon an order to show cause previously made. McCracken v. Harris, 54 Cal. 83. And see Neumann v. Moretti, supra.

In the case of State v. La Follette, 100 Or. 1, 196 Pac. 412 (1921), which was a contempt proceeding, it is said that while there are some decisions to the contrary, although the court acquired jurisdiction over the suit, no jurisdiction was thereby acquired to allow a preliminary injunction without requiring the filing of a bond; that the failure on the part of the applicant to give an undertaking rendered the injunction absolutely void; and that respondent could not be punished as for contempt of court because of the violation by him of the provisions of the injunction. In MacWatters v. Stockslager, 29 Idaho, 803, 162 Pac. 671 (1917), it is held that an injunction was void and inoperative by reason of the failure of the district judge to exact an undertaking; that its violation did not constitute contempt of court; and that the respondent was without jurisdiction to adjudge the violator guilty and to punish him. State v. Williams, 221 Mo. 227, 120 S. W. 740 (1909), is authority to the effect that a statute exacting a bond as a condition precedent to the granting of an injunction goes to the very jurisdiction of the court, and that the issuing of an injunction without requiring the bond would be in excess of jurisdiction. And the court in State v. McQuillin, 260 Mo. 164, 168 S. W. 924 (1914), holds that an injunction issued without bond is inoperative, and disobedience to its commands is not a contempt. Baker v. Meisch, 29 Neb. 227, 45 N. W. 685 (1890), contains the declaration that unless an undertaking be given a party enjoined is not liable for contempt for disregarding the injunction.

In Ex parte Miller, 129 Ala. 130, 30 South. 611, 87 Am. St. Rep. 49, it is held that an injunction is conditional in its nature, and that there can be no injunction and consequently no contempt for its violation until the bond has been given. And see, also, the following cases: Castleman v. State, 94 Miss. 609, 47 South. 647; Baur v. Wilkes-Barre L. Co., 259 Pa. 117, 102 Atl. 430; Boykin v. Patterson (Tex. Civ. App.) 214 S. W. 611; Griffith v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 210 S. W. 293; McHenry v. State, 91 Miss. 562, 44 South. 831, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; Smith v. People, 2 Colo. App. 99, 29 Pac. 924; Diehl v. Friester, 37 Ohio St. 473; Lawton v. Richardson, 115 Mich. 12, 72 N. W. 988; Western Academy Beaux Arts v. De Bit, 101 Wash. 42, 171 Pac. 1036; Swope v. Seattle, 35 Wash. 69, 76 Pac. 517; 1 Spelling on Injunctions (2d Ed.) § 935; Winslow v. Nayson, 113 Mass. 411; Conley v. Brewer, 85 W. Va. 725, 102 S. E. 607.

A Nebraska case entitled State v. Greene, decided in 1896 and reported in 48 Neb. 327, 67 N. W. 162, is in point. In that case, as here, a judge ordered that the bond given on issuing the restraining order be allowed to stand in place of a new bond which should have been given when the injunction was issued. In passing upon that matter, the court said:

"Although by the order allowed by Judge Sinclair the bond given under the restraining order was ordered to stand in the place of a new one, such bond did not and could not have the effect to give any validity to his order. Not only is there no statute which authorizes a court or judge to make an order dispensing with the giving of a bond in granting a temporary injunction in such a case, or to require that a former bond shall stand, but, if the requirements of the Legislature mean anything, or are to be observed and enforced, a new bond should have been required of and given by the relator, to make the injunction effectual."

[6] No one may be punished for contempt because of his disobedience of a void order. Brown v. Moore, 61 Cal. 432; Ex parte Brown, 97 Cal. 83, 31 Pac. 840; Ex parte Clarke, 126 Cal. 240, 58 Pac. 546, 46 L. R. A. 835, 77 Am. St. Rep. 176.

The weight of authority leads this court to the conclusion that not only was the nunc pro tunc order ineffectual as against petitioners, but that the failure of the court to require a new bond on the order for a temporary injunction rendered the temporary injunction inoperative. The attempt by the court on granting the motion for new trial to revive the order for temporary injunction was likewise ineffectual. It follows that the petitioners' prayer for relief should be granted.

It is ordered that the alternative writ heretofore issued herein be and is hereby made permanent.

RICE LANDS & PRODUCTS CO. v. BLEVINS et al. (Civ. 2588.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 28, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 24, 1923.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟹18(3)—Time of essence of option to purchase within specified time, though not expressly made so.

Time is of the essence of an option to purchase within a specified time without being expressly made so by the contract, and the option must be exercised within the time limit.

2. Brokers ⟹50—Cannot recover compensation for sale made by owner after expiration of broker's contract.

Where an agent for the sale of land fails to negotiate a sale within the time specified by his principal, he is not entitled to a commission for his efforts to sell the property, though he called it to the attention of a buyer who subsequently purchased from the owner, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner.

3. Brokers ⟹43(2)—Time limit for sale of land cannot be extended by parol.

Under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, a written agreement limiting the time within which a broker may negotiate a sale of land cannot be extended by oral agreement.

4. Brokers ⟹50—Optionee to whom owner agreed to pay commission on sale of property to another held not entitled to commission for sale after expiration of option.

Under a contract to pay a commission for selling property, to purchase which promisee had been given a written 60-day option, referred to in the commission contract, promisee could not recover a commission for selling the property after expiration of the option.

5. Brokers ⟹39—Owners' agreement to sell on terms to which they were not obligated sufficient consideration for broker's agreement to waive commissions.

An agreement to sell property on terms, to which the sellers had not obligated themselves, is a sufficient consideration for a broker's agreement to waive his right to commissions.

6. Evidence ⟹151(1)—Seller's reasons for entering credits to plaintiff in form of commissions held admissible.

Testimony by parties selling property to a corporation formed by individuals, to whom they had given options to purchase and agreed to allow commissions for selling it to another as to their reasons for entering certain credits in their books in the form of commissions, held admissible, in an action for commissions, which they claimed were waived, as tending to rebut the inference that they recognized their obligation to pay them.

7. Appeal and error ⟹1050(1)—Improper admission of details of conversation not substantially different from admissible testimony as to reasons for acts therein agreed on held not reversible error.

Admission of the details of a conversation wherein parties selling property to a corporation organized by individuals, to whom they had given options to purchase it and agreed to pay commissions for selling it to another, agreed to reimburse one of such optionees for services rendered and money expended in furthering the enterprise by giving credits in the form of commissions as being more convenient than to make a single payment, held not ground for reversal, though erroneous, not being substantially different from their admissible testimony as to the reasons for their acts, nor likely to have influenced the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by the Rice Lands & Products Company against R. E. Blevins and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Nusbaumer & Bingaman and Gilbert L. Jones, all of Oakland, for appellant.

Frank Freeman, of Willows, and Brown & Albery, of Colusa, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. May 17, 1915, defendants gave C. F. Adams a written option to purchase 2,988 acres of land, the greater part of which was in rice, together with water rights, pumping and equipment, and rights of way. It appears that defendants owned a half section of the land and held the remainder under lease with agreement to purchase. They had in turn leased parts of the lands to tenant rice growers. The option provided:

> "We will convey to you clear title to all the above land, and transfer all rights, privileges, leases, etc., relating to the entire project for the net sum of $80.00 per acre, to be paid for the 2,988 acres above described.
> "Terms: $35,000 cash and the balance in six annual equal payments. The deferred payments to bear 6 per cent. interest, or upon payment of $5,000 we will agree to give possession of property on December 1, 1915. The further sum of $30,000 is to be paid on December 1, 1915, and the remainder in six equal payments with interest. The above option to purchase is not exclusive and is good for acceptance within 60 days, unless property is sold within this period to other parties."

On the same day, by a separate writing, defendants gave Adams their promise to pay him a commission in the event of a sale, reading as follows:

> "Referring to the option of May 17th for purchase of the property of the Blevins-Mallon rice project, should you be able to procure a purchaser for the above property, we will allow you a sale commission of 10 per cent. This commission will be paid to you as the payments are received from the purchaser."

Defendants also gave George F. Scott and J. F. Campbell an option to purchase the same property, and on June 7, 1915, they paid the defendants $1,000 on account thereof. Within a few days thereafter Adams, Scott, and Campbell agreed to act together in the sale of the property under the Adams option, and the Scott-Campbell option was allowed to lapse.

In the latter part of June Adams, Scott, and Campbell proceeded to organize the plaintiff corporation for the purpose of purchasing the property under the option. The articles of incorporation were filed with the secretary of state on the 31st day of July, 1915. July 17th the sum of $1,000 was paid on the option, and the defendants executed the following instrument:

> "Received from C. F. Adams $1,000.00 on account as per contract of May 17, 1915. Said contract is hereby extended to August 1, 1915."

Defendants credited the payment in their ledger account with "Scott, Campbell & Adams." The payment does not appear in their journal. Other payments, including that made by Scott and Campbell on June 7th, were entered in the journal as follows:

> "June 7 Scott, Campbell & Adams 1,000 * * * on option acct. * * * Aug. 17 Scott, Campbell & Adams 1,000 * * * on contract. Aug. 25 Scott, Campbell & Adams 1,000 * * * on contract. * * * Sept. 15 Scott, Campbell & Adams 1,500 * * * on a/c. * * * Oct. 8 Scott, Campbell & Adams 1,000 * * * on contract."

October 11, 1915, the parties entered into two agreements by the terms of which the defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiff to purchase the property described in the option of May 17th. The total purchase price under the two agreements of October 11th is the same as that stated in the option contract, but the latter contract is not referred to in either of the former. One of the contracts of October 11th recites that $5,945 had theretofore been paid by plaintiff, and the evidence shows that this sum was made up of the payments heretofore enumerated and an additional sum due Adams from defendants. This contract provides for installment payments as follows: October 12, 1915, $5,000; October 20, $5,000: November 9, $10,000; December 1, $14,500; February 1, 1916, $5,000; payment of defendants' promissory note to a third person, $5,000; and four annual installments of $15,488.75 each, the first thereof to be paid December 1, 1916. By the other agreement the defendants sold all their rights and interests in the remainder of the lands and property described in the option contract for the sum of $20,000, payable in four equal annual installments commencing December 1, 1916, the plaintiff to take such property subject to all the terms and conditions of the lease under which it was held by defendants and to discharge all defendants' obligations under the lease. The lands described in both agreements were taken subject to various leases made by defendants to their tenants. The plaintiff was given immediate possession and all of defendants' interest in the growing crops, and was required to reimburse defendants for certain expenditures made by them in cultivating a part of the land and to pay all power bills from July 23, 1915, and for pump and ditch attendance from August 1st. Plaintiff has performed all the terms of both agreements.

December 4, 1916, Scott, Campbell, and Adams assigned to plaintiff their claim for commissions under the contract of May 17, 1915, and plaintiff duly notified defendants of such assignment. The defendants gave credit, at the rate of 10 per cent. on installment payments, until the sum of $5,904.37 had been so credited, after which they refused to allow or pay any further sum. After payment of the full purchase price plaintiff instituted this action to recover the remainder alleged to be due as commissions.

The complaint alleges the execution of the contracts of May 17, 1915, the sale of the property in pursuance thereof, and "within due time," and the assignment to plaintiff of Adams' claim for commissions. The answer denies that Adams sold the property in accordance with the terms of the contract, or "within due time," and alleges that plaintiff, after the option "had been abrogated and annulled and had expired by lapse of time," purchased the property "on entirely different terms of payment." As a separate defense, the answer alleges:

> That "said written option lapsed and became null and void, because the same was not exercised within the time provided therein, or as provided in any written extension thereof, and that thereafter these defendants made a verbal agreement with the said C. F. Adams in reference to the sale of said property, and that said verbal agreement was fully carried out and consummated on the 11th day of October, 1915; * * * that, * * * in consideration of these defendants giving credit to the said C. F. Adams and the plaintiff herein for sums theretofore paid under the terms of said written option, the said C. F. Adams waived, released, and renounced any right or claim that he might have had or did have to any commissions from these defendants on account of the sale of said real property and said rice project."

The jury returned a verdict in favor of defendants, and judgment was entered accordingly. The court denied plaintiff's motion for a new trial, and this appeal is from the judgment.

It is evident that the commission contract is not complete in itself. It expressly refers to the option contract, and the latter must be looked to for the purpose of ascertaining the terms of the sale referred to in the former. Appellant says:

> "It is manifest that the reference is thus made for the twofold purpose of describing the properties subject to sale, and of setting forth the terms of payment. To say that the right to secure and present a purchaser was limited to 60 days is to write into the contract a term which the vendors might have prescribed, but did not."

It is not apparent, however, why the reference should be held to embrace some of the terms of the option contract to the exclusion of other terms. Both instruments were executed at the same time, and evidently as a part of the same transaction, and they must be construed together as one contract. The plaintiff sets up the option contract as the contract of employment to make the sale. It is alleged:

> "That on the 17th day of May, 1915, the defendant in writing did employ one C. F. Adams to sell a certain rice project and certain real property, * * * all situated in the county of Colusa, and described in said writing as follows."

Following this allegation, the option contract is set forth at length, except the last two clauses thereof. It is then alleged that defendants agreed to pay a commission of 10 per cent "in case a sale of said property was made in accordance with the said writing."

On July 17th defendants, in writing, extended the term of the option to August 1st. There is no pretense that Adams succeeded in selling the property prior to October 11, 1915. Plaintiff never became obligated to take the property before that time, nor is there any evidence that plaintiff was financially able to pay the purchase price until October 11th. Adams testified that about October 8th he told defendants "that we were going ahead with the original project and raise the money by the sale of stock and complete the purchase." Appellant recognizes that nothing which occurred prior to October 11th bound defendants to carry out the option contract. In its opening brief it is said:

> "About five months elapsed from the date of the Adams option agreement to the date when all negotiations terminated in a binding contract between defendants and the purchaser whom Adams produced. During every day of that five months it was open to defendants to find another purchaser or to entertain any offer made them by any other person than plaintiff."

There was no written extension of the time provided in the option contract beyond August 1, 1915. Defendants testified that there was no oral extension thereof. Mallon testified that about August 10th he told Adams that "the contract was dead Mr. Blevins had given, and we would have nothing to do with it."

[1] It may be stated as a general rule that time is of the essence of an option to purchase within a specified time, without being expressly made so by the contract.

> "Frequently the time for acceptance is limited in the offer. This is usually done in the case of options. In such case the acceptance must be within the time specified. A limitation of the time for which a standing offer is to run is equivalent to the withdrawal of the offer at the end of the time named. The rule that in equity time is not of the essence of a contract does not apply to a mere offer to make a contract. An acceptance after the time limited in the offer will not bind the person making the offer, unless he assents to the acceptance so made after it is made." 6 R. C. L. 609.

[2-4] The option contract having expired on the 1st of August, the defendants were at liberty to treat it thereafter as if it had never existed. Since the agreement to pay a commission was dependent upon the option contract, the former expired with the latter, and Adams' agency to sell the property was at an end. To entitle an agent to a commission he must make a sale within the time limited by his contract of agency.

> "It must * * * appear that the broker performed the duty assumed by him within the time limited in his contract, or within such extension of time as may have been granted by his employer. If he failed to do that, he is not entitled to the commission, even though he made efforts to sell the property, and first called it to the attention of the party who subsequently made the purchase, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner." Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 512, 17 Pac. 642, 643, Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 79 Pac. 354; Hicks v. Post, 154 Cal. 22, 96 Pac. 878.
> "The evidence must also show that the transaction was completed within the time limited in the contract." Wright & Kimbrough v. Dewees, 52 Cal. App. 42, 197 Pac. 957.

The time limited in such a contract cannot be extended by an oral agreement. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6; Hicks v. Post, supra.

In considering the evidence it must be kept in mind that Adams was acting in a two fold capacity, though not improperly so, as the fact was known to both parties. Originally he was defendants' agent to sell the property. After the incorporation of plaintiff he was its active agent in the purchase of the property. He testified that all payments prior to October 11th were made and received under the original contract. Defendants testified that no payments between August 1st and October 11th were made or received under the original contract. Mallon testified that he notified Adams early in August, and prior to the first payment made in that month, that the contract of May 17th was dead, and that defendants would have nothing more to do with it, that they would not enter into any agreement, and that Adams did not thereafter ask for any written option. Under the foregoing state of the evidence the court instructed the jury that if the defendants, after August 1st and prior to October 11th, notified Adams that "his option or contract to purchase and his option for commissions" had expired and would not be renewed or that they canceled the same, and that subsequently a sale of the property was made upon different terms and conditions and as a new proposition, then the plaintiff could not recover. Appellant contends that this instruction is based upon "the mistaken conception of the law that the commission agreement came to an end with Adams' option agreement to purchase." What has already been said disposes of this contention.

[5] Three witnesses testified that in the negotiations leading up to the execution of the agreements of October 11th it was expressly agreed that no commissions were to be paid for making the sale. Adams testified that no such agreement relative to commissions was made. The court instructed the jury that, if such agreement was made and constituted "a new proposition to purchase," the plaintiff could not recover. Adams was a stockholder and officer of the plaintiff corporation and was acting in its behalf at the time of the alleged agreement to waive his claim for commissions. The terms of the agreements of October 11th were materially different from those of the option contract.

By the terms of the latter Adams had the right to make a cash payment of $35,000 and take immediate possession or to pay $5,000 cash, $30,000 on the 1st of December, and take possession on the latter date, at which time the crops probably would have been harvested and removed by defendants. By the terms of the agreements finally executed, plaintiff was given credit for $5,945 theretofore paid by Scott, Campbell, and Adams, and was required to pay $5,000 the following day and installments thereafter, which up to December 1st, amounted to the additional sum of $29,500, and was given immediate possession, together with defendants' interest in all of the crops. If it be assumed that the option and commission contracts were continued in full force up to the time of the final agreements, they did not obligate defendants to sell the property on the terms provided in such final agreements. The agreement of defendants to sell the property on terms to which they had not obligated themselves was a sufficient consideration for Adams' agreement to waive any right he may have had to commissions. Other errors claimed to have been made in the instructions to the jury are similar to those discussed and need not be specifically considered. It is sufficient to say that no error appears in any of them.

[6, 7] Plaintiff proved the entry in defendants' books of certain credits, made after October 11, 1915, in the form of commissions, as heretofore stated. Those entries tended strongly to prove that defendants understood that they were obligated to pay the commissions claimed by plaintiff, and also to discredit the testimony of Blevins and Mallon to the effect that Adams had agreed to waive such commissions. In an effort to overthrow the inference naturally arising from such acts on their part, both of the defendants testified that Scott had originally been associated with them in their rice project, but that, after rendering services and expending money in the furtherance of the enterprise, he had been compelled to drop out on account of financial inability to continue; that, after the sale of the property, the defendants agreed that they were under moral obligations to reimburse Scott, and therefore gave the credits referred to, and that the credits were given in the form of commissions as payments were received on the purchase price of the property because that was more convenient than to make such reimbursement in a single payment, but that such credits were not intended as the commissions provided for in the contract of May 17, 1915. Mallon was permitted, over plaintiff's objection, to give the details of the conversation between himself and Blevins, no one else being present, in which it was agreed between them to make such reimbursement and the manner in which it would be made. Blevins testified that thereafter, and prior to the assignment of Adams' claim for commissions to plaintiff, he related the substance of this conversation to Scott and Campbell and fully explained to them what the defendants proposed to allow in the form of commissions and the reasons therefor as stated. It was proper to permit defendants to explain why they gave the credits and made the entries thereof in their books in the form of commissions, but it does not appear upon what theory the details of the conversation between them was admissible. The conversation, however, was not substantially different from the testimony of the defendants as to the reasons for their acts, and it is not believed that the jury could have been influenced by its admission.

The judgment is affirmed.

WINTERBURN v. SHERIFF et al.

(Civ. 4033.)

1. Replevin 🔑4 — Replevin will not lie for property so incorporeal as stock of corporation nor for certificates evidencing such stock.

Replevin will not lie for property so incorporeal as "stock" in a corporation, and an action under Civ. Code, § 328, against a corporation and another to require the corporation to cancel certificates wrongfully held by its codefendant and reissue new certificates to plaintiff, cannot be treated as an action in replevin against the corporation's codefendant to recover the stock or the certificates evidencing them.

2. Corporations 🔑98—Statute authorizing suit to obtain new or duplicate stock certificates "wrongfully withheld" refers to withholding, not by corporation, but by third person.

"Wrongfully withheld," within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 328, which provides that, when certificates of corporate stock have been "wrongfully withheld," the owner may bring an action against the corporation to obtain a new or duplicate certificate, does not mean withholding by the corporation but by a third person.

3. Corporations 🔑503(1)—"Residence," within meaning of sections of Code of Civil Procedure relating to place of trial, is county where principal place of business is located.

A corporation's "residence," within the meaning of that term as used in the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which determine the place of trial of actions, is the county where its principal place of business is located.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Residence.]

4. Corporations 🔑503(3)—Denial of change of venue as to corporation's codefendant in action to compel issuance of duplicate stock certificates held not error.

Civ. Code, § 328, authorizing an action against a corporation to obtain a new or duplicate certificate of stock which has been lost or is wrongfully withheld and providing it may be brought in the county in which the principal place of business of the corporation is located, is not at variance with Const. art. 12, § 16, giving the plaintiff in a personal action against a corporation the right to sue in the county where its principal place of business is situated, or in the county where the contract was made or is to be performed, and where a third party wrongfully withholding stock certificates belonging to plaintiff has been joined with the corporation, and suit brought in the county of the corporation's residence, denial of a change of venue requested by the corporation's codefendant is not error, since Code Civ. Proc. § 395, provides civil actions must be tried in the county where the defendants "or some of them reside."

5. Venue 🔑41—Change of venue from county where a necessary defendant resides to county of other defendants' residence will be denied.

Where an action is brought in the county where a necessary party defendant has his residence, a change of venue to the county where other defendants reside will be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Burnell, Judge.

Action by Elmer E. Winterburn against Carrie V. Sheriff and the Penn Investment Company. From an order denying the first-named defendant's application for a change of venue, she appeals. Order affirmed.

Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The defendant Carrie V. Sheriff appeals from an order denying her application for a change of the place of trial to the county of her residence, Santa Barbara county.

The action was brought in the county of Los Angeles, where the corporation defendant has its principal place of business. Save for its prayer for general relief, the only remedy sought by the complaint is that which is afforded by section 328 of the Civil Code, which, so far as it is pertinent, reads:

> "Whenever a certificate of stock or of shares in a corporation organized under the laws of this state has been lost, destroyed or wrongfully withheld, the owner thereof may bring an action against such corporation in the superior court of the county in which is located its principal place of business, for the purpose of obtaining a new or duplicate certificate. If by the books of the corporation the stock stands in the name of a person other than the plaintiff, or if by such books it appears that some other person claims or has some right, title, or interest in, or lien upon, such stock, all such persons must be made parties defendant with the corporation. Summons must be issued and served as in other civil actions, and in addition thereto, the court must direct its clerk to issue * * * a notice setting forth the pendency of the action; * * * if no one appears within the time designated in such notice, nor within the time allowed by law after the service of such summons, the court must hear such evidence as may be offered in support of the allegations of the complaint, and make and file its decision thereon, and thereupon may enter its judgment canceling the lost, destroyed or wrongfully withheld certificate and directing the corporation, upon payment to it of all costs incurred by it in the premises and without costs against the corporation, to issue to the plaintiff a new or duplicate certificate."

After alleging that the defendant Penn Investment Company is a corporation having its principal place of business at Los Angeles, and that it had theretofore issued to plaintiff certain of its certificates of stock, the complaint alleges that—

> "The defendant Carrie V. Sheriff is wrongfully in possession of said certificates and wrongfully withholds the same from this plaintiff, who is the owner thereof as aforesaid; [and] that all of said certificates of stock are lost to this plaintiff."

Wherefore plaintiff prays judgment "canceling said lost certificates and each of them and directing the corporation defendant * * * to issue a new certificate."

The points urged by appellant are: (1) Instead of being brought under section 328, the suit is in reality an action of replevin to recover the certificates alleged to be wrongfully withheld by appellant, and therefore the controversy is entirely between plaintiff and appellant; wherefore it is claimed that the action should have been transferred to the county of appellant's residence. (2) That part of section 328 which gives jurisdiction to the superior court of the county wherein the corporation has its principal place of business is repugnant to section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution and void. We can perceive no merit in either point.

[1] In no sense can this be regarded as an action of replevin. It cannot be deemed to be an action to replevy the intangible shares of stock represented by the certificates. An action of that character will not lie for property so incorporeal as "stock" in a corporation. Ashton v. Heydenfeldt, 124 Cal. 14, 56 Pac. 624. Nor can it be treated as an action for the replevin of the certificates which evidence the shares, even though the complaint does allege that the certificates are "wrongfully withheld" by appellant. Plaintiff is not seeking to regain possession of the certificates.

On the contrary, he seeks their cancellation and the issuance of a new certificate.

[2] Appellant's argument in support of her point that this is an action of replevin, in which she is the only necessary party defendant, is based upon the assumption that the words "wrongfully withheld," as used in section 328, refer to a wrongful withholding by the corporation and not to a wrongful withholding by a third person. Upon this assumption it is argued that because the complaint alleges the certificates to be wrongfully withheld by appellant it therefore states no more than a cause of action against her for the replevy of the certificates. Appellant places an erroneous construction upon the words "wrongfully withheld," as used in this Code section. If by these words the Legislature had in view a wrongful withholding by the corporation, then that defendant would be a wrongdoer and there would have been no reason for exempting it from costs occasioned by its own wrongful act. Moreover, if appellant's construction were permissible, there would be no reason in the provision which authorizes the entry of a judgment canceling the wrongfully withheld certificate and directing the issuance of a new or duplicate certificate. If the section meant that the certificate must be "wrongfully withheld" by the corporation, the appropriate judgment would be one directing the return of the old certificate—not its cancellation and the issuance of a new one.

[3, 4] It is not necessary to consider appellant's claim that there is a conflict between section 16 of article 12 of the Constitution and that part of section 328 which provides that the action may be brought in the superior court of the county in which is located the corporation's principal place of business. Even if such conflict did exist, it would not avail appellant. The remaining provisions of section 328 and the part claimed to be unconstitutional are not so mutually connected and interdependent as to warrant the belief that the Legislature would not have adopted any of the provisions of that section if it could not have given effect to its declaration that the action may be brought in the superior court of the county in which is located the corporation's principal place of business.

The Penn Investment Company is a necessary party defendant. The action was brought in the county of that defendant's residence, i. e. in the county where it has its principal place of business. For it is now established that a corporation's residence, within the meaning of that term as used in those sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which determine the place of the trial of actions, is in the county where it has its principal place of business. Cohn v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 71 Cal. 488, 12 Pac. 498; National Bank v. Superior Court, 83 Cal. 491, 497, 24 Pac. 157; Cook v. Ray Mfg. Co., 159 Cal. 696, 115 Pac. 318.

[5] Under the provisions of section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure all personal actions (with certain exceptions, among which an action of the present character does not fall) "must be tried in the county in which the defendants, or some of them, reside at the commencement of the action." Section 16 of article 12 merely gives to the plaintiff in a personal action against a corporation the optional right to sue either in the county where the principal place of business of the corporation is situated, i. e. in the county of its residence, or in the county where the contract was made or is to be performed, or where the obligation or liability arises or the breach occurs. In the instant case respondent has brought the action in the county in which the corporation has its residence. Where the action is brought in the county where a necessary party defendant has his residence, a change of venue to the county where the other defendants reside will be denied. Hirschfeld v. Sevier, 77 Cal. 448, 19 Pac. 819; Quint v. Dimond, 135 Cal. 572, 67 Pac. 1034. And this is the rule where, as here, a corporation is a necessary party defendant and the action is brought in the county of its residence. Hellman v. Logan, 148 Cal. 58, 82 Pac. 848. For these reasons we conclude that the motion for a change of venue was properly denied.

The case of Brady v. Times-Mirror Co., 106 Cal. 56, 39 Pac. 209, is not contrary to our conclusion. There the plaintiff, suing a corporation and two natural persons, elected to bring the action, not in the county of the corporation's residence, but in the county where the liability arose—a county in which none of the defendants resided. It was held that the plaintiff was not at liberty, while thus availing himself of the privilege given him by section 16 of article 12, to deprive a defendant other than the corporation of the right of trial in the county of his residence.

PEOPLE v. Y. WONG. (Cr. 659.)

1. Criminal law ⇨90(1)—Superior court has jurisdiction where penalty is in excess of that which police or justice's court can impose.

Where the penalty prescribed for a particular offense is in excess of that which it is competent for the police or justice's court to impose, the superior court has jurisdiction unless it is specifically conferred by statute exclusively on the police or justice's court.

2. Criminal law ⇨84(2)—Within legislative power to confer jurisdiction on police and justice's court to try misdemeanors.

Under Const. art. 6, § 5, it is within the legislative power to confer jurisdiction on police and justice's courts to try all misdemeanors, whether ordinary or high-grade, though the superior court has and will retain jurisdiction of all misdemeanors not otherwise provided for.

3. Criminal law ⇨90(1)—Police and justice's courts may, under varying freeholders' charters, have jurisdiction of misdemeanors in one city while not in another.

Under Const. art. 11, §§ 8 and 8½, authorizing freeholders' charters to establish and regulate the jurisdiction of police and other municipal courts, jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors may competently be conferred upon police courts in one city and still retained by the superior courts in other cities whose charters do not vest in them such jurisdiction; St. 1885, p. 213, as amended by St. 1891, p. 292, conferring jurisdiction on the police or justice's courts over misdemeanors, being inapplicable.

4. Criminal law ⇨90(1)—Where charter made no reference to police or municipal court, justice's court does not have jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors; "otherwise provided for."

Though the freeholders' charters of unincorporated cities may provide for police and justice's courts if they are silent on the question of the jurisdiction of such courts over high-grade misdemeanors, the jurisdiction of such courts is "not otherwise provided" for within the meaning of Const. art. 6, § 5, and is retained by the superior court unless conferred generally by statute, and where the charter of the city of Stockton approved by St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.), p. 254, et seq., made no reference to police or municipal courts, held, that the justice's court did not have jurisdiction of high grade misdemeanors unless by virtue of some general law.

5. Statutes ⇨124(1)—Act declaring jurisdiction of police courts in certain cities held not invalid because subject not expressed in title.

St. 1885, p. 213, as amended by St. 1891, p. 292, entitled "An Act to provide for the police courts in cities having 30,000 and under 100,000 inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof," and which provided among other things that "all misdemeanors punishable by fine, or by imprisonment, or by both" shall be within their exclusive jurisdiction, thereby divesting the superior courts of former jurisdiction of indictable misdemeanors, held not invalid under Const. art. 4, § 24, requiring the subject of an act shall be expressed in its title.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Y. Wong was charged with a misdemeanor. From an order dismissing the information, the State appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen. (Frank B. Smith, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for the People.

Joseph D. Malloy, of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. The district attorney of San Joaquin county filed in the superior court thereof an information charging the defendant with a misdemeanor, in that, on or about the 19th day of May, 1922, and prior to the filing of said information, in said court, said defendant practiced and attempted to practice and advertised and held himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted, without having at said time "a valid unrevoked certificate from the State Board of Medical Examiners of the state of California" so to do. Stats. 1913, p. 722. At the time the defendant was called for arraignment before the superior court upon said information, his counsel moved the dismissal of the accusatory pleading on the ground that said court was without jurisdiction to try the defendant on the charge thus alleged against him, and the motion was granted. From the order granting said motion of dismissal the people appeal.

The specific ground upon which the order of dismissal was made was that, under the statute of 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 213), as amended by the Legislature of 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 292), the jurisdiction of all misdemeanors committed within the limits of incorporated cities of the class to which the city of Stockton belongs, the crime here charged being alleged to have been committed in said city, is vested exclusively in the police or justice's court of said city. Section 17 of the State Medical Act, so called, upon which the information in this case is founded, prescribes as a penalty for practicing or attempting to practice the science of treating the sick or afflicted or in holding one's self out as such a practitioner, without having at the time of so doing a valid, unrevoked certificate as provided in said act, a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $600 or imprisonment for a term of not less than 60 days nor more than 180 days, or both such fine and imprisonment. Under section 1425 of the Penal Code the power or authority of a police or justice's court to inflict penalties for misdemeanors is limited to the imposition of a fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, except as to certain of the offenses specifically enumerated in said section, for which a greater penalty is prescribed in the sections of the Penal Code defining the same. See, also, § 4426, Pol. Code; People v. Sacramento Butchers' Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 471, 488, 489, 107 Pac. 712.

[1-3] It is manifest that, unless there is some law or provision of law expressly vesting in a police or justice's court exclusive jurisdiction of the offense charged in the information herein, the sole jurisdiction of said offense is in the superior court, since the penalty prescribed therefor by the medical act is in excess of that which it is within the legal competence of a justice's or police court to impose. That it is within the power of the Legislature to confer upon police and justices' courts exclusive jurisdiction to try all misdemeanors, whether of the ordinary or what is commonly termed high-grade misdemeanors, is not an open question in this state. Section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution in effect so ordains. It is in said section provided that the superior court shall have original jurisdiction "in all criminal cases amounting to a felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for." Under that language of the Constitution the Legislature may repose exclusive jurisdiction in police courts of all classes of misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment or both. People v. Cory, 26 Cal. App. 735, 742, 148 Pac. 532. See, also, Ex parte Wallingford, 60 Cal. 103; Gafford v. Bush, 60 Cal. 149; Green v. Superior Court, 78 Cal. 536, 21 Pac. 307, 541; Ex parte Westenberg, 167 Cal. 309, 139 Pac. 674. While the superior court, under said provision of the Constitution, has and will retain jurisdiction of misdemeanors "not otherwise provided for," such jurisdiction will be divested the moment the Legislature, under the power vested in it to establish inferior courts in any incorporated city or town, township, county, or city and county (article 6, § 1, Const.), and to fix the number and the jurisdiction and powers of such inferior courts (article 6, § 11, Id.), by law confers upon justices' or police courts exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors. And, under the terms of section 8½ of article 11 of the Constitution, it is competent in all freeholders' charters framed under the authority of section 8 of article 11 to provide for the "constitution, regulation, government, and jurisdiction of police courts, and other municipal courts," vesting them with "such civil and criminal jurisdiction as may by law be conferred upon inferior courts." Under the authority of the first mentioned provision of the Constitution, a freeholders' charter may legally provide that any police or municipal court that may thus be established shall, within the limits of the city for which such charter has been adopted and approved, have exclusive jurisdiction of both ordinary and so-called high-grade misdemeanors or cases of misdemeanor of which the superior court has jurisdiction so long as jurisdiction of such misdemeanors is "not otherwise provided for." And jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors may completely thus be conferred upon and exercised by police or municipal courts of certain cities, and still be retained by the superior court as to other cities governed by freeholders' charters, to which cities the statute of 1885 is not applicable and whose charters, although establishing police courts, have not vested in or conferred upon them jurisdiction of those high-grade misdemeanors. See People v. Sacramento Butchers Ass'n, 12 Cal. App. 471, 477, 478, 479, 107 Pac. 712, supra; Union Ice Co., etc., v. Rose, 11 Cal. App. 357, 104 Pac. 1006; McGranahan v. Police Court of the City, etc., of S. F. (Cal. App.) 205 Pac. 98.

[4] From the foregoing it is manifest that if there were no general valid statute expressly conferring upon police or justices' courts of incorporated cities jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, and the freeholders' charters of such cities, even if providing for police or other municipal courts, were silent as to that matter—that is, had omitted to provide that such courts should be clothed with jurisdiction of all misdemeanors—then there would not be jurisdiction of such misdemeanors "otherwise provided for," and hence such jurisdiction would remain exclusively in the superior courts.

The freeholders' charter of the city of Stockton, which was approved by the Legislature, in extra session, in 1911 (Stats. 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 254 et seq.), makes no provision for a police or other municipal court, nor does it make any reference whatsoever to any municipal or other court. If, therefore, the superior court in and for the county of San Joaquin has been divested of jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors, and such jurisdiction is exclusively vested in and exercisable by the justice's court of the city of Stockton, the authority for the exercise of that jurisdiction by the last-mentioned court, must be found in some general law; and, as above shown, there is such a law in the act of the Legislature of 1885, above referred to, and which still exists as it was then enacted, except as to one of its sections to which the Legislature of 1891 made a certain amendment, which, however, does not affect the determination of any question which we are called upon to consider and decide upon this appeal.

[5] But the Attorney General challenges the validity of said act on the ground that its title does not conform to the mandate of the Constitution that the subject of every act of the Legislature shall be expressed in its title. Const. art. 4, § 24.

The title of the act of 1885 reads as follows:

> "An act to provide for police courts in cities having 30,000 and under 100,000 inhabitants, and to provide for officers thereof."

The act, as amended in 1891, contains precisely the same title. The city of Stockton belongs to the class of cities mentioned in the title of said act, and, if there be no constitutional objection to the act, it, of course, applies to said city. The first section of the act provides that in every city having 30,000 and less than 100,000 inhabitants the judicial power shall be vested in a police court to be held therein by the city justices, etc., and adds to the duties "now" required of such justices by law the duty of holding such police court. The second section of the act specifically enumerates (in four distinct subdivisions) the offenses of which such police court shall have "exclusive jurisdiction," the third subdivision of said section providing that such "exclusive jurisdiction" shall extend and attach to the following offenses:

> "Breaches of the peace, riots, affrays, committing willful injury to property, and all misdemeanors punishable by fine or by imprisonment, or by both such fine and imprisonment." (Italics ours.)

Thus it is to be perceived that, assuming said statute to be valid, the jurisdiction of all misdemeanors, whether of the high or the low grade class, is exclusively vested and cognizable in the police courts of cities having any number of inhabitants between the minimum and maximum numbers mentioned in the title and the body of the act in question; and it is as to that particular provision which it is contended by the attorney general that the title of the act of 1885 does not respond to the provision of the Constitution requiring that the subject of every act of the Legislature shall be expressed in its title.

The argument in support of the contention thus stated is that the title of said act, to satisfy the requirement of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, that the subject of an act shall be expressed in its title, should in express language not only declare that exclusive jurisdiction of high-grade misdemeanors shall be vested in "said police courts," but that it should likewise declare that the superior courts shall thereby be divested of "their former jurisdiction of indictable misdemeanors." The contention and the argument are alike devoid of merit.

The establishment of a court means the creation of a tribunal vested with power to hear and determine controverted issues of fact and of law, and this means, of course, that its jurisdiction is pointed out and fixed by the act creating it. Indeed, a so-called "court" without jurisdiction to hear and determine controverted matters would be no court at all. Hence, the declaration in the title of the act of 1885 that the purpose of said act was and is to provide police courts for cities containing the designated number of inhabitants of necessity means that such a tribunal is thus to be created with a certain defined and fixed jurisdiction—that is, with the power to hear and determine certain classes of cases.

The manifest purpose of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution, commanding that every act of the Legislature shall embrace but one subject, and that such subject shall be expressed in its title, was "to protect the members of the Legislature as well as the public, against fraud; to guard against the passage of bills the titles of which gave no intimation to the members of the Legislature or to the people of the matters contained therein." Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 636, 29 Pac. 251; Cooley, Const. Lim. (6th Ed.) 169. But, in construing that provision of the Constitution, no court has ever held that, to meet the purpose and intent thereof, it was requisite to insert in the title of an act anything beyond what was necessary to disclose the general nature or character of the subject of the legislation contained therein. In other words, it is not necessary that the title of an act should contain an abstract of its contents. Abeel v. Clark, 84 Cal. 229, 24 Pac. 383, and cases therein cited. "When the general purpose of the act is declared (in the title), the details provided for the accomplishment of that purpose will be regarded as necessary incidents." Thus it is held in many cases that an act entitled in general terms "an act to incorporate" a certain town may lawfully provide all means necessary for the government of the town, including taxation, courts, definition of misdemeanors, punishment of offenders, municipal improvements, etc. State v. Town of Union, 33 N. J. Law, 350; Cooley, Const. Lim., 172, note 1; Ex parte Liddell, supra.

In the recent case of People v. French, 214 Pac. 1003, this court through Presiding Justice Finch, made a careful review of the cases above considered, and also several later California cases construing the intent and explaining the scope of the constitutional provision in question. In that case the appellant, then a prisoner in the state prison at Folsom, was charged with the crime of escaping from the surveillance of his guards while working on the public highway, and he contended in this court that section 106 of the Penal Code, as amended in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 77), upon which section the information in said case was based, was unconstitutional for this reason: That, while the amending act provides that it is a crime for a prisoner to escape, as well as to attempt to escape, from prison, the title thereof merely declares that the act is amendatory of section 106 of the Penal Code, "relating to attempts of prisoners to escape," there being no reference in the title to the act of escaping from prison. It was held by this court, upon the authorities considered and from principle, that the title of the act of 1921, amending section 106 of the Penal Code, sufficiently conformed to the constitutional requirement as to titles of legislative acts. And it is interesting to note that, in the French Case, the Attorney General—indeed, the very representative of that office who prepared the brief in the instant case—with characteristic force and vigor supported the construction of the constitutional provision which was given it by this court as in its application to the point made in said case; and we may pertinently observe that it is hardly necessary to go further than the brief prepared by the learned gentleman himself in opposition to the appeal in the French Case to secure most admirable support for the conclusion that the title of the act in question in the instant case is in perfect accord with the requirements of the constitutional provision under consideration. In said brief this most rational view of the intent and scope of the said constitutional provision is expressed and urged as follows:

> "A title of an act may seem to be narrow in language, but upon careful consideration appears to have reasonable reference to many minor and related subdivisions of the main subject mentioned in the title. This mere detail and incidental matter may be treated of in a (constitutional) statute, even though the title may appear narrow in language."

The idea of what is really intended by the constitutional provision in question could not be expressed in more pertinent and perspicuous language; and if it were necessary to look entirely to authority for the support of the position which we take with reference to the present case, it would be sufficient to accept the opinion of the Attorney General as expressed in the excerpt just quoted, and plant the conclusion herein arrived at squarely thereon. We are firmly of the opinion that no other conclusion could justly be announced in this case than that the title of the act of 1885 clearly satisfies the requirement of section 24 of article 4 of the Constitution.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CHEW HING. (Cr. 660.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 23, 1923.)

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Chew Hing was charged with a misdemeanor. From an order dismissing the information, the State appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., (Frank B. Smith, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for the People.

Joseph D. Malloy, of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant was informed against by the district attorney of the county of San Joaquin for the crime of violating the so-called Medical Practice Act, in that on or about the 19th day of May, 1922, and before the filing of the information, in the city of Stockton, county of San Joaquin, he did willfully and unlawfully practice and attempt to practice and advertise and hold himself out as practicing a system or mode of treating the sick and afflicted, without having at the time of so doing "a valid, unrevoked certificate from the State Board of Medical Examiners of the state of California," as provided in said act. Stats. 1913, p. 722. At the time fixed for his arraignment, and when the case was called for that purpose, his counsel moved to dismiss the information on the ground that the superior court was without jurisdiction of the offense charged therein, the contention being that jurisdiction of said offense was exclusively in the police court of the city of Stockton. The court made an order granting the motion of dismissal, and the appeal is by the people from said order.

The specific ground upon which the motion was granted was that, under the statute of 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 213), exclusive jurisdiction of the class of misdemeanors within which the one charged in the information falls is vested in the police court of the class of incorporated cities to which the city of Stockton belongs. This precise point was made in the case of the People v. Y. Wong (Cr. 659) 215 Pac. 409, in which an opinion affirming the order appealed from has this day been filed. The point thus made is the only one pressed by the people in both cases for the reversal of the orders appealed from. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the point in this case.

Upon the authority of the case of People v. Y. Yong (Cr. 659) the order herein appealed from is affirmed.

TWOGOOD v. MONNETTE. (L. A. 7006.)

Rehearing Denied May 31, 1923.)

1. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Producing purchaser ready, willing, and able to complete contract entitled to commission although owner unable or unwilling to complete sale.

In the absence of any contrary agreement, a broker has earned his commission when within the life of his contract, or any extension thereof, he has produced a person who is ready, willing, and able to purchase the property on terms satisfactory to the seller, and has obtained a binding and valid contract for a sale on the terms proposed by the seller, or has brought the seller and buyer together and thus enabled them to enter into a contract of sale, or has produced such a purchaser who has orally accepted the seller's terms and offered to enter into a written contract embodying the terms, and binding upon both parties; and the broker's commission accrues when the contract of sale is executed, or when the opportunity to make such contract is given the seller, and the broker becomes entitled to his commission even though the seller is unable or unwilling to complete the sale.

2. Brokers 🔑60—Written contract between seller and purchaser not essential to recovery of broker's commission where purchaser ready, willing, and able produced.

A written contract between the seller and the purchaser of property is not essential to the recovery of a broker's commission if he has produced to the seller a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms proposed by the seller, and who has agreed to those terms and is willing and offers to enter into a binding written contract; and the broker has performed his duty and earned his commission regardless of whether a written contract is actually entered into, or whether the sale is ever consummated by the delivery of the property and the payment of the purchase price.

3. Brokers 🔑57(2)—Owner agreeing to modification of terms of sale with purchaser produced by broker liable for commission.

Where an agreement for the sale of oil stock between the owner and the broker required the broker to produce a purchaser for cash, and the owner after the purchaser was produced agreed to a modification of the terms of sale, he was liable for the broker's commission.

4. Brokers 🔑63(3)—Failure of written agreement to embody real terms of sale of oil stock held not to preclude recovery of commission.

Where a purchaser was produced, and the owner consummated an agreement with him to sell oil stock, and the purchaser's agent employed an attorney to draw up a contract of sale, the fact that such contract did not embody the real terms agreed upon afforded no ground for the refusal of the owner to pay the broker's commission upon his refusal to complete the deal on other grounds.

5. Brokers 🔑63(1)—Where seller voluntarily disabled himself from performing contract of sale, broker entitled to commission.

Where the owner of oil stock voluntarily disabled himself from performing a contract entered into with a purchaser of such stock produced by a broker, while the transaction was obviously approaching a speedy and satisfactory culmination, and where the purchaser produced by the broker was ready, willing, and able to take and pay for the stock on terms satisfactory to the owner, the broker was entitled to his commission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by W. S. Twogood against M. J. Monnette. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Donald Barker and William H. Neblett, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. Plaintiff in this action sued to recover the sum of $25,000 on a contract under which he was employed as a broker to find a purchaser for the capital stock of the Bankers' Oil Company. He alleged in his amended complaint that the contract of employment was made on November 4, 1919, and that on November 5th he produced a purchaser who was ready and able to make the purchase on the terms and conditions thereof. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, fixing the amount of recovery at $15,000. From the judgment entered upon the verdict the defendant has appealed.

It is mainly contended on behalf of defendant that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. Defendant insists that, admitting the contract of employment as claimed, and the correctness of the amount of the verdict under such contract, the evidence did not show that the plaintiff performed the obligations, on his part required, by producing a purchaser who was willing to make the purchase on the terms proposed by the defendant.

Prior to November 4, 1919, the defendant had represented to the plaintiff and his correspondents that he and other members of his family held more than half of all the issued stock of the oil company mentioned, and that the holders of the remainder of that stock had agreed to sell it whenever defendant sold that which he controlled, and that defendant could and would deliver, in consequence of such understanding, all of the issued stock of the oil company for the sum of $300,000. On November 4th he executed the following writing:

"This will certify that in case of sale of the Bankers' Oil Company by W. S. Twogood to any one of his clients, he and his associates are to receive the sum of twenty-five thousand ($25,000) dollars for bringing to me the parties to the deal."

At the same time he required plaintiff to agree that, in the event a sale was made of the corporate stock and the sum of $25,000 paid as commission, plaintiff would pay to defendant the sum of $10,000; in other words, divide his commission in that proportion. Plaintiff had, previous to the date of the commission agreement, been in touch with certain associates in San Francisco, and on the morning of the 5th of November he produced at the office of the defendant Alfred G. Wilkes, who was introduced as the proposed purchaser. The commission agreement contained no express statement of terms upon which the sale was to be made, and when Wilkes appeared in defendant's office he was advised by defendant that the price for the stock was $300,000 and the terms would be cash; i. e., that payment for its stock would be due upon its delivery. After some further negotiations, Wilkes suggested that he pay on that day, on account of the purchase price, the sum of $5,000, and the balance within 30 days in order to give him sufficient time to make an examination of the title to the property. To this defendant agreed. Wilkes at that interview stated that he was busy "and would like to adjourn the conference until two o'clock in the afternoon, when he would return and close the matter up"; that Wilkes stated that he would take the property on the terms last mentioned. At the noon hour Wilkes told C. G. Osborn that he had agreed to buy the stock from Monnette, and delegated to him the duty of calling on Monnette at two o'clock for the purpose of closing the deal in his behalf upon the terms stated. At two o'clock, in company with Twogood, Osborn called on Monnette and stated to him the terms of the sale as theretofore agreed upon with Wilkes, to which statement Monnette assented. Some further matters, such as taxes and oil on hand, were discussed and agreed to at that time by Monnette and Osborn, as had previously been done by Wilkes. Thereupon all terms of the sale having been expressly assented to by both sides, it was suggested by Osborn that the same be reduced to a written contract, and that he would have Guerney E. Newlin prepare the same and would return with it as soon as possible. To this Monnette likewise agreed. Newlin telephoned Monnette before he started the preparation of the contract and again during its preparation, and in the course of his conversation went over in detail the terms of the agreement which had been made between Monnette on the one hand and Wilkes and Osborn on the other, being the same terms above mentioned, and Monnette stated to Newlin that those were the terms to which he had agreed. The completion of the contract was delayed until about four o'clock that day. Meanwhile, and at about 3:30 o'clock, defendant, after conference with two callers, determined that he would not proceed with the deal. When he was informed by plaintiff that Osborn was ready to bring the contract over, he stated to plaintiff:

> "It will not be necessary for him to come up. I don't care to see him, as the deal so far as you and Mr. Wilkes and Mr. Osborn are concerned is off. I cannot make it. I cannot complete the deal."

Defendant further stated to plaintiff that he had just been informed by his recent callers that they had a written contract with the holders of the minority stock for the purchase of the same, and for that reason it was no longer possible for him to perform his contract. Some days later Osborn, acting under instructions from Wilkes, called upon defendant and offered to take whatever stock might be owned or controlled by defendant at a price proportionate to the total price of $300,000 agreed upon as the sale value of the whole amount of issued stock. Defendant refused to deal further with Osborn or Wilkes, and on the latter occasion admitted that he had given an option to other parties covering his own stock.

Do these facts make out a case where the broker has, during the life of his contract of employment, produced a purchaser ready and willing to buy the property offered to be sold at the price and on the terms fixed by his principal (no question of the ability of the proposed purchaser being involved)?

[1] In this state it is well established, in the absence of any specific agreement to the contrary, that a broker employed to sell real or personal property has earned his commission when, within the life of his contract, or any extension thereof, he has produced a person who is ready, willing, and able to purchase the property on terms satisfactory to the seller, and has obtained a binding and valid contract for a sale on the terms proposed by the seller, or has brought the seller and buyer together and thus enabled them to enter into a contract of sale, or has produced such a purchaser who has verbally accepted the seller's terms and offered to enter into a written contract embodying the said terms and binding upon both parties. In such cases the broker's right to commission accrues when the contract of sale is executed, or when opportunity to make such contract is given the seller; and the broker becomes entitled to his commission even though the seller is unable or unwilling to complete the sale. Ernst v. Ganahl, 166 Cal. 493, 137 Pac. 256; Gardiner v. McDonogh, 147 Cal. 313, 81 Pac. 964; Phelps v. Prusch, 83 Cal. 626, 23 Pac. 1111.

[2] It is also established law in this state that a written contract between the seller and the purchaser is not essential to the recovery of the broker's commission if he has produced to the seller a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to purchase upon the terms proposed by the seller and who has agreed to those terms, and is willing and offers to enter into a binding written contract. The broker has performed his duty and has earned his commission regardless of whether a written contract is actually entered into or whether the sale is ever consummated by the delivery of the property and the payment of the purchase price. Gunn v. Bank of California, 99 Cal. 349, 33 Pac. 1105; Merwin v. Shaffner, 31 Cal. App. 377, 160 Pac. 684.

[3] It is urged in behalf of the defendant that the broker did not establish his right to his commission for the reason that his contract required him to produce a purchaser for cash, whereas Wilkes insisted that he be given 30 days within which to pay. But the record also shows that the defendant, at his interview with Wilkes, agreed to this modification, if such it may be called. We say "if such it may be called," because in any event the obligation to pay the price was merely concurrent with that of the defendant to deliver the stock, much of which was not in the possession of the defendant, who required some time—which possibly might have been extended even beyond 30 days—to place himself in position to make delivery. But the modification of the terms having thus been agreed to by the seller, this departure from the terms of the agent's authorization affords no ground for refusal to pay him his commission. 4 R. C. L. § 52, p. 313.

[4] It is further contended by the defendant that the transaction never progressed beyond the stage of negotiation, and calls attention to the fact that the contract which was prepared by the attorney for Wilkes and Osborn, and which Osborn was proposing to submit on November 5th to defendant for his signature, was, in legal effect, a mere option, not binding Wilkes to complete the purchase. But the contract was drawn in this form without the knowledge of Wilkes, and with the reluctant consent of Osborn, upon the advice of the attorney and the latter's statement that if it was unsatisfactory to the defendant it could and would be readily changed into a contract of purchase. Without having seen the proposed contract, the defendant refused to proceed with the transaction. While we have no doubt that the contract as drafted by Wilkes' attorney did not embody the precise terms theretofore orally agreed to, and lends color to the contention of the defendant that the transaction was merely in a state of negotiation, it was in no sense conclusive evidence of the latter fact, and the jury was justified in concluding, as it doubtless did, that the drafting of the agreement in this form was merely an act of bad judgment on the part of the agent and attorney, and without legal effect in view of the subsequent turn of events.

[5] In conclusion it is to be noted that the defendant made no objection to Wilkes as a purchaser, to the terms of the proposed contract, or to the manner or the time within which plaintiff and Wilkes performed their respective parts. He based his refusal to proceed exclusively, both on that day and the day following when interviewed by Osborn and the plaintiff, upon the ground that he was not able to perform. And it is apparent from the record that he had on the 5th day of November voluntarily disabled himself from performing while in the midst of a transaction with Wilkes, which was obviously approaching a speedy and satisfactory culmination. The plaintiff did all that was required of him by the terms of his employment to entitle him to his commission; namely, he produced a bona fide purchaser, ready, able, and willing to take and pay for the stock on terms satisfactory to the defendant, his employer.

RUSSELL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR SACRAMENTO COUNTY et al.

Grand jury ⚷44—Threat against grand juror for act committed as private citizen not interference with grand juror.

Where a grand juror as a private citizen has instituted proceedings for a search warrant for intoxicating liquor, a threat to prosecute him for perjury in swearing out the warrant is not an interference with a grand juror, and, as such, a contempt.

In Bank.

Application by Clifford A. Russell for a writ of prohibition, to be directed to Charles O. Busick, Judge of the Superior Court of Sacramento County. Writ granted.

J. R. Huges, Markham Johnston, and O. F. Meldon, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

Ben P. Tabor, of Sacramento, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The writ of prohibition was ordered issued from the bench for the reason that the complaint charging the petitioner with contempt failed to state an offense.

The petitioner was charged with threatening a grand juror with a prosecution for perjury in swearing out a search warrant for intoxicating liquor. It is conceded that the proceeding for a search warrant was instituted by the grand juror as a citizen, and not by virtue of his powers and duties as a grand juror, and for this reason petitioner's threat was not an interference with a grand juror, as such.

Writ of prohibition ordered issued.

All concur.

In re McDONALD'S ESTATE.

McDONALD v. McDONALD et al.

(L. A. 7072.)

1. Wills 🔑55(1)—Finding of want of testamentary capacity sustained.

In a proceeding to set aside the probate of a will on the ground that testator did not have testamentary capacity, evidence held to support a finding for contestant.

2. Wills 🔑384—Admission of evidence, if erroneous, held harmless because of similar testimony previously introduced without objection.

In a will contest that one of the proponents testified that a ranch, which he, his mother, and contestant formerly occupied, stood in the name of his mother and had been deeded to her about a certain time, if erroneous, was rendered harmless because of similar testimony previously introduced without objection.

3. Wills 🔑164(5)—Evidence as to false representations to decedent tending to prejudice contestant in his eyes held admissible in will contest.

In a will contest, on the issue of fraud and undue influence, evidence as to whether certain representations made by one of the proponents to decedent were fraudulent held admissible as tending to show an attempt to prejudice contestant in the eyes of decedent.

4. Wills 🔑292—Property owned by parties to contest may not be shown on question of natural right to be object of decedent's bounty.

In a will contest it is error to admit testimony to show what property the parties to the contest owned as tending to prove which had the greater natural right to be the object of decedent's bounty.

5. Witnesses 🔑276—Executor and beneficiary properly examined as adverse party as on cross-examination, although he had not opposed contest of will.

In a will contest there was no error in permitting an executor and beneficiary to be examined as an adverse party as on cross-examination under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, where he had not opposed contest, and as an heir he would receive more property on setting aside the will than under it, and where his testimony elicited would have been admissible under the general rules of evidence; the method of examining witnesses being largely discretionary.

6. Witnesses 🔑372(2) — Evidence on cross-examination as to hostility between contestant and proponent held admissible.

In a will contest evidence elicited on cross-examination as to whether proponent had called decedent, who was his father, a certain opprobrious name, held admissible in view of other evidence showing a feeling of hostility of the witness toward contestant.

7. Appeal and error 🔑730(1)—Assignment of error as to refusal of instructions properly stating the law must show wherein subject was not actually covered by instructions given.

It is not a sufficient predicate for a claim of error that instructions which properly state the law have been rejected, but the assignment must go further and point out wherein the subject of the instruction was not in fact covered by those actually given.

8. Wills 🔑329(5)—Instruction as to burden of proof in will contest held not erroneous as not based on evidence.

In a will contest an instruction on the burden of proof as to whether the will was prepared at the instance of the beneficiaries or proponents held not erroneous as not being based on evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Proceedings by H. D. McDonald against Bert H. McDonald and others to set aside the probate of the will of James A. McDonald, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. A. Massey and Peyton H. Moore, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. James A. McDonald died September 12, 1920, leaving a purported will dated August 20, 1920, which was duly admitted to probate. By it he bequeathed and devised the bulk of his property in varying amounts to his half-brothers, Dan C. Mulock and Will C. Mulock, and to his nephew, niece, and sister-in-law, Bert H. McDonald, Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick, and Lillie H. McDonald. The latter are the son, daughter, and wife, respectively, of decedent's brother, H. D. McDonald, to whom decedent left nothing. Bert H. McDonald and Will C. Mulock were named executors of the will. On December 20, 1920, H. D. McDonald instituted this proceeding to set aside the probate. The grounds of his contest were alleged unsoundness of mind of the decedent and undue influence and fraud exerted by Bert H. McDonald and others upon decedent which caused him to execute the will in question. Bert H. McDonald, Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick, and Lillie H. McDonald filed an answer to the petition in which they denied these allegations. Upon the trial the jury returned a special verdict in favor of contestant upon each issue save that of fraud, which was not submitted to them. From judgment rendered thereon proponents take this appeal.

1. It is claimed by appellants there was no evidence to support the verdict of the jury that decedent was of unsound mind at the time he executed the will or that he was induced to sign the will through undue influence. The evidence as to decedent's testamentary capacity consisted principally of the testimony of acquaintances and relatives, who described decedent's conduct, both as to his actions generally and with reference to his conduct on specific occasions, and gave their respective opinions that he was or was not sane. No expert witnesses were called. Inasmuch as it is our opinion there was sufficient evidence to support the finding of testamentary incapacity, an extended review of the evidence on behalf of appellants is unnecessary. The witnesses to the will, W. M. Northrop and H. S. Farrell, who were two attorneys having their offices together, both gave their opinion that decedent was rational and sane, as did their stenographer. Two grocers, a plant fumigator, and a bank teller with whom decedent had done business, several neighbors, an attorney who had examined decedent as a witness in a case some years before, and appellants Bert H. McDonald and Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick also testified to the same effect. These witnesses stated variously that decedent was able to carry on a connected conversation; that he talked intelligently about his crops, the care of his ranch, and other subjects, such as the work one witness was doing in a shipyard. They based their opinions that he was sane upon these grounds.

On the other hand, the witnesses for respondent were unanimous in declaring decedent to have been irrational and insane. From their testimony, which the jury apparently accepted, it appears that decedent lived alone on an orange ranch near San Marino which he owned; that he was in the custom of going about the place almost nude, often wearing only a pair of trousers; and that he was in the habit of bathing in his yard. When respondents and others attempted to get him to change his habits in this respect, the neighbors even threatening him with arrest, he informed them the ranch was his and that he would do as he pleased on it. He habitually talked to himself, often in an abusive manner, concerning some unidentified third person or some woman. His conversation was disconnected and he would suddenly change from one subject to another. He seemed unable to talk connectedly for any lenth of time on any particular subject. He talked foolishly, and one witness stated he "jumbled" in his talk. His memory was poor. He was under the impression his neighbors were trying to poison his horses and steal his fruit. Upon one occasion he refused to pay a Japanese who trimmed his orange grove on the ground that he had put poison on the trees to make the blossoms fall off so there would be no crop. Some years before his death respondent had had a cottage built on decedent's ranch and decedent refused to allow the ceiling to be plastered because the plastering would fall in the night and kill him. Before the house was built, decedent slept on a cot in the barn, and upon one occasion he attacked with a pitchfork a man who was working for him because, as decedent said he was piling bales of hay so they would fall on him and kill him while he was asleep. He attacked a neighbor with a shovel and called him and his daughter vile names because he claimed they were interfering with the water on his place. In none of these cases were his suspicions justified.

Decedent had refused to register to vote for school bonds because wherever there was a school "there was always a minister that bobbed up," and he refused "to be mixed up in any minister's doings." In addition, he said if he registered he would have to be on the jury, and then some one would come and steal his live stock and poison his horses. It appears he had owned some horses that had died, but respondent testified that some of them were shot because of glanders, and the rest died of old age and the way decedent cared for them. There was evidence of other similar irrational acts and statements.

These characteristics alone, although indicative of an unbalanced mind, not being shown to have affected the making of the will, might not be sufficient to establish the want of testamentary capacity. But it further appears that he entertained delusions respecting respondent which so seriously affected his relations with him that they might well have been found to have affected the making of the will. Before 1913 respondent handled decedent's crops for him and marketed them. In that year decedent accused respondent of robbing him of part of his crop and insisted his statement of the crop was not correct. From then on decedent accused respondent, although the latter left the statement with decedent for verification and heard nothing more about it. Respondent stated his account of the crop was true, fair, and honest. Before going to live alone on his ranch, decedent had lived with respondent and his family, but had left them because he thought they were trying to poison him. He accused respondent of stealing eggs, vegetables, and other things from his ranch and of coming down to his place at night, throwing stones on his house, bothering appellants Bert McDonald and Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick, and trying to get their property away from them. He further insisted he had given respondent the ranch the latter occupied. Respondent testified that none of these things was true. He also stated he had tried, without success, to convince decedent that his ideas were mistaken, asking him to come out and chase whoever was throwing rocks on his house, saying he would find respondent in bed at the time. Decedent replied that—

> "Bert says that you want to get me out of here, to kill me, coming down here throwing these stones to get me out here to kill me. That is it."

As further tending to show decedent's inability to understand his relations with those about him is the fact that in his will as executed he made a provision for his sister, Mary Mulock, in case she should leave a convent in which she was living. Will C. Mulock testified that Mary Mulock died in 1919, and that he told decedent of her death in the same year. That decedent had realized she was dead is shown by the fact that he informed respondent of her death before he made the will. Respondent testified decedent once told his mother she was not his mother, but that she had stolen him from some one else. She was unable to convince him he was mistaken.

Respondent and Will C. Mulock testified decedent did not attend to any business matters of any importance, although there is evidence that he bought groceries each week and was able to add the items to the extent of a few dollars. Before the dispute in 1913 over the statement of the crop, respondent took care of his property and crops. After that time Will C. Mulock tended to his affairs. Respondent and Will C. Mulock bought, sold, and leased his property and sold his crops, and Will C. Mulock testified decedent attended to practically no business unaided. He appears to have felt he must consult them about everything, including such matters as registering to vote on the school bonds, above referred to, and as to what attitude he should take on the matter of putting in a road which the community desired to have constructed. Will C. Mulock stated that at one time he sold a piece of decedent's property for $6,500 and tried to get decedent to invest the money in government bonds, which decedent refused to do on the ground the security was not good. Decedent told various persons his brothers handled his business affairs for him, and respondent testified decedent had no business capacity whatever. It also appears that shortly before his death appellant Bert H. McDonald made arrangements for having decedent's orchard fumigated. According to W. M. Northrop, who drew decedent's will, at the time he made it, the following conversation ensued:

> "'Now what other property have you, James?' [besides the ranch and some notes], and he said 'Why, some lots.' and I said, 'What else?' and he said, 'Nothing else.' I said, 'How about any money; do you have that?' 'Oh,' he said, 'I have sometimes some money in the bank, more or less.' I said, 'Then besides these notes that you are giving by the will, and your ranch, you have got the lots and the money; now, what do you want to do with those?' and he says, 'I hadn't thought of that.'"

[1] From the foregoing evidence, we are of the opinion the finding of the jury that decedent did not have testamentary capacity cannot be disturbed. Under the often quoted rule laid down in Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 558, 69 Pac. 294:

> "If he is able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property and his relations to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he had been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he is doing, and the relation in which he stands to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, he has the capacity to make his will."

In the case at bar decedent's fixed attitude of hostility toward respondent, apparently unwarranted, his failure to realize that his sister was dead, and his belief that his mother was not his mother might have persuaded the jury that he did not have an understanding of his relation to the natural objects of his bounty. From the evidence that his brothers attended to all his property matters, the fact that he had no business capacity, his impression that he had given respondent the farm which respondent occupied, and his failure to think of his money when he made his will, the jury might have found he was unable to carry in mind the nature and situation of his property.

We are referred to Estate of Redfield, 116 Cal. 637, 48 Pac. 794, and other cases wherein it was held that lapses from the normal, hallucinations and delusions which do not affect the testamentary disposition are not sufficient grounds for setting aside a will. But, as already pointed out, the peculiarities of mind of the decedent herein were calculated to affect the making of the will and were such as the jury might have found did impair his testamentary capacity.

Appellants lay stress on the testimony of W. M. Northrop, who drew up and witnessed the will, as showing decedent was in possession of all his faculties at the time the will was signed. This testimony merely raises a conflict with that tending to show testamentary incapacity, and we cannot say the jury were bound to accept it as against the evidence offered on behalf of respondent. It is further claimed by appellants that the provision for decedent's sister in the will after decedent knew of her death shows nothing more than a lack of memory. But, in view of decedent's other mental aberrations, his delusions concerning respondent, and his erroneous ideas as to many past occurrences, such as the death of his horses, the jury might have attached greater significance to the provision for the sister than that it was a mere lapse of memory.

In view of our conclusion that the allegations of unsoundness of mind were sustained, it is immaterial whether or not the will was the product of undue influence, and it is unnecessary to discuss the evidence addressed to that issue. Estate of Baker, 176 Cal. 430, 437, 168 Pac. 881.

2. It is insisted the court erred in permitting appellants Bert H. McDonald and Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick to be examined on the subject of a property settlement between respondent and his wife as to the respective parcels and value of property owned by them and in attempting to show the relative wealth of respondent and appellants. The evidence shows that some years previous to decedent's death respondent and his family had become estranged; that respondent and his wife, Lillie H. McDonald, had separated; and that respondent had made a property settlement with her. In paragraph III of the second cause of action of the petition it was alleged that, pursuant to a conspiracy on the part of appellants to secure possession and control of the community property of respondent and his wife and of his separate property, respondent was prevailed upon to enter into the agreement, whereby he was forced to accept certain property in lieu of his interest in the community property; that he assigned to appellant Lillie H. McDonald approximately $150,000; and that he received under the agreement $5,000 worth of property and $75 per month. These allegations of the petition were stricken out on motion of appellants. Part of the evidence objected to consists of testimony of appellant Bert H. McDonald to the effect that the ranch which he, his mother, and respondent formerly occupied stood in the name of his mother and had been deeded to her about 1880 or 1884.

[2] Even if this evidence was irrelevant, appellants could not have been prejudiced by it. The only question objected to in the trial court was the one concerning who, at the time of the trial, was occupying the ranch which appellant Bert H. McDonald, his mother and father, occupied five or six years before, to which the witness replied that it stood in his mother's name. He had previously stated, without objection, that he had lived in Alhambra five or six years, and that prior to that time he had resided with his mother and father on the ranch "that my mother owns in San Marino." This answer was practically the same as that objected to and renders the error, if any, harmless.

[3] Further objection upon the same ground is made to certain testimony elicited from appellant Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick on cross-examination. This witness was called on behalf of the appellants, and on direct examination testified that she had told decedent they had given respondent about $50,000 in property and promissory notes, a life estate in four acres of land, and an allowance of $75 a month; that decedent thought $75 a month was too much money and that respondent should make a living off the four acres. The witness W. M. Northrop had also testified for appellants that decedent told him "Henry has enough" when asked whether he wished to make any provision for respondent in his will. The testimony of Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick, which appellants now insist was erroneously admitted, was brought out, according to a statement of counsel for respondent at the time it was offered, to show her consciousness of the falsity of the statement she made to decedent, as tending to prove the perpetration of a fraud on him. The court stated explicitly that the evidence was purely collateral as a showing of what property the various parties had, was relevant only to indicate the state of mind of decedent, and the jury was directed not to consider it for any other purpose. The testimony objected to was elicited after counsel for respondent asked the witness whether she remembered where and when she got the property she gave to her father. An objection to this question was sustained. Thereupon she was asked if she saw the $50,000 handed over to respondent, and she explained, over an objection, that the $50,000 consisted of three lots in the city of Alhambra, some shares of stock, and notes. She admitted the notes were executed by respondent and made payable to her mother; that until six years previously her father conducted the orange grove where the family lived; that her father and mother were not divorced. Upon her redirect examination she was shown a receipt, signed by respondent, for property purporting to amount to about $50,000, which was offered and received in evidence over respondent's objection as tending to prove the truth of her statement. On recross-examination she stated she did not think she was the owner of property that stood in her mother's name before 1915 or before 1910, but that she had received a conveyance of property from her mother. This testimony, to which the objection was directed, was brought out by counsel for respondent in an endeavor to show the falsity of the receipt; also what the witness knew about it.

[4] At the time this evidence was introduced the issue of fraud had not been withdrawn from the jury. Under that issue it was proper to receive evidence of false statements made to prejudice respondent in the eyes of decedent (Estate of Benton, 131 Cal. 472, 63 Pac. 775), although, as stated by the court, it would have been error to have admitted the testimony to show what property the parties owned, as tending to prove which had the greater natural right to be the object of decedent's bounty (Estate of Kaufman, 117 Cal. 288, 49 Pac. 192, 59 Am. St.

Rep. 179). In view of this circumstance we cannot say the court erred in admitting the testimony in question, which undoubtedly did tend to prove whether or not the representation which appellant Florence McDonald Fitzpatrick made to decedent was fraudulent.

[5] 3. The next assignment of error is to the action of the court in permitting Will C. Mulock, one of the executors and a beneficiary under the will, to be examined as an adverse party under section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, he not having joined in opposing the contest. It is insisted that he should not be considered a party under that section, inasmuch as he was a half-brother of decedent and would receive more property if the will were set aside than he would under it, and that his interests therefore really lay with respondent. This witness was perfectly competent to testify in the case regardless of the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and it is not shown by appellant that any evidence elicited by way of cross-examination under section 2055 would not have been admissible under the general rules of evidence, nor is it shown in what manner appellants were prejudiced, if at all, by this manner of examining the witness. The method of examining witnesses is largely in the control and discretion of the trial court, and, the evidence in question being relevant, it is not important how the examination was characterized. The appellant has shown no prejudicial error in the method of examining this witness.

[6] 4. The court reluctantly permitted the appellant Bert H. McDonald and Will C. Mulock to be asked if the former had not called his father a certain opprobrious name. The purpose of this evidence was to show the hostility of the witness Bert H. McDonald toward respondent, his feelings being a proper subject of inquiry upon cross-examination. In view of the fact that appellants' counsel admitted that such a feeling of hostility existed, and the fact that the record contains abundant evidence of appellant's bitterness toward his father, it cannot be held that proof of the use of the opprobrious term, even if erroneous, would be prejudicial. Restrictions upon the right of cross-examination in this regard result more from the necessity of confining the case to the issues on trial than because of the incompetence of evidence of specific acts of hostility.

[7] 5. Appellants complain of the refusal of the court to give a large number of instructions proposed by them relating to the subjects of insanity and undue influence. The jury was fully instructed on those subjects, and no defect in the charge given is pointed out in the respect covered by the instructions proposed and refused. It is not a sufficient predicate for a claim of error that instructions which properly state the law have been rejected. The assignment must go further and point out wherein the subject of the instruction was not in fact covered by those actually given.

[8] 6. The appellants' sixth assignment of error relates to an instruction with reference to the burden of proof. It is claimed that this instruction was erroneous because it assumed that the instrument was prepared at the instance of one or all of the beneficiaries or proponents, in which event it was declared that the burden was upon the proponents to show that the will was read to the deceased or that the deceased thoroughly understood its contents and that he had a clear conception of his act. The complaint made to this instruction is in the following language:

> "From the foregoing it will be seen that the trial court submitted to the jury the issue as to whether the will in question was prepared at the instance of one or all of the beneficiaries or proponents of the same. * * * This instruction was submitting to the jury an issue of which there was no testimony to support, and the giving of the same could not fail to be reversible error."

There is no merit in this contention. If, as appellants complain, the beneficiaries did not assist in the preparation of the will, the instruction by its own terms was to be disregarded by the jury. On the other hand, there was evidence, as respondent contends, which might have justified the jury in concluding that the will was prepared at the instance of the proponents and of the beneficiaries therein.

The judgment is affirmed.

191 Cal. 172

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. v. BOYLE, Auditor.

(S. F. 10486.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 17, 1923.)

1. Contracts 🔑143—Principal consideration in construction is object to be attained.

In the construction of contracts, the principal factor for consideration is the object to be attained.

2. Health 🔑20—State's duty to protect public from communicable diseases such as tuberculosis.

It is the duty of the state, not only to provide for the care of indigent sick and dependent poor, but to protect the public from infectious or other communicable diseases, such as tuberculosis, special provisions for the care and treatment of persons suffering from which are made by Const. art. 4, § 22, and various statutes.

3. Mandamus 🔑80—Board of Supervisors' finding that zone outside county is preferable for treatment of tuberculosis patients binding on Supreme Court.

A finding by the Board of Supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco that a zone outside the city and county limits possess a more favorable climate and superior surroundings for treatment of tuberculosis patients is conclusive on the Supreme Court in mandamus proceedings to compel the city and county auditor to audit and approve a demand in favor of a neighboring county for preliminary costs and expenses incident to the proposed construction of additional hospital units for the care of such city and county's tuberculosis patients.

4. Evidence 🔑10(1, 12, 14)—Judicial notice of location of city hospital and county sanatorium as bearing on merits as places for treatment of tuberculosis patients.

The Supreme Court may take judicial notice of the geographical positions of the San Francisco General Hospital and the Arroyo Sanatorium, near Livermore, in Alameda county, with reference to their proximity to the sea, the influence of ocean winds on their climate, and the density of the population of each, as bearing on their respective merits as places for the treatment of tuberculosis patients.

5. Hospitals 🔑2—City and county held not inhibited by statute from contracting for care of tuberculosis patients in neighboring county sanatorium.

A city and county might contract to provide for the care of their tuberculosis patients in a neighboring county sanatorium by proceeding under Act July 29, 1921 (St. 1921, p. 542), providing for the joint exercise of powers by counties, cities or both, notwithstanding Act Aug. 2, 1921 (St. 1921, p. 1641), providing for the joint construction, ownership and management of tuberculosis hospitals, to be approved by the state bureau of tuberculosis, as a condition precedent to receiving state aid.

6. Mandamus 🔑172—City's ability to meet future liabilities under proposed construction contract not considered on application for writ to compel auditor's approval of sum set aside for payment of preliminary expenses.

On application for writ of mandate to require the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco to audit and approve a demand for a sum set aside by such city and county for the payment of architect's fees and other expenses incurred by a neighboring county in the preparation of plans and specifications for additional hospital units for the care of the city's tuberculosis patients, pursuant to an agreement under which the city, on approving the construction contract, was to advance the total cost, from which such neighboring county might deduct 4 per cent. annually for depreciation, the question as to the city's ability to meet any future liability or indebtedness under the contract in excess of the revenue provided for the year in which it accrued as required by Const. art. 11, § 18, and City and County Charter, art. 3, c. 3, § 13, cannot be decided, in the absence of any showing that the construction contract had been executed; there being no presumption that the city would not be prepared to meet its future obligations or would not keep within the law.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑871—City's contract to advance cost of additional county hospital units for care of city's tuberculosis patients held not invalid as loan of city's credit.

A city's contract to advance to a neighboring county the total cost of building additional county hospital units for the care of the city's tuberculosis patients, to be held in a special fund, from which the county was to deduct an annual allowance for deterioration, held not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 31, inhibiting loans of money or credit, pledges of credit, or gifts by the city; no debt being created by establishment of a fund from which certain definitely stated sums are to be disbursed for a purpose provided by law.

8. Municipal corporations 🔑63(1)—Whether city's contract is improvident and unwise does not concern courts.

Whether a city's contract, in the exercise of legislative or discretionary powers conferred on it by the Legislature, is improvident or unwise, is of no concern to the courts.

9. Hospitals 🔑2—That sum set aside for hospital construction under contract with neighboring county may be wholly consumed on expiration of contract term does not invalidate contract.

That a gross sum set aside by a city to cover the cost of construction and deterioration of additional hospital units to be constructed by a neighboring county for the care and treatment of the city's tuberculosis patients as provided by a contract between the city and county may be wholly consumed on expiration of the contract term, would not be conclusive proof of a bad bargain and does not invalidate the contract; the presumption being that the city governing body, whose judgment is conclusive in the absence of a showing of want of jurisdiction, bad faith, gross extravagance, or some fact sufficient to vitiate the contract, considered the wisdom and policy of the whole plan in the light of the objects to be attained.

10. Hospitals 🔑2—City may contract for care of tuberculosis patients in hospital constructed and maintained by neighboring county.

A city may contract for the care and treatment of its tuberculosis patients in a hospital constructed and maintained by a neighboring county, where deemed necessary by its governing body in the interest of public health, whether or not the plan adopted could be improved on.

11. Hospitals 🔑2—Contract to advance money to neighboring county for construction of additional hospital units for care of city's tuberculosis patients not invalid because county retained supervisory control.

A city's contract to advance money to a neighboring county for the construction of additional hospital units for the care and treatment of the city's tuberculosis patients, held not invalid because the county retained supervisory control of the entire hospital, including the right to reject or remove patients, there being no presumption that unreasonable rules will be adopted or arbitrary authority exercised.

12. Hospitals 🔑2—City held authorized by charter amendment to contract for care of tuberculosis patients in neighboring county sanatorium.

A contract by the city and county of San Francisco, to advance money to a neighboring county for the construction of additional hospital units for the care and treatment of the city's tuberculosis patients, held within the power conferred on the city by the charter amendment adopted November 7, 1922, approved by the Legislature in January, 1923, and ratified by the board of supervisors, to provide by contract for the maintenance and care of tuberculosis patients in hospitals outside the city and county limits, and hence valid, whether or not the general powers of the city with reference to hospitals are alone sufficient to justify it.

13. Mandamus 🔑172—City and county auditor's inability to certify as to sufficiency of balance of appropriation to pay estimated expenses of executing contract not considered on application for writ to compel approval of money appropriated for expenses preceding execution.

On application for writ of mandate to compel the auditor of the city and county of San Francisco to audit and approve a demand for a sum set aside for the payment of architect's fees and other expenses incurred by a neighboring county in preparing plans and specifications for additional hospital units for the care of the city's tuberculosis patients, pursuant to the city's agreement to advance the total cost of construction, on approving the plans and specifications, and the construction contract, where no estimate had been made of the cost and the tentative agreement made provision for the contingency of the parties' being unable to agree on the amount, the auditor's objection that he would not be able to indorse on the contract his certification that there remained a balance of the appropriation or funds applicable to the contract sufficient to pay the estimated expenses of executing it, as required by City and County Charter, c. 1, art. 3, § 10, cannot be considered.

In Bank.

Application by the City and County of San Francisco and the County of Alameda for writ of mandate requiring Thomas F. Boyle, as Auditor of the City and County of San Francisco, to audit certain demands for expenses incurred under an agreement between such City and County and the County of Alameda. Writ granted.

George Lull, City Atty., of San Francisco, for city and county of San Francisco.

Ezra Decoto, of Oakland, for county of Alameda.

Edward F. Moran, of San Francisco, for Auditor Boyle.

SEAWELL, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of the city and county of San Francisco, to audit and approve a demand allowed and approved by each board and officer of said city whose approval was necessary to its allowance, existing in favor of the county of Alameda in the sum of $5,000 on account of costs and expenses incurred by said county in the preparation of plans and specifications and for the payment of architect's fees incurred for designing and planning certain proposed units to be added to the tuberculosis hospital maintained by the county of Alameda and known as the Arroyo Sanatorium, situate near Livermore, for the use and benefit of the city and county of San Francisco in the care, maintenance, and treatment of its patients affected with tuberculosis, as provided by the terms of an agreement entered into March 8, 1922, between said city and county, a municipal corporation, operating under a freeholders' charter, party of the first part, and the county of Alameda, a political corporation, party of the second part. The auditor claims that said agreement is invalid, and therefore refuses to audit or approve said demand drawn in favor of Alameda county. This proceeding is designed to test the validity of the agreement.

By said agreement the city and county of San Francisco proposes to further obligate itself to make certain payments to the county of Alameda for annual deterioration of said units and to also compensate said county for the care, maintenance, and treatment of its said tubercular patients as will hereafter fully appear. The controversy, which is between the city and county of San Francisco and the county of Alameda joined on the one side, and Thomas F. Boyle, as auditor of said city and county of San Francisco, on the other, is submitted on an agreed statement of facts as provided by sections 1138–1140, Code of Civil Procedure.

In the agreement said city and county is designated "city" and said county of Alameda, "county." We adopt these designations, omitting quotation marks.

It is admitted that every preliminary proceeding required by law to be taken by said city and said county and by the officers of each or both, whether formal or jurisdictional in character, was accordingly taken, and said proceedings are regular and sufficient in every respect, and there was and is sufficient money in the general fund available to pay said demand. In brief, it is conceded that petitioners are entitled to have said writ issue against said auditor, provided said city and county are permitted by law to enter into such an agreement as is here attempted to be enforced.

In a statement of the substance of the agreement which follows, much of its phraseology will be preserved. It recites by way of preamble that the city maintains within its corporate limits a general hospital wherein its sick and disabled inmates are cared for, including a large number affected with tuberculosis. The surroundings within the zone in which said Arroyo Sanatorium is situated are admittedly more favorable to the recovery of persons so afflicted than is the climate of said city. It was therefore the judgment of the city that approximately 60 of its tubercular patients should be cared for in the sanatorium of said county. An agreement was accordingly entered into between said parties by the terms of which said county agrees to construct additional units to its sanatorium for the care of said patients. The city agrees to advance said county a sum of money equal to the total costs of constructing said additional units of sufficient size and capacity to properly care for 60 patients, including fees of architect, superintendence, and construction. The sum so advanced is to be held in a special fund from which said county may deduct each year during the life of the agreement an annual allowance for depreciation and obsolescence of 4 per cent., computed on the total cost of the construction of said units, including the cost of superintendence, inspection, and architect's fees. Immediately upon the execution of the contract, the city shall advance to the county the sum of $5,000, to be held by said county as a fund to cover the costs of the architect's fees for preparing plans and specifications for said additional hospital units, and the county on its part agrees upon payment thereof to immediately cause to be prepared plans and specifications for the construction of said units for the accommodation of approximately 60 patients, and it is to submit said plans and specifications with an estimate of the cost of constructing said units to said city for its approval. Upon approval of said plans and specifications by said city, the county agrees to enter into a contract for the construction of said units in accordance with said plans and specifications, which contract shall also be submitted to said city for its approval. Upon the letting of the contract after approval by said city, the latter is to advance and to pay to the county the amount of money necessary to completely construct said units in accordance with the plans and specifications, including the total amount of architect's fees and costs of superintendence and inspection. No changes or alterations are to be made in the plans and specifications after contract let except with the mutual consent of both parties. If changes be agreed which increase the contract price, said increase is to be borne by the city and paid for upon completion of the contract. If said changes decrease the contract price, the amount of decrease shall be returned by the county to the city upon completion of said contract. Thereupon an adjustment shall be made of the estimated fees paid to the architect and of the moneys paid for superintendence and inspection by the city. Should the estimated amount paid by the city exceed the cost of such services the excess shall be repaid by the county to the city. Should the said estimated amount be less, the city shall pay the difference to the county. It is further agreed that if the parties should be unable to agree on the plans or specifications or the contract, the county shall in no event be required to return to the city any part of said sum of $5,000 paid to it to be applied on account of the architect's fees, to the extent that it has actually incurred a liability for such purposes. The county agrees that it will wholly equip said units at its own cost and expense, and board, maintain, and care for such tubercular patients as the city may send to said sanatorium, not exceeding 50 in number at any one time; the city on its part agrees to pay for the board, maintenance, and medical care of said patients at the rate of $2.87 per day per patient, subject to such modification at the end of each fiscal year as the parties may agree to make and upon failure to agree said rate of $2.87 per patient per day shall remain in full force and effect during the life of the agreement or until otherwise changed by mutual agreement. All payments for maintenance and care of such patients are to be made monthly during the life of the agreement.

The contract is to continue in force and effect for a period of 25 years, unless sooner terminated by mutual consent or by the act of either party thereto by giving one year's notice to the other of its intention to terminate it. The right of either party to terminate is expressly reserved. Upon the termination of said contract by either party prior to the expiration of its full term, the county will return to the city the full amount of money advanced to it to cover the architect's, superintendence, and inspection fees, and the total costs of construction of said units less the annual deduction of 4 per cent. to cover depreciation and obsolescence on the entire cost, including architect's fees, etc.

The administration and control of said sanatorium is to remain exclusively with the county of Alameda, and the city agrees to comply in every way with the rules and regulations of said sanatorium and to conform to the standard of admission adopted by the governing body of said sanatorium. The city agrees to remove any patients whose removal may be requested by the superintendent of said institution, and the patients shall be amenable at all times to the rules and regulations prescribed by the superintendent or governing body thereof. Said rules shall have a uniform application to patients of both parties to the contract. It is also a part of the contract that any sums of money received from the state of California for the care of such tubercular patients as the city may send to said sanatorium may be retained by the city, and if such moneys should be paid by the state to the county the amounts so received shall be credited as payments made from said city for the care of such patients. This concludes a statement of the substance of said contract.

[1-4] The object to be attained is, of course, the principal factor for consideration in the construction of contracts. To make provision for the care of indigent sick and dependent poor is a duty of state and society, so well understood and thoroughly recognized that time devoted to a discussion of the subject would be but little better than wasted. A duty equally as great rests upon the state to protect and guard the health of the public from infectious or other communicable forms of diseases, one of the most widely prevalent of which is tuberculosis. Article 4, § 22, of our state Constitution, and various statutes, make special reference to and provisions for the care and treatment of persons suffering from this dreaded disease. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco in dealing with the question found as a fact that the zone in which it proposes to maintain and care for its patients affected with tuberculosis possesses a more favorable climatic condition and superior surroundings for the successful treatment of the disease than is possessed by said city and county. Without such a finding of fact, which is conclusive on us, we would be permitted to take judicial notice of the geographical position of the two localities with reference to proximity to the sea and the influence of ocean winds on the climate of each and also the density of the population of each considered relatively in respect to areas. In the treatment of pulmonary forms of tuberculosis the main reliance for improvement or cure rests largely upon the accessibility of the patient to pure, fresh air such as altitude and open areas afford. Rest and quiet are other essentials. From recitals found in the agreement the board of supervisors was unquestionably induced or influenced to enter into said contract by a proper consideration for the comfort and welfare of the affected patients, as well as the discharge of a duty which is cast upon it to protect the health of the public.

We shall not discuss the objections made by petitioner in seriatim order inasmuch as many of them are included within or are incidental to the major questions of law which must control the decision.

[5] The authority under which the city justifies its right to make the contract is statutory and became effective July 29, 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 542. The act is brief and is here set out in full, including its title:

> "An act providing for the joint exercise of powers by counties, by municipalities or by municipalities and counties. * * *
> "Section 1. Two or more counties, two or more municipalities or one or more municipalities and one or more counties, by agreement entered into respectively by them and authorized by their legislative bodies, may jointly exercise any power or powers common to the several contracting parties.
> "Sec. 2. Such agreements shall state the purpose of the agreement or the power to be exercised and provide for the method by which the purpose sought shall be accomplished or the manner in which the power shall be exercised.
> "Sec. 3. The parties to such agreement may provide that contributions from the treasuries may be made for the purpose for which the agreement was entered into or payments of public funds shall be made to defray the cost thereof which funds may be made to and disbursed by such agency as may be agreed upon; provided, however, that the method of disbursement shall agree as far as the same is practicable with the method provided by law for the disbursement by the parties to such agreement. Strict accountability of all funds and report of all receipts and disbursements shall be provided for.
> "Sec. 4. Such agreements may be continued for a definite term or until rescinded or terminated and may provide for the method by which the same may be rescinded or terminated by any of the parties thereto.
> "Sec. 5. Such agreement shall provide for the disposition, division or distribution of any property acquired as the result of such joint exercise of powers, and the return of any surplus moneys on hand after the purpose thereof shall be completed in proportion to the contributions made."

It is also a claim of the auditor that the act above set out was superseded by a more elaborate and comprehensive act passed at the same session of the Legislature but at a later date, which act provides for the construction of hospital buildings by groups or cities, counties, or cities and counties, and for the management, maintenance, support, and care of persons affected with tuberculosis. Its title in full is as follows:

> "An act to amend sections two and three of an act entitled 'An act to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a bureau of tuberculosis under the direction of the state board of health; defining its powers and duties; providing for the granting of state aid to cities, counties, cities and counties and groups of counties for the support and care of persons affected with tuberculosis; making an appropriation therefor, and repealing certain acts of the Legislature of the state of California,' approved June 12, 1915, as amended." In effect August 2, 1921. Stats. 1921, p. 1641.

Under the plan outlined by this act the board of supervisors representing each respective county forming said group is empowered to appoint one of its said members as a delegate to represent it. The delegates from the several counties shall constitute a central committee which is given certain powers, acting with other committees of its creation, to superintend the construction of the building, approve the bills, and do the usual things required of a building committee. The central committee constitutes the governing body of the hospital and may make appropriate rules for its government and management. By conforming with the provisions of the statute providing for organization and management every city, county, city and county, or group of counties, which is a member thereof, is entitled to receive from the state the sum of $3 a week for each person suffering from tuberculosis cared for therein at public expense who is unable to pay for his support and has no relative legally liable and financially able to pay for his support and who has been a bona fide resident of the state for one year; provided, that no city, county, city and county, or group of counties shall be entitled to receive state aid unless a tuberculosis ward or hospital conforms to the regulations of and is approved by the state bureau of tuberculosis.

In short, it is the claim of the auditor that cities, counties, cities and counties, desiring to join in a group as provided by said act must conform to the provisions thereof and that such provisions furnish exclusive and, in fact, the only source of authority for legal existence. With this contention we are unable to agree. The acts before us are separate and distinct and provide different methods for the accomplishment of some of the objects common to both. The subjects treated therein are not wholly identical and the more elaborate machinery provided for the operation of one plan or scheme is not appropriate or necessary for the operation of the other. Neither are the acts coextensive in scope. We think, therefore, that each authorizes the adoption of a plan and procedure independent of the other, and that neither one was intended to be exclusive in its operation. By conforming with the regulations approved by the state bureau of tuberculosis as provided by the more recent act, any group of counties organized thereunder is entitled to receive state aid. The evident purpose of said act is not alone to provide for the joint ownership of buildings and real property and the joint management of hospitals by the members of the group who have contributed money to that end but also to place said institution in a limited sense under the supervision of the state board of health. Such a plan of ownership and management does not suit the purposes of the parties to the contract before us. The city, for reasons sufficient to itself, does not purpose or desire to construct buildings or purchase real estate, jointly or at all. Perhaps neither party desires to be placed under state supervision. The city finds that it will be to the advantage of its patients affected with tuberculosis and also to itself to place said patients for care and treatment in a neighboring county. The statute under which the city assumes to act was undoubtedly designed to meet the exigencies of the situation found to exist by the legislative body of said city. We have not been pointed to any authority which inhibits the city from bringing itself within the provisions of the statute under which it desires to operate, and we know of no reason why it should be prevented from doing so.

[6] By the admission of the auditor that the sum of $5,000 is available for and has been set aside for the payment of the architect's fees incurred for the preparation of plans and specifications, the question as to the ability of the city to meet any future liability or indebtedness growing out of said contract in excess of the revenue provided for the year in which said liability accrues as provided in article 11, § 18, State Constitution, and article 3, c. 3, § 13, Charter of the City and County of San Francisco is removed from the case. Whether the city will be able to meet the payment of an undetermined sum equal to the total cost of the construction of the hospital units to fall due on a day in futuro is a question prematurely presented and cannot be decided in this controversy. It has not been made to appear that a contract of any kind has yet been entered into between said city and county for the construction of said units at an agreed price or at all. The contract before us provides for the adjustment of the rights of the parties in case of failure of the parties to agree on plans and specifications and on other essential matters which are to be the subjects of a future contract, but in no event would we be justified in presuming, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the city would not be amply prepared to meet its future obligations or that it will not keep within the law in respect to charter and constitutional restrictions. We are not at liberty to condemn in advance of its preparation and execution the contract to accomplish the general purposes outlined by the agreed statement of facts on suspicion that the city, in carrying it to completion, may incur an indebtedness or liability in any one of the years through which it may extend in excess of the revenue provided for such year without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose, etc., as inhibited by article 11, § 18, State Constitution, and by similar provision of the city charter. The objection urged by the auditor against municipalities engaging in contracts providing for installment payments extending through a series of years and the general constitutional question here raised is elaborately discussed in McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 159, 44 Pac. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191. The city of Fresno entered into a contract with McBean by which he agreed to care for and dispose of the sewage of the city for a period of five years for the sum of $4,900 per annum, payable quarterly. The contract was complied with for a period of three years but before its completion the city refused to further perform. In construing the city's charter provisions and the constitutional inhibition, this court said:

> "In the case of contracts extending over a period longer than one year, it may be readily seen that the municipality is abundantly protected, and that it is the contractor therewith who subjects himself to peril and risk of loss. If there are not revenues for any given year sufficient and available for the payment of his claims for that year, those claims become waste paper, and are not carried over as a charge against the income and revenue of a succeeding year. * * * When it is come to consider the contractual relations between the city and appellant, it is at once seen that the city cannot be liable in any one year for more than four thousand nine hundred dollars, an amount far within the revenue derived from the sewer fund; and, further, that it cannot become liable for this amount at all until faithful service rendered by the contractor each year. If the city in any one year should fail to collect into its sewer fund moneys sufficient to pay the just claims of the contractor, then, as above said, it would be the contractor's loss, the city would be chargeable with no financial responsibility therefor, and the result at the most, so far as it was concerned, would be a failure upon the part of its officers to observe good faith in their dealings. * * * We base our views upon the conviction that, at the time of entering into the contract, no debt or liability is created for the aggregate amount of the installments to be paid under the contract, but that the sole debt or liability created is that which arises from year to year in separate amounts as the work is performed."

The court adopts the language of Chief Justice Field in State v. McCauley, 15 Cal. 429, where the question is elaborately argued and fully considered. Article 8 of the Constitution, as it then stood, inhibited the Legislature from creating any debts or liabilities in any manner which would exceed the sum of $300,000 except under certain specified contingencies within which the contract there considered could not be brought. The state made a contract for the care of its prison, for convict labor, etc., for the period of 25 years, agreeing to pay therefore the sum of $10,000 per month. Chief Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> "The unconstitutionality of the act is asserted on two grounds: (1) That it appropriated the sum of six hundred thousand dollars, and thus created a debt or liability against the people of the state exceeding the limit prescribed by the eighth article of the Constitution. * * * The contract provides for the payment of $10,000 a month, and the act appropriates this sum per month. The appropriations are to take effect, and the services are to be rendered, in future. Until the services are rendered there can be no debt on the part of the state. The lessee could not have claimed, at any time after the making of the contract, the aggregate of all the monthly installments, because the state never owed him that amount. The state only became indebted as the services were each month performed. * * * The eighth article was intended to prevent the state from running into debt, and to keep her expenditures, except in certain cases, within her revenues. These revenues may be appropriated in anticipation of their receipt as effectually as when actually in the treasury. The appropriation of the moneys when received meets the services as they are rendered, thus discharging the liabilities as they arise, or rather anticipating and preventing their existence. The appropriation accompanying the services operates, in fact, in the nature of a cash payment."

Continuing, the court said:

> "This interpretation, after further consideration and argument, was reaffirmed in McCauley v. Brooks, 16 Cal. 1, and again in Koppikus v. State Capitol Com'rs, 16 Cal. 248. In People v. Arguello, 37 Cal. 524, it is said: 'A sum payable upon a contingency is not a debt, or does not become a debt until the contingency has happened.'"

See, also, Coulter Dry Goods Co. v. Wentworth, 171 Cal. 509, 153 Pac. 939; Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 181, 76 Pac. 958; Fresno etc. Co. v. McKenzie, 135 Cal. 497, 67 Pac. 900; Higgins v. San Diego, 131 Cal. 298, 63 Pac. 470; Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 Pac. 824, 50 Pac. 670; San Francisco Gas Co. v. Brickwedel, 62 Cal. 642.

[7] The objection that the contract permits of the loaning of the credit of the city in violation of article 4, § 31, of the Constitution, is not supported by the facts of this case. There is no loan of either money or credit, or the pledging of the credit, or the making of any gift within the inhibition of said section. The setting aside, of a fund by the city equal to the building cost of a hospital for the city's use and benefit in its construction, and the annual allowances for deterioration is but conforming to the usual course of business in estimating allowances for inevitable loss occasioned by usage and the elements. Included in the allowance for obsolescence was considered, no doubt, the right of enjoyment of the occupancy of said hospital by the city's patients. It may be said with equal force as it was said in Veterans' Welfare Board v. Jordan, etc. (Cal. Sup.) 208 Pac. 284, 22 A. L. R. 1515, that as no debt whatever is created there can be no loan of credit. The city proposes merely to establish a fund from which certain, definitely-stated sums are to be disbursed for a purpose provided by law.

[8] The argument that the agreement is an improvident and unwise one for the city to make is one often heard in opposition to municipal contracts. It is effectually answered by a restatement of the rule that—

> "When the Legislature has committed to a municipal body the power to legislate on given subjects or has committed to it judgment or discretion as to matters upon which it is authorized to act, courts of equity have no power to interfere with such a body in the exercise of its legislative or discretionary functions. That the power conferred on the board of supervisors by law relative to the purchase of land for a hospital site, the erection of hospital buildings and their equipment, is both legislative and discretionary in character is not open to dispute. The law cast upon the board the duty of determining whether in its judgment the public necessity required that the county should acquire a new county hospital and conferred upon it the power necessary to accomplish this if it should so determine. * * * Whether, in the exercise of legislative powers a board acts wisely or unwisely is no concern of the courts." Nickerson v. San Bernardino, 179 Cal. 522, 177 Pac. 467.

See, also, 7 Cal. Jur. § 42, pp. 450, 451; Stockton Railroad Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147, 168; Los Angeles County v. Dodge, 51 Cal. App. 492, 197 Pac. 403.

[9] The fact that any gross sum which the city may set aside for said uses may be wholly consumed upon the expiration of the full term of said contract was no doubt fully considered and weighed by both parties, together with all matters pertinent to their engagements. Such a result would not of itself be conclusive proof of a bad bargain on the part of the city. The fund may become depleted at the expiration of the contract term and still substantial benefit may have accrued to both parties thereto. In forming its judgment it must be presumed that the city considered the wisdom and policy of the whole plan in the light of the objects to be attained. The answer to adverse criticism is that the judgment of the city is conclusive, in the absence of a showing of want of jurisdiction on the part of the city or a showing of bad faith on the part of its officers or gross extravagance or the existence of some fact sufficient to vitiate the contract.

[10, 11] We find nothing in the organic or statutory law of this state forbidding the use of public buildings belonging to one county by another for administrative purposes. Direct authority can be found permitting it in cases of emergency or necessity. The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco determined it to be necessary in the interest of public health that a limited number of its patients, affected with tuberculosis, should be transferred to a hospital or sanatorium of a neighboring county. Whether the plan adopted could be improved upon is not a question for our determination. Any method or system devised would be subject to criticism. However, this may be, we are unable to see any legal objection to the plan proposed. Neither has it been made clear that the proposed plan should be declared invalid for the reason that the county retains supervisory control of the hospital. Any institution designed for treatment of persons affected with tuberculosis must from necessity be under the direction and management of skilled, efficient persons. There doubtless exist good reasons for protecting persons who are suffering in the incipient stage from those who are suffering in the more advanced stages, thus requiring rules of classification according to the stages of the disease. There may also be good reasons for the rejection or removal of patients whose reception or retention would endanger the welfare of others. Reasonable rules and regulations are highly essential to the successful management of a sanatorium. It cannot be presumed that unreasonable rules will be adopted or that arbitrary authority will be exercised in any respect. The agreement expressly provides that all rules to govern the institution shall operate uniformly upon the patients of both parties to the contract. It is to be expected that a sanatorium or hospital maintained for the care and treatment of persons affected with tuberculosis would require a different kind of skill in administering treatment, in superintendence and management than would be required by a county institution for the care of persons suffering from ordinary ailments.

[12] Since the execution of the agreement before us a charter amendment was adopted by the voters of the city and county of San Francisco, authorizing the city to—

> "provide by contract for the maintenance and care of such tubercular patients in hospitals outside the limits of the city and county owned, operated or maintained by other cities, counties or cities and counties, or may by contract with other cities, counties or cities and counties provide for the joint ownership, operation, maintenance and control of a hospital or hospitals for the treatment of persons suffering from tuberculosis."

The amendment above referred to was adopted by the voters of said city and county November 7, 1922, and approved by the Legislature in January, 1923. The board of supervisors of the city have since ratified the contract, and thus have exercised the power conferred upon the city by the charter. The contract is thus clearly within the power thus conferred, and we need look no further, although it is contended that the general powers of the city with reference to hospitals was sufficient authority to justify the contract without the amendment to the charter.

[13] The objection made by the auditor that he will not be able to indorse upon said contract his certification that there remains unexpended and unapplied a balance of the appropriation or funds applicable to said contract sufficient to pay the estimated expenses of executing the same, as required by section 10, art. 3, c. 1, of the City's Charter, is not a question now before us for decision. No estimate has yet been made of the cost of the construction of said, units, inasmuch as the contemplated project has not progressed to that stage. The plans and specifications, when prepared, will furnish the city with the necessary information, to wit, the amount necessary to be set aside for the construction of said units. It may be great or small. Possibly the parties will be unable to agree upon the amount and such a contingency as this is provided for by the tentative agreement.

Upon a full consideration of the questions presented we are of the opinion that the writ of mandate should issue commanding said auditor to approve and allow said demand for the sum of $5,000, to be used for the purpose described in the petition.

The writ will accordingly issue.

RODRIGUEZ v. SEVERINI. (Civ. 2603.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 11, 1923.)

1. Assault and battery 🔑40—Damages for personal injuries held inadequate.

Where plaintiff, a man of 80 years, by reason of assault and battery by defendant, had incurred hospital expense in the sum of $115, doctor's bill in the sum of $128, and drug bills in the sum of $22.40, a verdict awarding him $128 for physician's service and $9.25 for drugs was clearly inadequate; the evidence showing that as a result of his injuries plaintiff, who had been receiving $75 a month as janitor, had become partially paralyzed, and permanently incapacitated from work.

2. Appeal and error 🔑979(5)—Granting of new trial on conflicting evidence not disturbed unless clearly wrong.

An order granting a new trial for inadequacy of verdict for damages will not be disturbed where the evidence was conflicting on material issues, unless the court can clearly find that a verdict favorable to the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in the evidence adduced.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Joe Rodriguez against Simone Severini. Verdict was rendered for plaintiff in an insufficient amount, and from an order granting to plaintiff a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin and W. P. Rich, both of Marysville, for appellant.

Crofton & Wetmore, of Marysville, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an appeal by defendant from an order granting plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The complaint alleges that the defendant "wrongfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and violently assaulted plaintiff, and struck him in the face, and knocked him down upon said sidewalk, severely and permanently injuring said plaintiff"; that by reason thereof the plaintiff incurred hospital expenses in the sum of $115, doctor's bills in the sum of $128, and drug bills in the sum of $22.40 and was otherwise damaged in the sum of $10,000. The jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for "$128 special damages for physician's services," and "$9.25 special damages for drugs."

[1] At the time the injury was inflicted the plaintiff was 80 years of age and the defendant was "an able-bodied, vigorous man in middle age." While in conversation with a third man on the street, the defendant accidentally stepped on plaintiff's foot, whereupon the latter remonstrated, and, in an altercation which followed, the blow was struck of which complaint is made. Defendant's blow caused the plaintiff to fall to the sidewalk, his face striking the pavement. Either from the blow or the fall the plaintiff was rendered unconscious. The attending physician testified that plaintiff was partially paralyzed as a result of the injury, and that his injuries are permanent. He was receiving $75 a month as janitor of a bank, and the physician testified that, in his opinion, plaintiff would never be able to work again. It is apparent that, if plaintiff was entitled to recover, the damages awarded are inadequate.

The defendant testified that when the blow was struck the plaintiff was endeavoring to strike him, and that he struck the plaintiff to prevent the latter from striking defendant, and that he did not strike plaintiff with his closed fist. He and another witness illustrated the manner in which the blow was struck, but the character of the illustration does not appear in the record. The plaintiff's condition at the trial was such that he could not give an intelligible account of the encounter.

From the testimony of other witnesses it appears that, when the plaintiff fell to the sidewalk, the defendant walked rapidly away; that he made some resistance when arrested shortly thereafter by an officer, so that the latter found it necessary to strike defendant on the head with a billy; that he admitted to the officer that he struck plaintiff, and when the officer asked why he did so the defendant replied, "It is none of your damned business," and that, on being taken before the police court, the defendant entered a plea of guilty to a charge of battery upon plaintiff.

[2] The evidence was such as to warrant a verdict for either party.

"We may not disturb such an order where there was a conflict of evidence upon material issues unless we may say that a verdict in favor of the moving party would not have found sufficient legal support in the evidence adduced at the trial." Empire Investment Co. v. Mort, 169 Cal. 732, 736, 147 Pac. 960, 962.

The order is affirmed.

PICKWICK STAGES, NORTHERN DIVISION, v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF EL PASO DE ROBLES et al. (Civ. 3611.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Oct. 29, 1921.)

1. Damages ⚿87(2)—Party whose judgment for actual damages is reversed cannot recover exemplary damages.

Under Civ. Code, § 3294, allowing exemplary damages only in addition to actual damages, a defendant, whose judgment for compensatory damages on cross-complaint was reversed, could not recover exemplary damages, there being no existing judgment for actual damages.

2. Damages ⚿87(1)—Whether exemplary damages should be awarded is within discretion of jury or court.

Under Civ. Code, § 3294, as to exemplary damages, it is the exclusive province of the jury, or court sitting as a jury, to say whether or not punitive damages should be awarded, even on the clearest and most conclusive proof of oppression, fraud, or malice, or where the existence of such facts are found by the jury or court itself.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; T. A. Norton, Judge.

Action by Pickwick Stages, Northern Division, a corporation, against the Board of Trustees of the City of El Paso De Robles, San Luis Obispo county, Cal., and others. From a judgment in an insufficient amount for defendant J. E. Price on his cross-complaint, he appeals. Affirmed.

S. V. Wright, of San Luis Obispo, and Alex. Webster, of Paso Robles, for appellant.

Fogel & Beman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Upon a cross-complaint filed by defendant Price in the above-entitled action, he, in default of an answer filed by plaintiff, had judgment for compensatory damages in the sum of $3,500. The court made an omnibus finding that "each and every allegation, part, and paragraph of defendant's cross-complaint is true in every particular." In paragraph 12 of the cross-complaint it was alleged:

"That the further sum of $5,000 is a reasonable sum to be allowed to this cross-plaintiff herein as exemplary damages herein, by way of example and as a punishment for the oppression, fraud, and malice practiced, shown, and inflicted by cross-defendant upon and toward cross-plaintiff, and hereinbefore particularly set forth and described."

[1] The contention of appellant is that, inasmuch as the court found that $5,000 was a reasonable sum to be allowed to cross-complainant as exemplary damages, he was therefore entitled, upon such finding, to a judgment for said sum, instead of which the court, in rendering judgment against plaintiff and for cross-complainant, restricted the same to the actual damages sustained from the conduct and acts, of plaintiff of which he complained. The statute (section 3294, Civil Code) provides that, in addition to actual damages, a plaintiff, for the breach of an obligation not arising from contract, and where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, may recover exemplary damages by way of punishment of a defendant. Concededly there could be no recovery of exemplary damages in the absence of a showing that actual damages had been suffered. While cross-complainant Price, as stated, had judgment for $3,500 compensatory damages, such judgment was, on an appeal therefrom by plaintiff, reversed by this court in an opinion filed on the 28th day of October, 1921. By reason of such reversal it follows there is no judgment for actual damages, in addition to which appellant could be entitled to punitive damages.

[2] We may further suggest that, conceding facts to have been established under which there might have been a judgment for punitive damages, nevertheless cross-complainant was not entitled thereto as a matter of right. Even upon the clearest and most conclusive proof of oppression, fraud, or malice practiced by plaintiff, or where the existence of such facts are found by a jury, or a court trying the facts, it is still the exclusive province of the jury or the court sitting as a jury to say whether or not punitive damages shall be awarded. Lewis v. Hayes, 165 Cal. 527, 132 Pac. 1022, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 148; Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 116 Pac. 530. So, conceding the finding to be one of fact (as to which, however, we entertain grave doubt), and establishing the existence of fraud, malice, and oppression practiced by plaintiff in the breach of an obligation not arising upon contract, nevertheless, since such damages are not a matter of right, the court was fully warranted as a conclusion of law in withholding an award thereof.

Upon the record presented, the judgment, in so far as it fails to award punitive damages to cross-complainant Price, is affirmed.

HILDEBRAND et al. v. MARTIN et al. (Civ. 4063.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 10, 1923.)

Appeal and error 🔑1195(4)—Judgment restraining sale under alias execution reversed as in conflict with Supreme Court's decision directing sale under original execution.

Where the Supreme Court, in a case involving the same parties, subject-matter, and legal situation, directed the trial court to order a sale of the property involved under execution, a judgment restraining a sale under an alias execution, which the Supreme Court expressly decided should not have issued, will be reversed, though apparently of no effect as against appellants, who are at liberty to proceed under the original execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Suit by Ernest H. Hildebrand and another against George J. Martin and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Stoney, Rouleau, Stoney & Palmer and Paul A. McCarthy, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This appeal is from a judgment on the pleadings, which judgment perpetually enjoined the defendants George J. Martin and Thomas F. Finn, as sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, from selling, under an execution previously issued, certain real property located in the city and county of San Francisco and described in the complaint herein.

The facts appearing from the pleadings are the identical facts considered by our Supreme Court in the recent case of Martin v. Hildebrand (S. F. No. 9802), decided January 31, 1923, and reported in 212 Pac. 618. The conclusions reached in said case conclusively dispose of the appeal in the instant case. It was decided in the said case of Martin v. Hildebrand, supra, which involved the same parties, the same subject-matter, and the same legal situation, that an order directing a sale of the said property under execution should have been made by the trial court, and said court was directed to make such order. The present judgment granting a perpetual injunction against the defendants from proceeding with such sale is therefore erroneous.

The oral argument made by respondents upon the hearing of this case in this court, to the effect that the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Martin v. Hildebrand, supra, is inapplicable here because the sale herein restrained is a sale under the alias execution issued in January, 1921, and not a sale under the original execution issued in September, 1920, is without merit. This is because the decision in Martin v. Hildebrand, supra, expressly decides that the alias execution was not issued upon the motion of the present appellants, and should not have issued, and that the appellants herein are entitled to proceed under the original execution levied in September, 1920, before the transfer of the property by the judgment debtors. As the judgment in the present case merely restrains a sale by the sheriff under the alias execution issued in January, 1922, and the order issuing said alias execution made by the trial court has been reversed by our Supreme Court, it would appear that the judgment in the instant case, restraining a sale thereunder could be of no force and effect as against the appellants herein, and that they are at liberty to proceed under the original execution issued in September in accordance with the decision in Martin v. Hildebrand, supra. However, to avoid all confusion, and keep the record clear, it is perhaps advisable that the judgment herein be reversed in accordance with the principles enunciated in Martin v. Hildebrand, supra. It is so ordered.

SHANK v. BLACKBURN et al. (Civ. 4118.)

1. Appeal and error 🔑356 — Appeal taken after expiration of period allowed must be dismissed.

An appeal taken more than 2 years after expiration of the 60 days allowed by the Code must be dismissed.

2. Appeal and error 🔑14(2)—No appeal from "amended judgment," in words of original judgment as amended and affirmed on appeal.

No appeal lies from an "amended judgment," which is the same as the court's original judgment as amended and affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

3. Appeal and error 🔑801(4)—Record examined, on motion to dismiss appeal, where mere inspection shows no relief can be given appellant.

While the appellate court will not ordinarily entertain a motion to dismiss an appeal, if it involves examination of the record in advance of the hearing on the merits, it will make such examination, to save unnecessary delay and expense to litigants, where a mere inspection of the record shows that no relief can be given appellants.

4. Appeal and error 🔑14(2)—Parties not appealing in time cannot appeal from "amended judgment," which is merely original judgment, as modified and affirmed on appeal.

Where the appellate court, instead of directing the lower court to enter an amended judgment, makes its own judgment and thus ends the litigation, parties not appealing from the original judgment within the time allowed cannot appeal from an "amended judgment," which is merely the original judgment, as modified and affirmed on appeal.

5. Appeal and error 🔑356—Where appeal is not taken in time, appellate court cannot reverse, even if record fails to show that lower court acquired jurisdiction of appellants.

Where an appeal is not taken in time to confer jurisdiction on the appellate court, it cannot reverse the judgment, even if the record fails to show that the lower court acquired jurisdiction of appellants' persons.

6. Appeal and error 🔑662(2)—Judgment reciting appearance of attorneys for defendants shows jurisdiction of all defendants, notwithstanding failure to serve some with summons and absence of answer or demurrer.

A judgment reciting that certain named attorneys appeared for "the defendants" showed that the court acquired jurisdiction of the persons of all the defendants, notwithstanding failure to serve two of them with summons and absence from the record of any answer or demurrer by them.

Action by William Shank against P. C. Blackburn and others. Judgment for plaintiff amended and affirmed on appeal (53 Cal. App. 620, 200 Pac. 762) in which defendants O. V. Blackburn and another did not join, and they appeal from both the original and amended judgment. Appeals dismissed.

Turner & Grainger, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank C. Hill and George S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a motion to dismiss the appeals of the defendants O. V. Blackburn and Fredericka Blackburn, who have appealed from the original judgment, entered May 10, 1920, and likewise from what purports to be an amended judgment, entered August 24, 1922. Their appeals were taken September 15, 1922.

The action is one of claim and delivery in which several persons besides O. V. Blackburn and Fredericka Blackburn were made parties defendant. On May 10, 1920, a judgment was entered against all of the defendants; the lower court adjudging that the plaintiff "recover of the defendants and each of them" the possession of the personal property sought to be replevied, and in case a delivery cannot be had that he "recover of said defendants and each of them" the sum of $1,499, the value of the property. The defendants P. C. Blackburn, Howard A. Kline (sued as John Doe), and Bertha E. Kline (sued as Jane Doe) took an appeal from that judgment within 60 days from its entry. Neither of the two defendants whose appeals respondent is now moving to dismiss joined in that appeal. The appeal so taken by P. C. Blackburn and the Klines was heard by Division 1 of the District Court of Appeal for this district, and was determined by that court on July 21, 1921; its judgment being as follows:

> "The judgment [of the superior court] is hereby modified as of the date of entry thereof by striking out the words 'fourteen hundred ninety-nine ($1,499.00) dollars,' and substituting therefor the words 'twelve hundred fifty and 57/100ths dollars ($1,250.57).' As thus amended, the judgment is affirmed." 53 Cal. App. 620, 200 Pac. 762.

On August 24, 1922, there was entered in the judgment book kept by the clerk of the superior court a document, signed by one of the judges of that court, which purports to be an amended judgment. The preamble to this second judgment by the superior court recites the judgment of the District Court of Appeal. Then follows what purports to be the amended judgment, which, word for word, is the same as the superior court's original judgment as the same had previously been amended and affirmed by the District Court of Appeal.

[1] The motion to dismiss the appeals must be granted. The appeal from the original judgment was not taken by these appellants until long after the time provided by law. It was taken more than 2 years after the expiration of the 60 days allowed by the Code for an appeal from a judgment.

[2] No appeal lies from what purports to be the amended judgment of the superior court, entered August 24, 1922. As we have pointed out, these appellants did not join in the appeal from the original judgment, which was taken by their codefendants on September 27, 1920. When the original judgment of the superior court was modified by the District Court of Appeal, and affirmed, as modified, the litigation was over, and the case was ended. Heinlen v. Beans, 73 Cal. 240, 14 Pac. 855.

[3, 4] The rule that this court will not ordinarily entertain a motion to dismiss which involves an examination of the record in advance of the hearing on the merits is but a rule of convenience, to expedite the dispatch of business; and where a mere inspection of the record discloses that no relief can be given to the appellant, this court, to save unnecessary delay and expense to litigants, will not hesitate to make the necessary examination. Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v.

Doran, 161 Cal. 118, 118 Pac. 526. A mere cursory inspection of the record before us suffices to show that the so-called amended judgment which the superior court undertook to enter on August 24, 1922, is precisely the same as that which had been made by the District Court of Appeal, when that court modified the original judgment, and affirmed it as modified. The time for appeal from the original judgment having expired, and the judgment of the District Court of Appeal having ended the litigation, the right to appeal could not be revived by the simple expedient of entering what purports to be an amended judgment, but which is nothing other than the original judgment, as previously modified and affirmed on appeal. See Heinlen v. Beans, supra.

Appellants have cited us to authorities in which the appellate court, instead of modifying the judgment, and affirming it, as modified, sent the case back, with directions to the lower court to make and enter a new or amended judgment in accordance with the directions. An appeal may be taken from such new or amended judgment for the reason that there may be a question whether it was made by the lower court as directed. But here the lower court was not directed to enter a new or amended judgment. The appellate court, instead of giving directions to the lower court to enter an amended judgment, made its own judgment, and thus ended the litigation.

[5] The record before us, consisting of the judgment roll only, fails to show either the issuance or the service of summons. It also fails to show that any answer or demurrer was filed by either of these appellants. Indeed, respondent has stipulated that, as a matter of fact, no summons ever was served upon either appellant. Wherefore it is claimed that the judgment appears, on the face of the roll, to be void as to these appellants for want of jurisdiction of their persons. It further is argued that, where the judgment is void on the face of the roll, it may be reversed on appeal at any time. In effect, appellants' contention is tantamount to the claim that, if a judgment be void on its face, there is no limit to the time for taking an appeal. The basis for this position, if we rightly understand appellants' argument, is substantially this: An appeal from a judgment is a direct attack thereon (Eichhoff v. Eichhoff, 107 Cal. 42, 48, 40 Pac. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 110); in a direct attack upon a judgment the record must sustain it (Sichler v. Look, 93 Cal. 600, 29 Pac. 220); if the judgment is void on the face of the roll, it may be set aside at any time and in any appropriate mode (People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 Pac. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 448).

[6] Without doubt one who has succeeded in conferring jurisdiction upon the appellate court by taking an appeal in time may successfully attack the judgment on such appeal, if the record fails to show that the lower court acquired jurisdiction of his person. But here the appeal was not taken in time to confer upon this court jurisdiction of the appeal. We therefore are without power to reverse the judgment, even if it be true that the record fails to show that the lower court acquired jurisdiction of the persons of these appellants. But as a matter of fact the record before us does not fail to show that the lower court had acquired jurisdiction. Although it does not show that either appellant was served with summons, or that either of them filed an answer or demurrer, and although it is conceded by respondent that no summons was in fact issued or served, nevertheless it is expressly recited in the judgment that certain named attorneys appeared for "the defendants"—which, of course, means all of the defendants. An appearance by these appellants could have been made by written notice. But a notice of appearance is not a part of the judgment roll. Hence the failure to serve these appellants with summons and the absence from the record of any answer or demurrer by them is not inconsistent with the fact, recited in the judgment, that "the defendants" appeared by certain named attorneys. Brown v. Caldwell, 13 Cal. App. 29, 108 Pac. 874 See, also, Estate of Pendergast, 143 Cal. 135, 139, 76 Pac. 962.

If, in fact, jurisdiction of the persons of O. V. Blackburn and Fredericka Blackburn was not acquired and if for that reason the original judgment, as modified and affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, or the so-called amended judgment, which was entered in the superior court on August 24, 1922, was void as to those defendants, then they are, of course, entitled to relief from such void judgment or judgments. But, for the reasons which we have stated, no relief can be given to them on these appeals.

The appeals are dismissed.

Ex parte HADELER. (Cr. 1120.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 11, 1923.)

Licenses 🔑15(1) — City of San Francisco cannot require payment of sanitary inspection fee by grocerymen.

In view of San Francisco City and County Charter, art. 2, c. 2, § 1, subd. 15, prohibiting the imposition of license taxes on persons selling or manufacturing goods, etc., at fixed places of business, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners under chapter 3 or article 8, c. 4, § 7, an ordinance requiring grocerymen to pay a sanitary inspection fee before issuance of certificates by the board of health is invalid, notwithstanding Const. art. 11, § 11, authorizing counties, cities, etc., to make and enforce local sanitary regulations not in conflict with general laws.

Application by William Hadeler for writ of habeas corpus directed to the Sheriff of the City and County of San Francisco. Writ granted, and petitioner discharged.

Costello & Costello and E. R. Hoerchner, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., Asst. City Atty., of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The petitioner herein was convicted of a violation of Ordinance No. 5398, New Series, as amended by Ordinance 5490, New Series, of the city and county of San Francisco. The petitioner conducts a grocery store in the city and county of San Francisco. Under the above-mentioned ordinances any place used for the handling, manufacturing, or sale of foodstuffs in said municipality is required to be inspected by the board of public health to determine whether it is sanitary and in order to do business is required to have issued to its proprietor a certificate by the said board of health upon such inspection, which certificate must be annually renewed. Section 2 of the amended ordinance provides that—

> "For the purpose of defraying the cost of making such inspection and issuing the certificate provided for in this ordinance, a fee of five dollars is hereby imposed and shall be collected by the Board of Health prior to the issuance of such certificate."

The petitioner, having failed and refused to pay said inspection fee, was arrested, tried, and convicted of a violation of said ordinances as above stated. The sole question presented upon his application for this writ is as to the power of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to impose upon those who engage in the grocery business the license tax, fee, or charge provided for in these ordinances, and which the petitioner has refused to pay.

In support of his contention herein the petitioner directs our attention to the case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, 159 Cal. 702, 115 Pac. 651, wherein the provisions of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco relating to the power of the board of supervisors in the matter of the imposition of license fees and taxes were the subject of review. Subdivision 15 of section 1, chapter 2, article 2 of said charter provides that the board of supervisors shall have power "to impose license taxes and to provide for the collection thereof; but no license taxes shall be imposed upon any person, who, at any fixed place of business in the city and county, sells or manufactures goods, wares or merchandise, except such as require permits from the board of police commissioners as provided in this charter." It is conceded that the keepers of grocery stores are not within the enumerated list of persons who are required to obtain permits from the board of police commissioners under the provisions of chapter 3 or of section 7 of chapter 4 of article 8 of said charter and hence do not come within the exception in the above-quoted subdivision. The case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, supra, is in that respect parallel to the case at bar. In construing the meaning to be given to the phrase "license tax" as used in said subdivision of the charter, the Supreme Court held that said phrase as used therein included both regulatory and revenue charges, and further held that it was the intention of the charter makers in the adoption of the foregoing subdivision "to make it very clear that no license charges, fee, or tax of any kind should be imposed on any person selling or manufacturing goods, wares, or merchandise at a fixed place of business in the city and county, unless the business to be conducted by such person was one which they considered it necessary to regulate by charter provision requiring the consent of the police commissioners as a condition precedent to the doing of business." Under this interpretation of the scope and meaning of the foregoing subdivision of the charter, we are constrained to hold that the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco have no power to impose the license charge or fee upon the petitioner as a condition of engaging in the grocery business in said municipality, and that said ordinances, in so far as they attempt so to do, must be held to be void. The respondent, however, makes the contention that notwithstanding the direct inhibition of subdivision 15 of said charter above set forth the board of supervisors had power to adopt the ordinances in question under and by virtue of section 11 of article 11 of the state Constitution, which provides that—

> "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

In support of this contention our attention is called to the case of Odd Fellows Cemetery Ass'n v. San Francisco, 140 Cal. 226, 73 Pac. 987. That was a case wherein the question arose as to the power of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to pass an ordinance prohibiting the interment of dead bodies within the limits of said municipality, and the point at issue was as to whether the board of supervisors possessed such power in the absence of an express charter provision granting such power to it; and in passing upon this question the Supreme Court held that under and by virtue of the foregoing clause in the state Constitution the board of supervisors had been invested, by virtue of its police powers, with power to pass the ordinance in question in that case.

Our attention is further directed by the respondent to the case of In re Pfahler, 150 Cal. 71, 88 Pac. 270, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, 11 Ann. Cas. 911, in which the question arose as to the power of the city of Los Angeles to adopt and enforce an initiative ordinance prohibiting, except within certain defined limits, the killing or slaughtering of animals within said city, the flesh of which was to be sold or offered for sale, or eaten. It was contended that inasmuch as the city charter had invested the council with the legislative power of the city and had in so doing enumerated certain matters as the proper subjects of police regulation, it had by so doing limited its power through initiative legislation to deal with the subject covered by the initiative ordinance under review. The Supreme Court, however, held that the city possessed, under the direct grant of the state Constitution above referred to, the full power to pass such legislation, notwithstanding the limitations of the city charter and in so doing approved and applied the doctrine laid down in the case of Odd Fellows Cemetery Ass'n v. City and County of San Francisco, supra. Both of these decisions of the Supreme Court were prior to its decision in the case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, supra, and in deciding said last-named case the court makes no reference to the Odd Fellows Cemetery Case and only a passing and somewhat obscure reference to the Pfahler Case. In the later case, however, of In re Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 Pac. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130, the Supreme Court gave its consideration to all three of these prior cases and undertook to differentiate between them. In the last-cited case the question arose as to the power of the city council of Los Angeles to pass and enforce an ordinance prohibiting the erection and maintenance of a lumber yard within the residence district of said city, and the contention of the petitioner therein was that the enumeration in the charter of Los Angeles of certain trades, callings, and occupations, which may be prohibited by ordinances of the city council, constituted a limitation upon the power of said legislative body to pass ordinances prohibiting or restricting the location within said city of any other classes of business than those embraced within such enumeration. It was argued that the makers of the charter, by specifying certain occupations which might be prohibited or restricted, withheld from the city council the power to prohibit any others not within such specification. The Supreme Court, however, held that under the constitutional provision above referred to, the legislative body of said city was not limited in the exercise of its police power to the enumeration contained in said charter. In arriving at this conclusion the court reviewed and distinguished its foregoing decisions and in so doing pointed out that in the case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, supra, the court was passing upon the place of lodgment of the power of the city and not upon the limitation of the power itself, and was discussing the power of the board of supervisors to impose a certain restriction which under the limitations placed upon said board as a legislative body it was not authorized to enact. In commenting upon the Pfahler Case, supra, and upon its approval therein of the Odd Fellows Cemetery Ass'n Case, the court called attention to the fact that it was not therein deciding that the charter of a city might not by express provision limit the powers which its legislative body might exercise, but was only intending to decide that a charter provision could not limit or cut down the constitutional power of a city itself to enact police regulations under the direct grant of the state Constitution. It will thus be seen that the case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, supra, was shown to be not inconsistent either with the two earlier decisions of said court or with its ruling in the Montgomery Case. It must therefore be held that the case of Rapp & Son v. Kiel, supra, remains as a controlling authority, binding upon this court and as holding that in the face of the express prohibition contained in subdivision 15 of section 1, chapter 2, art. 2, of the San Francisco Charter, the board of supervisors was not invested with, but on the contrary was expressly denied, the power to pass ordinances imposing license taxes, fees, or charges for purposes of either revenue or regulation, upon those classes of business not coming within the exception provided for in said subdivision.

It follows that the application of the petitioner must be granted and the petitioner discharged, and it is so ordered.

SETRAKIAN v. NAFTZGER et al.
(Civ. No. 4433.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 9, 1923.)

1. Evidence 🔑53—No presumptions in California except those enumerated in Code.

There are no presumptions in California except those enumerated in its Code of Civil Procedure.

2. Master and servant 🔑405(4)—Evidence held not to show compensable injury to night watchman.

Facts and circumstances surrounding an attack on a night watchman after he crossed the street to a pool hall to get matches to light his lantern held to warrant a finding by the Industrial Accident Commission that his injury did not arise out of his employment.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Levon S. Setrakian, claimant, opposed by the California Peach & Fig Growers, employer. Compensation denied by the Industrial Accident Commission, and claimant applies for a writ of review to annul such order. Order sustained.

Chester H. Warlow, of Fresno, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This matter comes before us upon a writ of review. Appellant seeks to annul an order of the Industrial Accident Commission made herein, denying him compensation for an injury suffered by him.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that the evidence was insufficient to establish the fact that such injury arose out of the employment. The correctness of this finding is the only question presented to us upon this record. The facts are practically undisputed. Appellant was employed at Fresno, Cal., as a night watchman by the defendant California Peach & Fig Growers, a corporation. That corporation had owned a packing plant in the city of Fresno, which had been partially destroyed by fire. In the ruins were figs and other salvage. Appellant and another man were engaged to patrol the plant during the night, and to see that none of the property of the corporation was carried away. On the evening of April 10, 1922, according to the testimony of the applicant before the Industrial Accident Commission, he left the premises of his employer about 8 o'clock in the evening, and went to a nearby store to purchase coal oil for his lantern. This was one of his customary duties. He returned to the packing plant with the coal oil and found that neither he nor the other watchman had any matches with which to light their lantern. He thereupon crossed the street to a pool room to secure matches. The street in front of the pool room was well lighted, and there were a number of persons about. The following is an account of the attack upon appellant, told in his own language:

"Q. Had you gone to the pool hall and got the matches? A. No; I had not left the sidewalk. I looked around and saw the four guys standing there. I walked to the front of the pool hall, but the fellow was busy fixing the balls for the boys for pool, so I stood there a minute to see if these fellows came out and to see if I could get my matches, but there was nobody there, and when I was going to make my turn to go back I felt some one in back of me. I stopped a minute, and I looked to see if the guys came out. I was going to the back of the plant again, and at the same time some guy strike me and jar me one side. I turned around to strike, and I see blood on my face. I run clear to the corner after him from the pool hall. When I run after him he run into another man. By the time I got to the corner I ask the man if he see the other man, and he said no, not his face, and the fellow run around the alley."

Upon examination, it was found that a gash had been cut in appellant's cheek, from his ear to his chin.

Appellant's position before us is that, upon proving he was a night watchman, he brought himself within a special rule of law requiring the defendant to prove that the injury did not arise out of the employment, and that it was not the duty of appellant to prove that it arose out of his employment. In other words, it is maintained that, because of the nature of the duties of a night watchman, and his special exposure to felonious attacks, there is a presumption in his favor that any attack upon him arises out of his employment, and that presumption must be met by the defendant with affirmative proof that the injury did not arise out of the employment. It is contended that, as such proof was not made by the defendants, the unrebutted presumption warrants a finding in favor of appellant on this subject.

[1, 2] There are no presumptions in this state except those enumerated in our Code of Civil Procedure. Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 143, 176, 116 Pac. 530. It is, of course, the rule that, in the absence of positive proof that such an injury as we are considering here arose out of the employment, the Industrial Accident Commission might, in certain cases, reasonably infer from the nature of the employment of the applicant and the facts and circumstances surrounding the attack that the injury occurred as the result of an attack made upon applicant in his capacity as an employee, and arose out of the employment. Where such an inference would be a reasonable one from the facts and circumstances and the nature of the employment, a finding based thereon could not be disturbed by this court, for we are bound by findings of fact made by the Industrial Accident Commission whenever there is any substantial evidence to support the same. But the present case, in all respects, presents a different situation. The facts and circumstances surrounding the attack furnish no basis for a reasonable inference that appellant was attacked because he was a night watchman, nor that his injury arose out of his employment, within the meaning of that phrase as repeatedly defined in this state, and the finding of the Industrial Accident Commission is that it did not so arise. There is neither evidence nor reasonable inference from the facts presented before the said Commission to warrant a different finding upon this vital question.

The order of the Industrial Accident Commission denying plaintiff compensation must be sustained. It is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. WILSON. (Cr. 931.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 10, 1923.)

1. Homicide 🔑228(1)—Evidence held sufficient to establish corpus delicti.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to establish the corpus delicti as against claim of suicide.

2. Homicide 🔑253(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree.

3. Criminal law 🔑371(12)—Evidence of motive admissible, though showing charge of another crime.

Where the question of motive exists, and evidence is offered which has a tendency to establish the existence of a motive for the commission of the alleged crime by the defendant, the fact that such evidence tends to prove that defendant was charged with the commission of another crime does not make the evidence inadmissible for the stated purpose relating to motive.

4. Homicide 🔑338(4)—Error in admission of evidence cured by striking out testimony.

Error of the court in overruling objections to part of testimony relating to conduct of defendant at a time when accusations for other crimes were made against him—that is, that he remained silent—was cured by an order striking out the testimony and an instruction to disregard it.

5. Criminal law 🔑407(1)—Accusatory statements not competent, where accused promptly denies charge.

Ordinarily, when a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstance of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt, but if he promptly and fully denies the charge, the accusatory statements, standing alone, are not in any sense competent evidence of the defendant's guilt, and should be excluded from the consideration of the jury.

6. Criminal law 🔑407(1)—Statement of accused held admissible.

Where accused, in reply to accusation, went further than a denial of his guilt, and stated, "He killed himself," the fact that he made such statement was properly admitted in evidence.

7. Criminal law 🔑407(2)—Implied confession by silence inadmissible in view of threats.

An implied confession by mere acquiescence or silence is not admissible, where at the time accusations were made, accused was menaced by a number of deputy sheriffs heavily armed and was being cursed, threatened, and intimidated.

8. Criminal law 🔑656(8)—Remark of court held not invasive of province of jury.

A query by the court as to what defect there was in the proof as to the corpus delicti held not invasive of the province of the jury as an indication what court thought about the facts at the time, in view of a declaration by the court that it had no opinion on the subject.

9. Witnesses 🔑277(4)—Cross-examination as to matter not included in direct, improper.

Cross-examination of accused as to matters not included in direct examination was improper, even though the questions asked tend to show motive, in view of Pen. Code, § 1323.

10. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Improper cross-examination held not prejudicial.

Examination of accused as to matters not included in the direct examination held not reversible error under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

11. Criminal law 🔑834(2)—Accused not entitled to dictate precise terms of instructions.

Not even the defendant in a criminal action is entitled to dictate the precise terms of instructions to the jury.

12. Criminal law 🔑822(16)—Instruction on reasonable doubt held sufficient as amended.

Where the court substituted the phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" for the phrase "to a moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt" in an instruction as tendered, objections of the accused to such change are hypercritical, where the court had given to the jury the usual well-accepted definition of the doctrine of reasonable doubt, including the use of the words "to a moral certainty," in defining that state of mind wherein a "reasonable doubt" exists.

13. Criminal law 🔑761(12)—Instruction held not to assume facts.

An instruction "that, in determining the intention of the defendant at the time of the transaction complained of, it is important to consider the means used to accomplish the killing," etc., held not subject to the complaint that court assumed that accused killed the deceased; the instruction concluding with the words: "Therefore, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did," etc

14. Criminal law ⟹829(12)—Court need not repeat instructions.

Where the court, at defendant's request, charged that "consciousness of guilt, if such is to be inferred in this case, is not sufficient of itself, standing alone, to warrant or sustain a conviction. If such inference is drawn in this case, it is a circumstance to be considered by the jury." It did not err in also refusing to charge: "Consciousness of guilt is an inference which may or may not be drawn from evidence introduced in the record. Whether such inference shall or shall not be drawn from the evidence in the case is a question solely for the jury. Another inference cannot legally be drawn from such an inference."

15. Criminal law ⟹834(1)—Instruction held substantial compliance with request.

Where defendant requested the court to give an instruction to the effect that, if defendant refused or failed to deny any accusations made in his presence, such fact must not be used against him, unless the circumstances and surroundings of the defendant were such that he was "in perfect freedom to make denial," court substantially complied therewith by substituting for the phrase "in perfect freedom to make denial" the phrase "free to make denial."

16. Criminal law ⟹829(12)—Requested instruction as to mere preponderance of evidence held covered.

When a jury is instructed that accused must not be convicted unless the facts which establish his guilt have been proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, and that, "if upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal," the proposition that a mere preponderance of the evidence will not justify a verdict of guilt is necessarily included, and it is not error to refuse to so instruct.

17. Criminal law ⟹723(3)—Remarks of counsel held not improper.

Argument of district attorney to jury, "You, ladies and gentlemen, have it within your power to encourage every criminal within the confines of this county. You have it within your power, by stern, rugged devotion to duty, to encourage every officer of the law and to discourage every criminal," etc., held not improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Hebert Wilson was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Schenck & Kittrelle, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. By information the defendant was charged with the crime of murder in that on the 9th day of April, 1922, he did kill and murder one Herbert Cox. He was found guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Departments 17 and 18 of the superior court of Los Angeles county are located on the second floor of a building known as the Hall of Justice. The county jail and the Hall of Justice are separated by an alley 20 feet wide. For convenience in conveying prisoners between the jail and the courts a bridge spans this alley connecting with the jail on the south and the Hall of Justice on the north. This bridge is somewhat above the ground, its floor and sides are of cement, and its roof is flat. The bridge is on the level of the jail door. On coming out of the jail one crosses the bridge and then ascends a short flight of steps to the floor of the court building. The passage there leads to the left through a door in which there is a wicket covered by bars and a screen. Through this door one passes into a vestibule in the rear of the two courtrooms. Herbert Cox received his death wound while on the bridge at a time when he and the defendant Wilson, together with one O'Brien, were attempting to escape from the jail.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to establish the corpus delicti; that is, to show that the deceased came to his death as a result of criminal agency as distinguished from suicide or accident. Appellant further contends that the evidence is insufficient to warrant or sustain his conviction.

For the purposes of the present discussion, we shall assume with counsel for appellant that the evidence of motive of the defendant, which might have led him to attack the deceased, does not form any part of the proof of the corpus delicti; also that there was testimony of sundry witnesses that Cox had made statements to them, variously, to the effect that a man is better off dead than in jail; or that he was going to have his liberty or die; or that if he did not succeed in escaping, he would kill himself. The other incidental questions under this head relate to the nature of the wound and the possession of the gun with which, as the evidence strongly tends to prove, the wound was inflicted.

The circumstances in evidence are such that, if Cox did not kill himself, it becomes probable that he was murdered by another. There was no opportunity for a chance shot from the outside. On this branch of the case the principal contention of appellant, therefore, is that the evidence is not sufficient to prove that Cox did not commit suicide.

A few days prior to April 9th arrangements were made by Cox with a turnkey that for the sum of $1,000 to be paid to the turnkey, the door leading from the jail into the bridge would be left unlocked. On the 9th day of April the defendant gave $1,000 to the turnkey and asked "if the arrangements made by Cox were O. K.," and was told that they were. The turnkey reported these facts to his superior officer. At the time of the expected jailbreak, deputy sheriffs Wright and Bright took their stations in the courtroom of department 17, and Deputy Sheriffs Manning and Fox in department 18. Other deputies were stationed at various points outside the buildings. The jail door was left unlocked. O'Brien, Cox, and Wilson came out, crossed the bridge, and ascended the stairs. By the use of some tools they succeeded in removing the bars and screen over the wicket in the door leading into the vestibule. O'Brien, who was very small, was then pushed through the wicket into the hallway, and all of them then worked together trying to open the door. After this had continued for some time, Fox and Manning fired their Winchester rifles, the bullets striking near O'Brien, but without touching him. The four deputies came into the hall where O'Brien stood with his hands up. At this time they heard a "muffled shot" which seemed to come from down in the bridge. After the door leading from the vestibule to the bridge had been unlocked and opened, some of the deputies went to the head of the stairs and looked down upon the bridge. Cox was lying on the floor and Wilson was leaning over him. Upon examination it was found that Cox had received the wound by reason of which a few minutes later he died.

We will now consider the evidence of the nature of the wound as related to the question of suicide. The autopsy surgeon stated that the bullet entered the left side of the chest about 2 inches above the nipple, about 4 inches from the midline in front. It passed horizontally backward and slightly inward, penetrating the third rib, both lobes of the left lung, and passed out of the back through the sixth rib at a point about 2 inches from the midline of the back. The entrance wound showed a very narrow margin of burned powder and a few punctate powder marks around the wound. The embalmer testified that around the wound he saw a small ring of powder burns. This ring made a complete circle around the wound. The pistol, or "gun," with which, under the evidence, the shooting must have been done, was found on the floor near the body of Cox. The pistol had been in the possession of Cox while in the jail, and there is abundant evidence that when the prisoners came out from the jail to the bridge Cox brought the pistol with him. Bright testified that when he looked down the stairs he saw Cox lying on his back with his head toward the jail and that Wilson was leaning over him; that a coat was folded up and lying somewhere near Cox's head; that he picked it up "and the gun fell out, wrapped in a handkerchief, which was tied around with a string." Cox was wearing a coat. Wilson was in his shirt sleeves. The handkerchief was wrapped around the gun in such manner that the left side of the gun was closed next to the trigger guard and the right side was open. Bright further testified that upon examining the gun he found that it was loaded, except that there was one empty shell. It was proved by the mother of Cox, and also by his wife, that he was right-handed. His wife had seen him fire several shots from a pistol, all with the right hand, never with the left hand.

[1] The evidence of these facts, if believed by the jury, was sufficient to warrant the jury in believing that the fatal shot was not fired by Cox. This evidence tended to prove that in shooting he would not have used the left hand; that, if he had been shooting with that pistol at that time with the right hand, he could not have pressed the trigger with the thumb of that hand, and that it would be extremely difficult for a man, with his right hand, to have fired that weapon so that the bullet, entering his breast where this bullet actually did, would range inward horizontally and come out 2 inches nearer the center line of the back. It is our conclusion that the evidence is sufficient to establish the corpus delicti.

[2] Appellant next contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the conviction. There is testimony to the effect that in November, 1921, Wilson had been informed by officers, in the presence of Cox, that Cox had accused Wilson "of the post office robbery, the Hale store robbery, and other jobs." There is also testimony that after the "muffled shot" had been heard, and when the officers looked down the stairway, there was no one on the bridge with Cox, except Wilson, who was leaning over Cox. Manning testified that at that time Wilson was choking Cox—or, as the same witness had said at the coroner's inquest, "seemed to have him by the throat." Bright said that when he looked down there he saw Cox lying on the floor, on his back, and Wilson kneeling over him. Wilson himself, besides denying that he shot Cox, says that when he came down to the bridge he found Cox lying on the floor; that he put his coat under the head of Cox, and loosened his collar. But if certain testimony of the witness Hornbuckle is true, it becomes very certain that Wilson was down on the bridge with Cox before Cox was shot. Hornbuckle, who at that time was a prisoner in the county jail, was at work in the jail kitchen. In the north side of the kitchen there is a window located a few feet above and easterly from the bridge. Hornbuckle testified that at the time of the shooting he was sitting near this window. What he claims to have heard is stated as follows:

> "It seemed like there was a scuffle first, and Cox was saying something or other to Herb.

He said, 'Don't do that, Herb. You are wrong. Don't do that.' And then the shot taken effect, and that is the last I ever heard. Then the officers run in," etc.

The cook, Lombardo (who was a county employee and not a prisoner), in his testimony confirms the fact that Hornbuckle was in the kitchen at that time, but he claims that both he and Hornbuckle were five or six feet away from the kitchen window. He heard the shot and some one moaning. Also at about that time he heard somebody say (the voice coming from outside the building), "Don't do that." According to Lombardo, it was after hearing the shot that he heard these words spoken, whereas Hornbuckle claims to have heard them before the shot was fired. There is also the difference that Lombardo does not identify the voice, whereas Hornbuckle testified that he had heard Cox speak before, and that it was Cox speaking.

On behalf of appellant it is argued that the testimony of Hornbuckle was impeached in various ways, and that the character of the witness was shown to be such that he is wholly unreliable. Granting that the character of the witness and some inconsistencies in his testimony were such that his statements should have been weighed with great caution, nevertheless it was very possible that he told the truth about the particular circumstances to which his testimony referred as above stated. It was for the jury to consider and determine the question.

Concerning the events which occurred immediately following those last above mentioned, we have the testimony of the numerous deputy sheriffs and of the defendant, as well as of certain jail prisoners. Summarizing in short form, there is evidence that Wilson was ordered to put up his hands and go up to the head of the stairs, and that shortly afterwards he was taken into the jail; that sundry statements and questions were directed to Wilson; that when Manning asked him what he shot the man for, Wilson replied, "I didn't shoot him. He shot himself."

There is also voluminous testimony tending to prove that after the death of Cox, and in connection with Wilson's defense to the present charge, Wilson attempted to obtain certain false statements which would tend to prove that he was not on the bridge at the time of the shooting of Cox. The record containing this evidence is filled with sundry matters of contradiction in testimony and impeachment of witnesses. Under the able guidance of counsel for appellant, who, in their brief, have very extensively explored the record, we have examined much of this testimony. In addition to that part of the evidence which tends to exclude the theory of suicide or accidental death, there is abundant evidence in the circumstances to which we have referred, which is sufficient to have justified the jury in finding that the killing was done by appellant. It is difficult to understand how it could have been done by any one else. Some of these circumstances are sufficient to suggest a motive of revenge or interest as the cause for the crime; others show opportunity in that these two men were alone on the bridge, and one of them had a gun in his possession. Assuming that the gun was brought there by Cox, and that prior to the very minute of the shooting it had remained in his possession, this does not exclude the opportunity of Wilson to have obtained it, by violence or otherwise, immediately before the shooting occurred. Since the jury determined—and, as we think, reasonably determined—that there was no suicide and no accident, we are driven to the conclusion upon the whole case as shown by the evidence, that it is sufficient to justify the verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree.

There remain for consideration numerous specifications of error wherein it is claimed that prejudicial erroneous rulings were made by the court at the trial in the reception of evidence and in the matter of giving and refusing instructions to the jury.

[3] Overruling objections of the defendant, the court permitted a witness to give testimony to the effect that several months prior to the homicide, the defendant, who was then being held in jail on a charge pending before the United States District Court, was taken to the federal building, and that there, in the presence of several officers and of the said Cox, Wilson was informed that Cox had accused Wilson of sundry robberies. In reply to the objections made, the district attorney stated to the court that the evidence was offered as relating to "the question of motive." In support of their contention that this evidence was erroneously admitted, counsel for appellant refer to People v. Ayhens, 16 Cal. App. 618, 117 Pac. 789; People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 183 Pac. 545. These cases are not in point. Neither one of them relates to the admission of testimony concerning circumstances having relation to the existence of a motive for commission of the crime charged in the case then on trial. Where the question of motive exists, and where evidence is offered which has a tendency to establish the existence of a motive for commission of the alleged crime by the defendant, the fact that such evidence tends to prove that the defendant was charged with the commission of another crime does not make the evidence inadmissible for the stated purpose relating to motive. People v. Argentos, 156 Cal. 720, 724, 106 Pac. 65.

[4] The same objection was urged to the admission of similar testimony of the witnesses Cellar and Grant. Each of these witnesses also testified to the effect that Wilson did not make any reply to those accusations, or, in one instance, replied that he had nothing to say. The testimony of these witnesses Cellar and Grant was stricken out by the court. The jury was instructed to disregard all evidence so stricken out. Conceding that the court had erred in overruling the objections to that part of the testimony of these witnesses relating to the conduct of Wilson at the time when said accusations were made in his presence, but further taking into consideration that the accusations themselves related to matters unconnected with the present case, we are of the opinion that it was within the power of the court to cure such error, and that it was so cured by the order striking out the testimony and the instruction to disregard such testimony.

[5, 6] Deputy Sheriff Bright testified to a conversation with the defendant in the sheriff's office in the presence of Manning, Dewar, and Biscailuz. This conversation occurred less than an hour after Cox had been shot. To the question, "What did you say to Mr. Wilson in their presence?" the defendant objected. The district attorney explained to the court that he expected to show "a lack of response." Objection overruled. The answer was: "I said to Wilson, 'You made a mistake in shooting this man. He didn't double-cross you.' He said, 'I didn't shoot him; he killed himself.' " A motion to strike out this testimony, on the ground that it was not within the rule under which it was admitted, was denied. Appellant now contends that the court erred in overruling the objection and in denying the motion. Ordinarily, when a defendant, under conditions which fairly afford him an opportunity to reply, stands mute in the face of an accusation of crime, the circumstance of his silence may be taken against him as evidence indicating an admission of guilt. But if he promptly and fully deny the charge, the accusatory statements, standing alone, are not in any sense competent evidence of the defendant's guilt, and should in such a contingency be excluded from the consideration of the jury. People v. Lapara, 181 Cal. 66, 71, 183 Pac. 545. In one particular, Wilson's answer was more than a denial of guilt, for he further stated, referring to Cox, "He killed himself." If the jury believed (as we have said that the evidence authorized it to believe) that Cox did not kill himself, then the affirmative statement by the defendant declaring that Cox killed himself, was a false statement relating to the very matter in issue; and, being more than a mere denial of that part of the question which concerned himself, the fact that he made such statement was properly admitted in evidence. People v. Cole, 141 Cal. 88, 74 Pac. 547.

There were some other instances of similar character to the above-mentioned testimony of Bright wherein the testimony showed that, in response to questions asking Wilson why he had killed Cox, Wilson made no response, or simply responded, "I have got an attorney that will do my talking for me." In so far as the silence of Wilson, or his reply, did not constitute a denial of the charge, and if he was free from constraint, the evidence was admissible. People v. Lapara, supra; People v. Graney, 48 Cal. App. 773, 192 Pac. 460.

[7] But appellant further contends that the evidence concerning the statements made by Wilson, or his silence when accused, as shown by the testimony of the said witnesses, should have been excluded because the record shows that at the time of the accusations "the accused was menaced by half a dozen or more deputy sheriffs, each heavily armed. He was being cursed, threatened, and intimidated. Two rifles were placed against his body, accompanied by the most vile epithets and threats of immediate death, and such like." According to the testimony now under consideration, other than that of Bright, the accusations were made at the top of the stairs immediately after Wilson, under threatening orders of the officers, had come up there. A direct confession made under such circumstances might well have been excluded. People v. Fowler, 178 Cal. 657, 662, 174 Pac. 892; People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 67 Pac. 12. The same is true of an implied confession by mere acquiescence by silence.

Referring to the testimony of sundry witnesses to facts occurring subsequent to those constituting the res gestæ of the alleged crime, it is contended that the court erred in overruling the objection that there was no prima facie showing or proof of the corpus delicti. For reasons which have been sufficiently indicated, we think there is no merit in this contention.

[8] At the time when the defendant's attorney was presenting an objection to a question asked of the witness Wright, defendant's attorney asked permission to argue the matter outside the presence of the jury; in other words, that the jury be excused pending such argument. The court inquired whether the point presented related to the "hypothesis that the corpus delicti has not been shown." On receiving an affirmative reply, the court said to defendant's attorney, "What is the defect in the proof as you see it? Where is the proof insufficient?" Defendant's attorney replied that the court should not have asked such a question in the presence of the jury, and asked that the jury be instructed to disregard it; asserting that it was an indication of the judge "as to what he thinks about the facts at this time," to which the court replied, "No, it is not. The court has not expressed itself on that subject and declines to do so. Any argument you have I will now hear in the presence of the jury." Thereupon counsel refused to argue the question in the presence of the jury, and the objection was overruled. It is now contended that the court by the proceedings and statements above noted, indicated to the jury an opinion that the corpus delicti had been proved, and thereby invaded the province of the jury, which is the exclusive judge of the facts. We are of the opinion that the court did not go beyond what was necessary in ruling upon the objection. The only implication in the remarks of the court was that there was sufficient evidence relating to the corpus delicti to authorize reception of the further evidence then being offered to the court. Moreover, the court at the time disclaimed any expression of opinion on the subject, and this was followed by an appropriate instruction when the case was submitted to the jury.

Next we have twelve assignments of error (designated H to H11) predicated upon the cross-examination of the defendant after his direct examination as a witness on his own behalf. The point that the cross-examination, as conducted, was improper, is presented in several aspects, with numerous illustrations from the record, all of which have been examined. The main contention is that the cross-examination was permitted to extend to matters not touched upon in the examination in chief, and that they were elicited solely to prejudice the defendant, and not for any legitimate cross-examination purpose.

The first contention of this group relates to a question which was asked and, after objection and discussion, withdrawn. The asking of the question is assigned as misconduct in that the district attorney knew that the fact could not be proved and did not ask the question in good faith. After reading the discussion, as shown in the record, we conclude that the district attorney, at the time of asking the question, believed that he had a right so to do.

The other points of this group relate to conversations and other descriptions of fact which had not been touched upon in the direct examination. The witness was asked whether in December, 1921, he had been confronted by Cox and told that Cox had told everything. The witness replied that he was not. The witness was asked whether at the time, while Cox was prostrate on the bridge, he asked Cox what was the matter. The witness replied, "I said, 'For God's sake, Herb, what's wrong?'" The witness was asked whether while on the bridge he made any statement as to how Cox met his death. The witness replied, "I was asked as to the condition of Mr. Cox." He was then asked, "You didn't make any statement concerning it, whether you were asked or not?" to which the witness answered, "No, sir." He was asked whether his previous relations with Cox had always been friendly and cordial, to which the witness answered, "Yes, sir." He was asked whether he had any feeling of animosity toward Cox. This he denied. He was asked if there was any fact known to him upon April 9th to cause him to wish Cox to be out of the way, to which he replied, "None whatever." He was asked whether he had received any information prior to that time which caused him to regard Cox as being a menace to his own safety. This he denied.

[9, 10] The subject-matter of these questions had not been included in the direct examination. The objections should have been sustained. The fact that the answers to the questions might have tended "to show motive," or to affect the credibility of the witness, is no justification for an extension of the cross-examination to a point where it conflicted with the right of the defendant to be exempt from such cross-examination beyond the scope of the matters about which he was examined in chief. Pen. Code, § 1323. It is true, however, that the answers were not such as could have seriously injured the defendant. If, in the face of his denials, the jury believed that he knew that Cox had made accusations charging him with criminal acts, or that he had a motive for wishing Cox to be out of the way, or that he had said that Cox shot himself, they would have reached the same conclusions without the testimony thus given by the defendant. If these erroneous rulings injured the defendant at all, it would be for the reason that, disbelieving these answers, the jury would be less willing to believe the other parts of his testimony. This, it must be conceded, is of some importance, and will be taken into consideration when we come to the question whether or not, upon "the entire cause including the evidence," there has been a miscarriage of justice. Cal. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appellant further assigns misconduct of the district attorney and errors of the court in connection with the cross-examination of the witnesses Cronin and Baker. (One of these, as the record shows, was in the cross-examination of the witness Glaze, and not of Cronin.) These appear to be of minor importance. If the district attorney erred in asking any of these questions, that alone does not, in the instances noted, amount to misconduct, and we do not think that the court erred in any of the said rulings.

[11] The defendant requested a certain instruction concerning the duty of a juror to render his verdict in accordance with his individual opinion and not to be influenced in rendering a verdict of guilty "for the single reason that a majority of the jurors, or even all the other jurors, should be in favor of a verdict of guilty." In giving this instruction, the court struck out the words "a majority of the jurors or even all the," so that the clause read, "for the single reason that other jurors should be in favor of a verdict of guilty." Reading the instruction in full, we find that it fully expresses the principle upon which the defendant relied in requesting the instruction. Not even the defendant in a criminal action is entitled to dictate the precise terms of instructions to a jury. His right is that the court correctly and fairly state the law governing the subject-matter of his defense.

[12] In several instances where the court was making application of the doctrine of reasonable doubt to the issues of this case, the instruction as tendered to the judge contained the phrase "to a moral certainty beyond a reasonable doubt," and the court substituted therefor the phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt." Also the court in one or more places struck out from instructions requested by the defendant certain language disclaiming any intention of the judge to express an opinion upon questions of fact. None of these changes in the instructions furnish a reasonable ground of complaint. The court had given to the jury the usual well-accepted definition of the doctrine of reasonable doubt, including the use of the words "to a moral certainty," in defining that state of mind wherein a "reasonable doubt" exists; and the court had further fully and completely disclaimed any intention to express or to have expressed an opinion upon any question of fact, and had informed the jurors that they were the sole and exclusive judges of the facts as the same must be determined from the evidence, and from the evidence alone. Under these conditions, such objections are hypercritical.

[13] It is claimed by appellant that in certain of its instructions the court erroneously assumed that in fact appellant did kill the said Herbert Cox. Thus, the court said: "You are instructed that in determining the intention of the defendant at the time of the transaction complained of, it is important to consider the means used to accomplish the killing," etc. That the court did not by these words assert that in fact the killing was done by the defendant clearly follows from the concluding words of the instruction: "Therefore, if you are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did," etc. With one slight difference, this is the same instruction set forth in People v. Jones, 160 Cal. 358, at pp. 369–370, 117 Pac. 176.

The same objection that the court erroneously assumed the commission of the homicide by the defendant is presented concerning an instruction given in the language of section 1105 of the Penal Code. Properly understood, this instruction does not intimate or state that the commission of the homicide had been proved. The same point was passed upon by this court in People v. Caballero, 41 Cal. App. 146, 152, 182 Pac. 321, where the substance of the Supreme Court decisions on the same point is stated.

[14] Because the prosecution was emphasizing its effort to show conduct upon the part of the defendant indicating consciousness of guilt, the defendant requested, and the court gave, the following instruction:

> "Consciousness of guilt, if such is to be inferred in this case, is not sufficient of itself, standing alone, to warrant or sustain a conviction. If such inference is drawn in this case, it is a circumstance to be considered by the jury."

Appellant now complains that the court did not also give to the jury the following instruction, which he at the same time requested:

> "Consciousness of guilt is an inference which may or may not be drawn from evidence introduced in the record. Whether such inference shall or shall not be drawn from the evidence in the case is a question solely for the jury. Another inference cannot legally be drawn from such an inference."

We perceive no error in the refusal of the court to give both forms of this instruction. The jury had been emphatically told that all questions of fact in the case were to be determined by the jury alone.

[15] The defendant requested the court to give an instruction which was to the effect that if the defendant refused or failed to deny any accusations made in his presence, such fact must not be used against him unless the circumstances and surroundings of the defendant at that particular time were such that he was in perfect freedom to make denial. Complaint is now made because the court, in giving that instruction, substituted for the phrase "in perfect freedom to make denial" the phrase "free to make denial." We think that this was a substantial compliance with the request. Immediately following the words above mentioned, the instruction closed as follows:

> "If at that time he was under menace or threat of any one, or was at that time subject to the brandishment of weapons, then his refusal or neglect to make a denial of any accusation must not be used against him."

[16] Appellant complains that the court refused to instruct the jury that it was not sufficient that "the greater weight or preponderance of evidence support the allegations of the indictment," and refused a further request that the jury be told that "the defendant in this case cannot be convicted unless his guilt is established by more than a preponderance of evidence." It is contended that the court erred in this, and that nowhere in the instructions were the jury told that a preponderance of evidence was not sufficient. It is a sufficient answer to say that when a jury in a criminal case is instructed that the defendant must not be convicted unless the facts which establish his guilt have been proved beyond a reasonable doubt, that the burden of proof is upon the prosecution, and that, "if upon such proof there is reasonable doubt remaining, the accused is entitled to the benefit of it by an acquittal," the instructions thus given necessarily include the proposition that a mere preponderance of the evidence will not justify a verdict against the defendant.

[17] In the course of his closing argument to the jury the district attorney said:

> "You, ladies and gentlemen, have it within your power to encourage every criminal within the confines of this county. You have it within your power, by stern, rugged devotion to duty, to encourage every officer of the law and to discourage every criminal. * * * I seek a conviction only to the end that the law may be upheld, that justice may prevail, and that there may be taken from the city of Los Angeles the reproach of having, with one-sixth of the population of London, more homicides annually than the latter."

On hearing these statements, counsel for the defense assigned as error and misconduct the making of these statements, and asked that the court admonish the jury to disregard them. The court denied this request. Defendant further requested the court to instruct the jury that they should not be led to convict the defendant "solely for fear that a crime may go unavenged, or for the purpose of deterring others from the commission of like offenses." Arguing that the making of these statements by the district attorney was prejudicial misconduct and that the court erred in refusing the requested instruction, appellant relies upon People v. Hail, 25 Cal. App. 342, 143 Pac. 803, where numerous pertinent decisions are cited. In that case it appeared to the Court of Appeal, although the evidence was held to be technically sufficient to support the verdict, that there was grave doubt that the defendant was guilty of any crime. Defendant was convicted of manslaughter. In his argument to the jury, the district attorney, having first stated that if the jury should acquit this man, they would be allowing a cold-blooded murderer to go unwhipped of justice, then made this statement: "Should you do it, you would be afraid to go out on the street and meet your fellowmen." We fail to discover any close parallel between the case just now mentioned and that now before us. There is a broad difference between a palpable attempt to intimidate or influence the jury, through fear of consequences to the jurors, to return a verdict of conviction regardless of their views as to the effect of the evidence, and an appeal to the jury to render a verdict that will uphold the law and establish justice.

We summarize the remaining points concerning refusal of the court to give instructions requested by the defendant by saying that as to those matters we discover no prejudicial error. In some instances where counsel insist that the statement of law as requested was not covered by other instructions given, we find that the same propositions are sufficiently covered by the instructions as given, and we cannot agree with counsel for appellant that the court, in effect, informed the jury that they might disregard the testimony of the defendant or any other witness upon mere caprice or whim. The jury was fully instructed concerning the presumptions in favor of innocence and the burden of proof laid upon the prosecutor, and that upon any fact in issue "the evidence must establish the truth of the fact to a reasonable and moral certainty," etc.; and that the jurors have the right to determine from the character and conduct of the witnesses and from various other circumstances (stated in the instruction) the degree of credit to be given to the testimony of those witnesses.

We have reached the conclusion that the evidence abundantly justifies the verdict, and that the defendant has had the benefit of a fair and impartial trial. While we have held that the court erred in some of its rulings upon objections made by appellant to certain offered evidence, we are satisfied that those errors, when considered in connection with the entire case as presented, were, in fact, not seriously prejudicial to the rights of the defendant, and have not resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CRAWFORD v. DUNCAN. (Civ. 4036.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 12, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1923.)

1. Limitation of actions 🔑27—Two-year statute held applicable to patient's action against physician for breach of oral contract not to leave permanent scars.

In an action by a patient against a physician for breach of an oral contract, whereby defendant warranted that his radium treatments would not leave a permanent scar, and that such scars as resulted would heal up within a reasonable time, the applicable statute of limitations was the two-year provision under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, and not the one-year provision under section 340, subd. 3.

2. Trial 🔑165—On motion for nonsuit, view of evidence most favorable to plaintiff must be taken.

On a motion for nonsuit, that view of the evidence must be taken which is most favorable to plaintiff, all contradictory evidence being disregarded; and, if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, that one must be adopted which is most favorable to plaintiff.

3. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(9)—Existence of oral contract warranting against permanent scars held for jury under evidence.

In an action by a patient against her physician for breach of an oral contract whereby defendant warranted that his radium treatments would not leave a permanent scar on plaintiff's neck, evidence as to the making of the contract held to make a jury question.

4. Limitation of actions 🔑46(6)—In personal actions for violation of contract, statute runs from breach, and not from date of damages caused thereby.

In all personal actions for the violation of an express or implied contract, the statute of limitations begins to run from the date of the breach, and not from the date of the damages caused by it.

5. Limitation of actions 🔑46(1)—No cause of action accrues on warranty relating to future event until such event occurs.

Where a warranty relates to a future event by which it will be ascertained whether it would be breached or not, no breach occurs, and consequently no cause of action accrues until the happening of such future event.

6. Limitation of actions 🔑46(1)—Statute runs on warranty against permanent scar from radium treatment when it appears that such scar had developed.

In an action by a patient against her physician for breach of an oral contract whereby defendant warranted that his radium treatments for the swelling of a gland in plaintiff's neck would leave no permanent scars, and that whatever scars resulted would completely disappear within a reasonable time, probably in a year or two, and it appeared that after two years a permanent scar remained, the warranty related to a future event, and was broken when a reasonable person circumstanced as plaintiff was would know with reasonable certainty that a permanent scar had developed as a result of the treatments, and the statute of limitations would begin to run from that time.

7. Physicians and surgeons 🔑18(7)—Subsequent conversations admissible as explaining oral contract warranting against permanent scars from radium treatment.

In an action by a patient against her physician, whereby defendant warranted that his radium treatment would not leave permanent scars, and that whatever scars resulted would disappear in a reasonable time, statements made by defendant in conversations subsequent to the making of the contract were admissible in so far as they threw light upon the original understanding and intention of the parties.

8. Limitation of actions 🔑199(1)—Whether reasonable time for disappearance of scars following radium treatment had elapsed within warranty against permanent scars held for jury.

In a patient's action against her physician for breach of an oral contract whereby defendant warranted that no permanent scars would result from his radium treatments, and that whatever scars resulted would disappear within a reasonable time, whether such reasonable time as was contemplated by the warranty had elapsed more than two years before the commencement of the action which was the statutory period of limitations held for the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Dora G. Crawford against Rex D. Duncan, for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John L. Richardson, T. E. Parke, and Anderson & Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. H. Dehm, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action against a physician to recover damages resulting from the breach of an oral contract whereby he warranted that his radium treatments of plaintiff would not leave a permanent scar on her neck. Defendant pleaded the statute of limitations, averring that the action was barred by subdivision 3 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and by subdivision 1 of section 339 of that Code. The latter section, in subdivision 1, provides in substance that an action upon an oral contract is barred in two years. At the close of her evidence plaintiff was nonsuited upon the ground that the statute of limitations had run. Judgment for defendant was entered accordingly, and from that judgment plaintiff appeals.

The complaint alleges in substance that in 1917 defendant, who was consulted by plaintiff with reference to swollen glands on the right side of her neck, undertook to treat the swelling with radium, at the same time orally agreeing and warranting that no permanent scar of any kind would result from the treatment; that any scar which might result would disappear within a reasonable time, and that a reasonable time for its disappearance would probably be a year, or possibly a year or two, from the date of treatment; that plaintiff, relying upon such warranty, submitted herself to defendant's radium treatments, with the result that large and disfiguring scar was left upon her neck; that, a reasonable time for its disappearance having elapsed, the scar has proved to be permanent, and has caused plaintiff great humiliation. Wherefore she alleges that she has suffered damages, for which judgment is prayed.

[1] The action was commenced July 8, 1920, which was more than two years after the termination of the treatments, but less than two years from the expiration of the time within which, as plaintiff claims, it was to be ascertained whether the disfigurement would prove to be permanent or merely transitory. This is not an action of tort; that is, it is not an action for malpractice based upon negligence. It is an action for the breach of an alleged oral agreement whereby defendant warranted that his radium treatments would not leave a permanent scar. It is subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, therefore, and not subdivision 3 of section 340 of that Code, which is applicable; and the statute of limitations did not run until the expiration of two years from the time when plaintiff's cause of action accrued.

[2] On a motion for nonsuit that view of the evidence must be taken which is most favorable to the plaintiff. Not only must all the evidence in favor of the plaintiff be be taken as true, and all contradictory evidence, if any has been given, be disregarded, but, if either of several inferences may reasonably be made, that one must be adopted which is the most favorable to the plaintiff.

[3] The evidence adduced by appellant, considered, as it must be, in the light most favorable to her, was sufficient to make out a case for the jury, both as to the existence of the oral contract of warranty and the accrual of the cause of action within the two-year period. Upon the issue respecting the existence of the contract there was not only the testimony of the appellant herself, but likewise that of one of her witnesses—a woman who accompanied her to respondent's office on the occasion of the first conversation respecting the treatments, and who testified unequivocally that upon that occasion "Dr. Duncan gave the absolute promise that the treatments would not scar her neck."

[4-6] The only serious question in the case is that which is concerned with the time when appellant's cause of action accrued and the statute of limitations commenced to run. The general rule undoubtedly is that in all personal actions for the violation of an express or implied contract the statute begins to run from the date of the wrong—the breach of the contract—and not from the date of the damages caused by it. The question therefore is: When was the contract of warranty broken? Where a warranty relates to a future event by which it will be ascertained whether it will be breached or not, no breach occurs, and consequently no cause of action accrues, until the happening of such future event. Thus, where a seller warrants that fruit trees will bear a certain kind of fruit, or that a carpet when laid will not develop grease spots, the warranty is breached and the statute commences to run only when the trees begin to bear fruit or the spots develop in the carpet. Allen v. Todd, 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 222; Ingalls v. Angell, 76 Wash. 692, 137 Pac. 309; Firth v. Richter, 49 Cal. App. 545, 196 Pac. 277; Carpet Co. v. Dornan, 64 Mo. App. 17. So here the warranty related to a future event—the possible future development of a permanent scar—and the contract of warranty was broken when a reasonable person, circumstanced in all respects as appellant was, and who had received such warranty as was given here, could know with a reasonable degree of certainty that a permanent scar had developed as a result of the treatments.

Before consulting Dr. Duncan appellant had sought the advice of a Dr. Smith, who sent her to respondent. She testified as follows concerning her first conversation with respondent:

> "I said that I wanted him to look at my neck; that I had a small swelling in the right side of my neck. Dr. Smith had taken it up with him, and had informed me that Dr. Duncan was very successful in treating small swellings and glands of that description without leaving a scar of any kind. I told him that; and Dr. Duncan looked at my neck, and said, 'Yes,' that he had been very successful in treating glands of that kind without leaving a scar of any kind—that that was what they used radium for, so there would not be any scars, and in fact that they used radium to eliminate scars. He explained as he went on that they removed birthmarks with radium, and at that time he * * * was treating a small child who had fallen in a bonfire; he was treating it successfully with radium to remove all these shriveling effects that the burn had left on the child's face, and bringing it back to the natural shape. * * * I * * * told him that Dr. Smith had thought that I should be operated upon, but the doctor [Smith] had told me that he didn't want to operate upon my neck because by operating upon it it would leave a knife scar, and rather than leave a knife scar on my neck, because he knew I had gone out socially, that he would rather turn my case over to Dr. Duncan and not have a scar on my neck. That is what I told Dr. Duncan. Dr. Duncan told me 'Yes;' that he was very successful in operating upon these cases without leaving a scar. He brought out pictures in a book that showed cases that he had treated of goiters where it would show quite a large goiter and that it was successfully removed by radium without leaving a scar of any kind. He showed me a picture * * * of a gentleman who had been operated upon * * * with a knife operation, leaving, as he termed it, shriveled in scars, where after it was treated with radium left the skin absolutely clear and free from any scar of any kind. * * * He said, aside from the little kernel that might be in my neck, that I would never know that my neck had been operated upon; and, of course, I asked him if I would suffer any inconvenience from this treatment, and he said 'No; none whatever,' that after the radium had been applied my neck would get just like a sunburn, he said, just as if I had gone to the beach and gotten my neck sunburned, and, of course, that I would have to give that time to pass away, and when it did that my neck would resume its natural shade, and be free from any mark whatever; and he says 'I am going to say that, aside from a little kernel that you will feel for the time, you will never know that your neck has ever been operated upon.' I said to him at that time, 'Well, * * * I know I won't be scarred with radium.' And he says, 'That I do know; that is why we use radium, so there will be no scar.' And I said to him, 'Well, I think I might just as well take the chance with radium. Then if it does not do the work and does not relieve the gland, I can then be relieved by the surgical operation.'"

[7] Throughout the treatments, and even after they had ceased, respondent frequently assured appellant that any disfigurement which might result from his use of the radium would disappear with the lapse of time. It may be that nothing which was said by the parties after the termination of the treatments could alter the terms of the contract of warranty which had been made in the course of their first conversation; but statements made by respondent in subsequent conversations may be considered in so far as they throw upon the original understanding and intention of the parties. Such subsequent conversations are in some respects interpretative of the original undertaking.

It is a fair inference from all of the conversations of the parties that it was their understanding of the warranty that a year, or possibly two years, should be allowed to elapse after the cessation of the treatments before it would be advisable to decide definitely whether appellant's neck was permanently scarred. The treatments commenced in the latter part of May or the early part of June of 1917, and ceased about the first of the following month of September. When they came to an end appellant had a deep running sore on her neck, caused by the treatments. When she paid respondent his fee on October 1, 1917, he said to her: "Mrs. Crawford, you don't need to worry; your neck is going to be all right. It might take a year or so for that neck to heal, but don't worry; just give it time." And when the last treatment was given, about September 1, 1917, respondent told appellant that her neck would become "normal" if she "gave it time to heal."

It does not appear when the running sore on appellant's neck healed. Respondent, assuming that it had completely healed more than two years before the action was commenced, and further assuming that appellant necessarily must have been aware as soon as the sore healed that her neck was permanently scarred, earnestly insists that the cause of action must have risen more than two years before the suit was brought. But appellant, who presumably had no more knowledge of such matters than the ordinary layman possesses, and who had intrusted herself to respondent's care, doubtless deferred to the doctor's judgment, based on his years of professional experience in the use of radium as a therapeutic agent. She was justified in assuming that his judgment on such matters was probably correct, if not infallible. There is justification for the inference that the contract which respondent led appellant to understand was the measure of her rights and of his obligations was a contract to the effect that, if a scar made its appearance, time should be allowed to pass in order to ascertain whether or not it was to be a permanent disfigurement. He told her that if she would give her neck time to heal it "would absolutely become normal"; also that "when the blood supply came back to the scar tissue" the neck "would resume its normal shade; that the flesh then would be * * * normal." She was justified in relying upon these repeated assurances of her professional adviser.

[8] Whether such reasonable time as was contemplated by the warranty had elapsed more than two years before the commencement of the action was a question which should have been submitted to the jury, guided by proper instructions from the court.

Our conclusion is that the nonsuit was improperly granted, and that the judgment should be reversed. It is so ordered.

TABOADA et al. v. SOCIEDAD ESPANOLA DE BENEFICENCIA MUTUA et al.

Rehearing Denied June 14, 1923.)

1. Beneficial associations 🔑5(2)—Constitutional provision permitting amendment of constitution or statutes does not permit amendment of by-laws requiring trial of members sought to be expelled.

A section of the constitution of a mutual benefit society permitting amendment of the constitution and statutes does not permit amendment of by-laws requiring trial of members sought to be expelled.

2. Beneficial associations 🔑10(4)—Cannot expel members without trial.

The rule that no man can be condemned or prejudiced in his rights without an opportunity to make his defense is not confined to courts and strictly legal tribunals, but is applicable to every tribunal having power to adjudicate questions involving legal consequences, such as a mutual benefit society, which, in acting on the expulsion of members, is a quasi judicial body, conducting a quasi judicial hearing, involving a substantial, enforceable right.

3. Beneficial associations 🔑10(4)—Members cannot be deprived of right to trial before expulsion by suspending by-laws providing for trial.

Members sought to be expelled from a mutual benefit society cannot be deprived of their right to a notice of hearing and an opportunity to be heard in their own defense by temporarily suspending sections of the by-laws providing for trial, though other sections permit suspension thereof.

4. Appeal and error 🔑1170(3)—Overruling demurrer for misjoinder of parties held not reversible error.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 475, and Const. art. 6, § 4½, error, if any, in overruling a demurrer for misjoinder of parties plaintiff in mandamus proceedings by persons expelled as a body from a mutual benefit society, is not a ground for reversal, in the absence of any showing that defendants were deceived or placed at a disadvantage in preparing and presenting their defense, though the complaint alleges no facts showing a causal connection between the various plaintiffs' causes of action; no miscarriage of justice having resulted.

5. Stipulations 🔑7—Stipulation that petitioners were members of defendant's society held sufficient showing of good standing when petition filed.

A stipulation by opposing counsel that petitioners for a writ of mandate commanding defendants to enroll them as members in good standing of a mutual benefit society were members in good standing on the date of their attempted expulsion and had since tendered their dues, which were refused, held a sufficient showing, in the absence of a contrary showing, that they continued to be members in good standing and were entitled to restoration of their privileges as such when the petition was filed, though the insufficiency and illegality of the expulsion proceedings were not alleged, the burden of showing that they had been legally expelled being on defendants (Code Civ. Proc. § 1869).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Application by Rogelio Taboada and others for writ of mandate directed to Sociedad Espanola De Beneficencia Mutua, a corporation, and others. From a judgment granting the writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Russell P. Tyler and Arthur Brand, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

O. M. Goldaracena and J. J. Paulsell, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, wherein the plaintiffs sought and secured a writ of madate directed to and commanding the defendants, the appellants here, to permit the plaintiffs, respondents here, as members in good standing of the Sociedad Espanola De Beneficencia Mutua free access to all of the meetings of said society, and further directing and commanding that the said defendants placed upon the roster of membership of said society the names of said plaintiffs as members in good standing and entitled to all of the rights and privileges of such members.

The pleaded and practically undisputed facts of the case are these:

The plaintiffs were at one time members in good standing of the fraternal organization hereinbefore mentioned. The said organization is a mutual benefit society carrying the usual fraternal features of death and sick benefits, organized, created, and existing as a corporation under the laws of the state of California. Each of the defendants named herein is an officer of the said society. Said plaintiffs were prevented by force, at the hands of the defendants, from attending and being present at the meetings of said society, and the names of said plaintiffs were expunged from the membership roll of said society. The plaintiffs later applied for reinstatement as members in good standing of said society, but were refused, and there is no tribunal, board, nor committee of said society to which the plaintiffs may appeal for the redress of their grievance.

Upon the hearing in the court below, the defendants introduced in evidence an entry made in the minutes of a meeting held on June 24, 1921, which was to the effect that pursuant to the provisions of section 72 of the constitution, by two-thirds vote of the members present, the by-laws were suspended, and thereupon, without hearing, the plaintiffs were, by a viva voce vote, ordered expelled from membership in the society.

The governing rules and laws of the organization are embodied in a constitution, by-laws, and statutes. Sections 24, 26, 27, and 28 of the by-laws, which, it is claimed by defendants, were suspended "pursuant to the provisions of section 72 of the constitution," provide for the trial of members of the society charged with having violated any of the rules of the society, and the method of determining and imposing the penalty. Briefly stated, these sections provide that every charge against a member shall be made in writing setting out precisely the nature of the offense with which he is charged; that he shall be furnished with an exact copy of said accusation; that the accusation shall be referred to a committee of five members, who shall be elected by the society, and which shall issue summons and proceed to try the case. It is further provided that the accused shall have two weeks to prepare for his defense; that during all of the proceedings he shall be entitled to have a member of the society represent him as his attorney and that if the penalty is provided in the constitution and by-laws the president shall enforce the same, but if the penalty is not designated, the society itself shall decide upon it by secret ballot, and the penalty of expulsion cannot be imposed unless a majority of two-thirds vote for that penalty.

[1] Section 72 of the constitution prohibits any amendment of the constitution and statutes except in cases of necessity, and in that event only at a meeting and by a vote of two-thirds majority of the members present. Obviously, this provision of the society's constitution having reference, as it does, only to an amendment of the constitution and statutes has no relevancy to the right to amend the by-laws. It is in the by-laws that the provisions providing for a trial of the members, hereinbefore set out, are contained. The right to amend the by-laws, therefore, if any such right be provided, must be found in some other provision of the governing rules of the society.

Section 37 of the by-laws provides that—

> "the by-laws may be altered or amended by giving one week's notice in writing of the alteration or amendment proposed, except that any of the by-laws or any part of them may be suspended by a vote of two-thirds of the members present."

At first blush this section furnishes the authorization necessary and renders proper the procedure followed by the society in the instant case. But this section does not and cannot have, we think, the efficacy claimed for it by the defendants.

Undoubtedly the purpose of sections 24, 26, 27, and 28 of the by-laws, attempted to be suspended under the authority of section 37 of the by-laws, was to protect and preserve the rights of the members against arbitrary action, and to preclude the rights of the members being jeopardized by passion and prejudice.

[2, 3] This purpose cannot be circumvented by the easy device of suspending the by-laws providing such safeguards. This right to a fair and impartial trial, contemplated and seemingly guaranteed by these sections, is not a mere pretense or shadow, but a real substantial, enforceable right. It is a fundamental principle of justice that no man may be condemned or prejudiced in his rights without an opportunity to make his defense. This rule is not confined alone to courts of justice and strictly legal tribunals, but is applicable to every tribunal which has the power and authority to adjudicate questions involving legal consequences. And a society acting upon the expulsion of a member is a quasi judicial body, and its hearing is a quasi judicial hearing. Otto v. Tailors' P. & B. Union, 75 Cal. 308, 17 Pac. 217, 7 Am. St. Rep. 156. The proceedings of the society, in order to be regular and legal, in effect, must therefore provide for notice to the accused and afford him an opportunity to be heard. Fay v. Supreme Tent, Knights of the Maccabees of the World, 38 Misc. Rep. 427, 77 N. Y. Supp. 994, 996.

Indeed, it has been held that even though the by-laws expressly provide for the expulsion of a member without a trial such a provision is void, and an expulsion in pursuance of such a by-law is not binding. Ludowiski v. Benevolent Society, 29 Mo. App. 337; People ex rel. Schmitt v. Saint Franciscus Benevolent Society, 24 How. Prac. (N. Y.) 216, 221; Berkhout v. Supreme Council Royal Arcanum, 62 N. J. Law 103, 43 Atl. 1. And, surely, if a member is entitled of right to a notice of hearing and an opportunity to be heard in his own defense, a right of which he cannot be deprived, notwithstanding the fact that a by-law of the society provides for the expulsion of a member without trial, the same result cannot be accomplished by the simple device of temporarily suspending those sections of the by-laws which provide for a trial.

It has been held that, in the absence of by-laws covering the subject, a member is entitled to a fair trial after due notice, and that the procedure in such cases is to be analogous to ordinary judicial proceedings so far as necessary to render substantial justice. People v. Alpha Lodge, 13 Misc. Rep. 677, 35 N. Y. Supp. 214, 218; Wachtel v. Noah Widows' & Orphans' Ben. Soc., 84 N. Y. 28, 38 Am. Rep. 478; Simmons v. Syracuse, 56 Hun, 645, 10 N. Y. Supp. 293, 294; Fritz v. Muck, 62 How. Prac. 69, 74. In Von Arx v. San Francisco Gruetli Verein, 113 Cal. 377, 379, 45 Pac. 685, 686, this court said:

> "Where there are no * * * by-laws, a court will inquire whether or not an expelled member has had a reasonable notice of the proceeding which resulted in his expulsion, and a fair opportunity of presenting his defense in accordance with general principles of law and justice."

Upon the suspension of the by-laws, the society in the instant case was temporarily in the situation of being without by-laws covering and controlling the action which they were about to take, and this situation being identical with those cases in which no by-laws had been provided is to be governed by the same rules.

The minutes of the society introduced in evidence show that the plaintiffs did not have a fair trial, or any trial at all. In the absence of such a trial and opportunity of being heard, the plaintiffs herein were not legally expelled.

[4] Even though it be conceded that the demurrer should have been sustained upon the ground of misjoinder of parties plaintiff in this: That no allegation appears in the complaint of any fact or facts showing or tending to show the slightest causal connection between the causes of action of any of the plaintiffs, nevertheless, the facts developed upon the trial of the case showed that all of the plaintiffs were, as one joint body, by one joint vote, as one joint act, expelled from the society. Upon the validity and binding effect of that one act, therefore, depends the right of each of the plaintiffs to the relief sought. The case was tried upon this theory, and this point put in issue by the evidence is determinative of the rights of all of the petitioners. It does not appear that the defendants were deceived by the claimed defect in the pleading, nor that they were thereby placed at a disadvantage in preparing and presenting their defense. It is clear that a right result was reached, and under the provisions of section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure and the requirements of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, no miscarriage of justice having resulted, the error, if any, of the trial court in overruling the demurrer, cannot be availed of to secure a reversal of the judgment. Atlas Development Co. v. National Surety Co. (Cal. Sup.) 212 Pac. 196.

In Pleasant School Tp. v. Fultz (Ind. App.) 137 N. E. 60, the court, applying a statute similar in effect to the provisions of the above-cited sections of the Code and Constitution, held that "no objection taken by demurrer and overruled shall be sufficient to reverse the judgment if it appear from the whole record that the merits have been fairly tried and determined." And in Davis v. Hunter (Ind. App.) 138 N. E. 785, the same court held that wherever a complaint might have been amended, on motion in the trial court, so as to conform to the evidence admitted without objection, the court would on appeal deem the amendment to have been made.

[5] Before the plaintiffs were entitled to the relief prayed for, it was incumbent upon them to prove that they were, on the date of the filing of their petition, members in good standing in the society. On the trial it was stipulated by the opposing counsel that the petitioners were members in good standing on June 24, the date of the attempted expulsion, and that they had thereafter tendered their dues, which had been refused. This, in the absence of a contrary showing by defendants that they had forfeited their rights, was a sufficient showing that the plaintiffs had continued to be members in good standing, and were on the date of the filing of the petition entitled to a restoration of the privileges appertaining thereto. It was not necessary that petitioners should anticipate the defense of the defendants by alleging the insufficiency and illegality of the expulsion proceedings. Nuckolls v. College of Physicians, etc., 7 Cal. App. 233, 94 Pac. 81. The sufficiency and legality of the purported expulsion proceedings were matters of defense. The burden of the evidence showing that the plaintiffs had been legally expelled was upon the defendants. Section 1869, Code Civ. Proc.; Melone v. Ruffino, 129 Cal. 514, 62 Pac. 93, 79 Am. St. Rep. 127. This defendants failed to do.

It follows from what has been said that plaintiffs are entitled to the writ of mandamus restoring them to their privileges in the society.

Judgment affirmed.

BERKOVITZ v. AMERICAN RIVER GRAVEL CO. (Sac. 3206.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 19, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟹705(4)—Ordinary care excuses not having lighted tail lamp on motor vehicle.

While driving a motor vehicle at night with the red tail lamp unlighted, in violation of statute or ordinance, is presumptively negligence and conclusively so till rebutted, ignorance of the fact of it not being lighted, where ordinary care has been exercised to have it lighted, is a sufficient excuse.

2. Municipal corporations ⟹706(6)—Freedom from negligence in not having lighted tail lamp on motor truck question for jury.

Testimony of the driver of a motor truck with the rear of which an automobile collided, that three or four blocks back he looked and saw his red tail lamp was burning, if believed, would authorize the jury in concluding that he was not negligent, even if the light was out at the time of the collision.

3. Negligence 🔑56(1)—Proximate cause of injury sufficient.

To render one liable, his negligence need not be proved to be the "direct" cause of the injury, but it is enough that it was the "proximate" cause, which may be indirect.

4. Appeal and error 🔑882(12)—Error in instruction for plaintiff not mitigated by defendant's erroneous request.

That refusal of defendant's requested instruction—that unless defendant failed to use reasonable or ordinary care to keep the tail lamp of his motor truck lighted, and such failure directly and proximately caused the collision, plaintiff cannot recover—was justified by the word "directly," does not mitigate the error in giving plaintiff's instruction, stating, unconditionally, that defendant was negligent if its truck was being driven at night without such lamp being lighted.

5. Trial 🔑210(1)—Instruction as to calling adversary as witness not required by circumstances.

Where, after plaintiff had rested, it was stipulated that defendant might later call her for further cross-examination, and she was thereafter called "for further examination," and examined by defendant, it must be assumed, and the jury must have understood, that this further examination was conducted pursuant to the stipulation; so there was no error in refusing defendant's requested instruction embodying Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, as to calling and examining an adverse party and the effect thereof.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1033(5)—Favorable instruction may not be complained of.

Though the testimony showed only that plaintiff was employed during the fourth month preceding her injury, the amount she earned not appearing, and that she thereafter helped her mother with the housework for a time and then took a vacation, giving plaintiff's instruction, authorizing the jury in estimating the damages to consider the moneys which she would have earned had she not been injured, was not error; it being more favorable to defendant than an approved instruction, given under similar facts that one of the elements of plaintiff's damage was the value of her time during the period when she was disabled by the injury.

7. Trial 🔑228(1)—Good practice to adhere to approved instructions.

It is good practice to adhere to approved instructions.

8. Evidence 🔑514(2)—Distance required for stopping auto subject for expert testimony.

The distance within which a Dodge car going 20 miles an hour can be stopped is not a matter of such common knowledge as to preclude admission of expert testimony.

9. Evidence 🔑529—Whether injury to truck could have been caused by auto at certain speed subject for expert testimony.

Whether the injury to a moving truck by collision of Dodge car following it could have been caused by the car if traveling only 20 miles an hour is a subject for expert testimony.

10. Evidence 🔑380, 474(1)—Foundation for admission of photograph.

Testimony that a photograph is a correct representation of the object sought to be shown is sufficient foundation for its admission; and this need not be given by the photographer, but may be given by any one having sufficient knowledge of the object to say that the photograph is a faithful representation thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Action by Virginia Berkovitz against the American River Gravel Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Irving D. Gibson, of Sacramento, for appellant.

J. M. Inman and Downey & Downey, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This case was ordered transferred to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District. Upon further consideration we are satisfied that the conclusion of that court is correct, and we adopt the following portions of its opinion, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice Finch, as the opinion of this court:

"The plaintiff recovered judgment for damages alleged to have been sustained through the defendant's negligence. The only negligence alleged consisted in driving a motor truck on a public highway at night without a 'tail light or any light whatsoever on the rear of said truck.'

"At 2 o'clock a. m. September 3, 1919, plaintiff and another woman and two men were traveling westerly on J street, Sacramento, in a Dodge touring car, the plaintiff riding in the front seat with one of the men, who was driving. Near Thirty-Third street they crashed into the rear end of a five-ton Peerless truck loaded with gravel and traveling in the same direction. The man riding in the rear seat of the Dodge car was killed and the plaintiff was seriously injured. The automobile was wrecked beyond repair. The truck, with its load, weighed about 13 tons. The left rear wheel of the truck was struck with such force as to bend the 3x4 inch steel axle three inches out of alignment. The truck was traveling at a speed estimated by the witnesses at from 8 to 12 miles an hour; the Dodge car at from 20 to 40 miles an hour. In estimating the force of the impact, the velocity of the truck must be deducted from that of the automobile. Reasoning back from effect to cause, the damage to the two machines justifies the inference that the Dodge car was exceeding the lawful speed limit. The street was lighted by arc lights of 400 candle power spaced 269 feet apart. The headlights of the automobile were adjusted to comply with the state law.

"The evidence was sharply conflicting as to whether the tail light on the truck was burning at the time of the accident. It was a coaloil lamp of the type used for tail lights. Several witnesses who overtook and passed the truck a short time prior to the accident testified that the tail lamp was not lighted. Two witnesses testified that defendant's truck pulled their truck over Brigton crossing, a few miles from the scene of the accident, and that the tail light on defendant's truck was then burning. The driver of the truck testified that he got off at Fifty-Sixth street on J and observed that the tail light was burning and that he looked back three or four blocks from the scene of the accident and saw the reflection of the tail light on the street.

[1-3] "Defendant's proposed instruction No. 14, which was refused by the court, among other things, stated: 'Unless you believe from the evidence that defendant failed to use reasonable or ordinary care to keep said lamp [the tail light] lighted, and that said failure, if such you believe there was, directly and proximately caused or contributed to the collision; the plaintiff cannot recover. The court gave instruction No. 5, proposed by plaintiff, as follows: 'You are instructed that the law of this state required at the time of the collision every motor truck while on the public highway during the period from one-half hour after sunset of one day to one-half hour before sunrise of the next day to carry at the rear a lighted lamp exhibiting a red light. If you believe from all the evidence in this case that the motor truck belonging to the defendant was being driven by the agent of the defendant in the course of his employment during this period of time without such a lighted lamp, then the defendant was guilty of negligence, and if you believe that the plaintiff, Virginia Berkovitz, was, without fault on her part, injured by reason hereof, your verdict should be in favor of the plaintiff.' Instruction No. 5 is a correct statement of the law in most cases where the violation of a statute is charged. By the exercise of ordinary care, the driver of a motor vehicle at night would always know whether the headlights were burning and in such a case instruction No. 5 would be strictly accurate. The tail light, however, is not in the immediate view of the driver, whose attention is ordinarily directed ahead, and it cannot be the intention of the law that a watchman must be maintained over the rear light to observe whether it is constantly burning. It is well known that with the best of care coaloil lights, as well as electric lights, sometimes go out. If one drives a motor vehicle in the night time when he knows, or in the exercise of ordinary care ought to know, that the tail light is not burning, he is guilty of negligence. While ignorance of the law is no excuse, ignorance of the fact, where ordinary care has been exercised, is a sufficient excuse. Violation of an ordinance 'is presumptively an act of negligence and conclusively so until rebutted by evidence that it was justifiable or excusable under the circumstances.' Mora v. Favilla, 186 Cal. 199, 199 Pac. 17; Gooding v. Chutes Co., 155 Cal. 622, 102 Pac. 819, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1071, 18 Ann. Cas. 671; Cragg v. Los Angeles Trust Co., 154 Cal. 667, 98 Pac. 1063, 16 Ann. Cas. 1061; Baddeley v. Shea, 114 Cal. 6, 45 Pac. 990, 33 L. R. A. 747, 55 Am. St. Rep. 56. 'The only question remaining open on this point is whether conclusive proof of the violation of such a statute or ordinance is also conclusive proof of negligence. Some courts have held that it is, and some that it is not. But the true rule is perfectly plain. The violation of such a law, left without explanation or excuse, is conclusive of negligence, but it may be excused. * * * If some good excuse appears which would be a sufficient defense to an action for the penalty imposed by the law * * * then the law is not really violated. * * * We find but few cases in which this is clearly stated; but they deserve to take precedence of all the others, as they reconcile the principle upon which the others were actually decided.' Shearman & Redfield on Neg. § 467. The defendant was entitled to an instruction embodying, as did this one, the substance of the rule as herein stated. If the jury believed the testimony of the driver to the effect that the tail light was burning three or four blocks east of the place of the accident, they might have concluded, under proper instructions, that he was not guilty of negligence even though the light was out when the collision occurred.'

[4] "It may be noted in passing that instruction No. 14, considered in the abstract, is erroneous in that it calls upon the plaintiff to prove that defendant's negligence was the direct cause of her injuries, whereas the law requires that it be the proximate cause, which may be indirect. Merrill v. L. A. C. & E. Co., 158 Cal. 499, 503, 111 Pac. 534, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134; Schneider v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry. Co., 99 Wis. 378, 75 N. W. 169. It may be conceded that the trial court was justified in refusing this instruction, but this does not mitigate the error in giving plaintiff's instruction No. 5.

[5] "The court refused defendant's proposed instruction No. 29, embodying the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as added by St. 1917, p. 58. Counsel for appellant states in his brief that defendant called and examined plaintiff as a witness. He does not call attention to anything in the record to support such statement and nothing to that effect has been discovered. After plaintiff had rested, it was stipulated that the defendant might later call her for further cross-examination. She was thereafter called 'for further examination' and examined by counsel for defendant. It must be assumed, and the jury must have understood, that this further examination was conducted pursuant to the stipulation.

[6, 7] "Complaint is made of the court's refusal to give other instructions proposed by the defendant. It would unduly lengthen this opinion to analyze them all. It is sufficient to state that they either contain inaccurate statements of the law or are covered by other instructions given.

"The giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 19 is assigned as error in that it authorized the jury in estimating the damages to take into consideration 'the moneys which she would have earned had she not sustained the injuries complained of, if any.' The testimony shows that the plaintiff was employed during the month of May preceding the accident, the amount she earned not appearing, and that she thereafter helped her mother with the housework for a time and then took a vacation. Under a somewhat similar state of facts, an instruction was approved which told the jury that one of the elements of the plaintiff's damage was 'the value of his time during the period when he was disabled by the injury.' Storrs v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 134 Cal. 91, 92, 66 Pac. 72; Melone v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 113, 115, 91 Pac. 522. The difference between the two instructions is rather shadowy, but the one here complained of seems more favorable to the defendant than the other. However, it is good practice to adhere to approved instructions.

"The court sustained objections to questions asked by defendant for the purpose of proving that the plaintiff was married and for that reason could not maintain the action as to certain elements of damage claimed. It is sufficient to say that the answer raised no issue to which such evidence was pertinent.

[8] "Objection was improperly sustained to a question asked an expert witness as to the distance which a Dodge car going 20 miles an hour can be stopped. The fact sought to be shown is not a matter of such common knowledge as to preclude the admission of expert testimony. The objection sustained was as follows: 'Objected to as not a subject of expert testimony. Irrelevant, immaterial, and incompetent. For the jury.' The question was not objectionable on the grounds stated. Howland v. Oakland C. Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 513, 521, 42 Pac. 983; Withey v. Fowler Co., 164 Iowa, 377, 145 N. W. 923; Johnson v. Quinn, 130 Minn. 134, 153 N. W. 267; Blado v. Draper, 89 Neb. 787, 132 N. W. 410; Reaves v. Maybank, 193 Ala. 614, 69 South. 137; Bishop v. Wight, 221 Fed. 392, 137 C. C. A. 200.

[9] "The court erroneously sustained a similar objection to expert testimony as to whether the damage to the truck as shown by the evidence could have been caused by the Dodge car traveling at a speed of 20 miles an hour. Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 715, 103 Pac. 190; Yaeger v. Southern California Ry. Co., 5 Cal. Unrep. 870, 51 Pac. 190; Dow v. City of Oroville, 22 Cal. App. 215, 226, 134 Pac. 197; People v. Sampo, 17 Cal. App. 135, 149, 118 Pac. 957; Young v. Dunlap, 195 Mo. App. 119, 190 S. W. 1041, 1044; Posener v. Harvey (Tex. Civ. App.) 125 S. W. 356.

[10] "Some controversy arose as to the proper foundation for the admission of photographs of the wrecked automobile in evidence. The rule is quite simple. Testimony that a photograph is a correct representation of the object sought to be shown is a sufficient foundation for its admission. Such testimony need not necessarily be given by the photographer who took or finished the photograph, but may be given by any witness having sufficient knowledge of the object to say that the photograph is a faithful representation thereof. People v. Ah Lee, 164 Cal. 350, 352, 128 Pac. 1035; People v. Durrant, 116 Cal. 179, 212, 48 Pac. 75.

"Numerous other objections are made to the rulings of the court, but they do not appear to be of substantial merit. In view of the contentions made as to the sufficiency of the pleadings in certain particulars, the trial court is directed to permit either party to amend if so advised."

The judgment is reversed.

191 Cal. 152

McBRIDE et al. v. FREEMAN et ux.

(L. A. 7052.)

1. Covenants 🔑79(3)—Purchaser of lot in restricted tract cannot enforce restriction against other grantees.

One buying property with the understanding that it is restricted, and in reliance on existence of a general plan of improvement for the whole tract, does not have a right to enforce the restriction against another grantee who takes with full knowledge and notice of the restriction; the covenants being a part of each and every deed to lots in the tract, and the deed showing that a uniform plan must have been in existence.

2. Deeds 🔑145—To avoid forfeitures conditions construed as covenants.

In the construction of a conveyance, ordinarily, to avoid forfeiture, conditions will be construed as covenants when this can reasonably be done.

3. Injunction 🔑118(2)—Complaint to enjoin violation of building restriction lacked averment that restrictions were intended for benefit of entire tract.

In action to enjoin construction of a building not permitted under restriction in a deed, where complaint lacked averment that the restrictions were intended by both parties thereto to be for benefit of all the lots in the tract, or that defendants purchased their lots with knowledge of such intention or agreement, it stated no cause of action.

4. Injunction 🔑123—Complaint tendered no issue to which offered parol evidence of intention to parties relevant.

In action to enjoin construction of a building not permitted under restriction in a deed, where the complaint contained no allegation as to intention of grantees in the deeds, it tendered no issue to which parol evidence to establish intention of the parties was relevant.

5. Covenants 🔑49—Restricted rights in real property created only by written instrument between parties.

Where parties desire to create mutual rights in real property in respect to building construction, the rights must be declared within the written instruments exchanged between them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Albert Lee Stephens, Judge.

Action for injunction by A. N. McBride and another against H. Freeman and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Charles E. Millikan and Lloyd Wright, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

C. E. Spencer and W. A. Freeman, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MYERS, J. Plaintiffs appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin defendants from proceeding with the erection of a building in violation of a uniform building restriction. The sole question presented upon the appeal is whether the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. It is alleged in the complaint:

That one Allen, who was the owner of a large parcel of land, caused a map thereof to be recorded, subdividing the same into a large number of lots, and then proceeded to sell and convey said lots by reference to said map to various persons, including the predecessors in interest of plaintiffs and defendants, "and in accordance wtih a general plan or scheme for the improvement of said tract the said owner inserted in each and every deed conveying said lots, or any of them, restrictions and conditions in words and figures as follows: 'Subject to following building restrictions: No offices, stores, flats, lodging or apartment or any business building of any description to be erected, kept or maintained on said property, but a residence, same when erected to cost not less than three thousand ($3,000.00) dollars on lots 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53 and south 30 feet of lot 47; to cost not less than thirty-five hundred ($3,500.00) dollars on lot 44 and north 15 feet of lot 43; to cost not less than four thousand ($4,000.00) dollars on north 90 feet of lot 47; and all to be placed at a uniform distance of forty-two and one-half feet from front property line on Willard Ave.' That all of the lots in said tract have been sold or are being offered for sale in accordance with said general plan or scheme, and subject to said restrictions and conditions, and that said restrictions were imposed and said general plan or scheme adopted for the general benefit of all lots in said tract, and that the respective lots owned by plaintiffs, and each of them, and the lot now owned by defendants, and the other lots in said tract sold and conveyed as aforesaid, were each and all conveyed by a common grantor, to wit, the said E. L. Allen, and subject to the restrictions and conditions aforesaid and pursuant to and in accordance with the aforesaid general plan or scheme for the improvement of said tract and the several groups of lots shown on said map." That by mesne conveyances, each containing the same restrictions, plaintiffs received title to their respective lots and defendants received title to their lot. That the plaintiffs or their predecessors in interest purchased their respective lots in reliance upon said general plan or scheme and upon said restrictions and conditions, and that each of the plaintiffs has erected upon his lot a residence in compliance with said restrictions, and that defendants are now proceeding with the erection of a building on their said lot which is in violation of said restrictions.

[1] The question thus presented is stated by appellants as follows:

> "Does one grantee who buys his property with the understanding that it is restricted, and in reliance upon the existence of a general plan of improvement for the whole tract of which his lot forms a part, have a right in equity to enforce the restriction against another grantee who takes with full knowledge and notice of the restriction, the covenants being a part of each and every deed to lots in the tract and the deeds showing that a uniform plan must have been in existence?"

This precise question was answered adversely to appellants' contentions in the case of Werner v. Graham, 181 Cal. 174, 183 Pac. 945. Appellants contend that what was there said upon this subject was dictum, for the reason that the restrictions there under consideration were cast in the form of a condition, and that what was there decided should be held inapplicable to restrictions, as in the instant case, which are cast in the form of covenants. This contention cannot be sustained. Viewing the restrictions under consideration in the Werner Case as conditions, no substantial question was presented by that appeal. The court disposed of that question in the following words:

> "If the provisions are in fact conditions and not covenants, the defendants are not entitled to enforce them against the plaintiff, for the reversion clause runs in favor of Marshall [the common grantor], his heirs and assigns, and does not include the defendants, since by 'assigns' must be meant in this state assignees of the reversion or right of re-entry."

[2] It is well settled that—

> "In the construction of a conveyance, ordinarily, to avoid forfeiture, conditions will be construed as covenants, when this can reasonably be done." 9 Cal. Juris, p. 336, and cases cited.

In recognition of this rule the court then proceeded to consider and decide that case upon the assumption that the restrictions therein, though in form of conditions, were, in fact, covenants, and what was there decided, in that view of the case, can in no sense be regarded as dictum.

Appellants suggest, in effect, that Werner v. Graham should be overruled, and assert that it is contrary to the great weight of authority from other states. The latter may be conceded, but presents in itself no sufficient reason for a departure at this time from the rules there enunciated. After a careful reconsideration of the questions there involved, we are satisfied with the validity of the conclusions there stated, and with the soundness of the reasoning by which they were reached. The rules there enunciated are rules of property, and have stood unchallenged and unquestioned for more than three years. That case has since been cited as authority by this court in Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Marr, 187 Cal. 126, 200 Pac. 1051, and Mapel v. Canady (Cal. Sup.) 208 Pac. 280, and the conclusions there reached were clearly forecasted by previous decisions of this court over a long period of years. In Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. Muir (1902) 136 Cal. 36, 50, 68 Pac. 308, 313, the court said:

> "In the absence of any words in the deed to this effect, or any reference to a plan showing a general scheme of improvement, the grantees took their estate without any notice, express or constructive, that the restriction was intended for the benefit of the adjoining estate"—citing cases.

In Hunt v. Jones, 149 Cal. 297, 86 Pac. 686, (1906), the court recognized the rule that, where a proper case is presented, equity will enforce a personal covenant or agreement relative to land as effectually as would a court of law had the covenant been one clearly running with the land, and the covenant in that case, having been made expressly for the benefit of plaintiff's land, was held enforceable in equity as against an assignee of the covenantor who took with notice thereof. Bryan v. Grosse, 155 Cal. 132, 99 Pac. 499, is to the same effect. In Long v. Cramer Meat & Packing Co. (1909) 155 Cal. 402, 101 Pac. 297, the court, in an equity case, refused to enforce such a covenant, which rested in parol, saying:

> "While it is true that, in a proper case, equity will enforce against the covenantor's grantee a personal covenant imposing restrictions upon the use of land contained in the grant thereof [citing cases], yet equity will do so only in a proper case, and would certainly withhold its hand where such a restriction is not imposed by grant, but is sought to be created by parol. The same is true of the attempt to erect out of this agreement some servitude."

In Berryman v. Hotel Savoy (1911) 160 Cal. 559, 117 Pac. 677, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 5, the court said:

> "The intention of the parties should be 'determined by a fair interpretation of the grant or reserve creating the easement.' [Citing cases.] 'It seems to us that in all these cases it is better to get at the intention of the grantor from the language of the deed, interpreted in the light of the attending circumstances, than to conjecture the intent from the circumstances, and then to make the language of the deed bend to that.'"

Alderson v. Cutting (1912) 163 Cal. 503, 126 Pac. 157, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1, involved a case of uniform building restrictions wherein "each of said deeds declared that the conditions stated should, as to each owner of any other lot in the tract, his heirs, successors or assigns, operate as covenants running with the land for the benefit of such other lots or their owners." These restrictions were held enforceable by one grantee as against another.

In Bresee v. Dunn (1918) 178 Cal. 96, 172 Pac. 387, the court said:

> "Undoubtedly, covenants imposing building restrictions have been frequently upheld, but the courts are slow to declare such burdens upon real property to exist unless it clearly appears from the deeds of conveyance not only that a general scheme of improvement is contemplated, but also if a grantee of the original covenantee seeks to enforce a restriction, that it is not a mere personal covenant, but passes with the land. * * * There is nothing in either of the quotations from conveyances set forth in plaintiff's pleading and nothing in the averments of the complaint to take the pleaded restrictions out of the category of purely personal covenants made for the original grantor's benefit." (The italics are added in the foregoing quotations.)

It is true that language may be found in the opinion in each of those cases which, taken by itself, would seem to point to a different conclusion, but the excerpts above quoted are in harmony with the points there actually decided. It is also true that each of those cases is distinguishable from the Werner Case on the ground of a difference in the facts. But a careful consideration of the points decided and of the reasons stated therefor will reveal the fact that the decision of the Werner Case followed them as the natural sequence and logical development of a line of decision extending over a period of more than 17 years. In the Werner Case the court said:

> "There are decisions to the effect that when it appears that the owner of a subdivided tract has sold various lots in it from time to time and in each conveyance has exacted restrictive covenants which, it is evident, when all the deeds are considered together, were exacted in accord with a common plan, it is enough, and that mutual equitable servitudes have been created, although in any single deed taken by itself there is nothing to indicate any intent to create such reciprocal rights. [Citing cases.] There is likewise authority to the contrary. Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J. Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543; Roberts v. Scull, 53 N. J. Eq. 396, 43 Atl. 583; Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381; Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 14 Ann. Cas. 1018, 92 Pac. 724."

Appellants assert herein that the cases there cited were misconstrued by this court, and that they do not at all sustain the rule for which they were cited. This assertion is not warranted. Mulligan v. Jordan, 50 N. J.

Eq. 363, 24 Atl. 543, and Roberts v. Scull, 58 N. J. Eq. 396, 43 Atl. 583, both expressly hold that the mere fact that the common grantor had exacted the same restrictions in the deeds to all of the lots in the tract is not sufficient evidence that the covenant was entered into for the benefit of all those lots. Sharp v. Ropes, 110 Mass. 381, holds, in effect, that the exaction of such uniform restrictions, coupled with the further circumstance that the restrictions in terms prohibited the carrying on of any "trade or manufacture injurious or offensive to dwelling houses or their occupants in the neighborhood," would not be sufficient to justify the conclusion that the restrictions were for the benefit of all the lots. Judd v. Robinson, 41 Colo. 222, 92 Pac. 724, 124 Am. St. Rep. 128, 14 Ann. Cas. 1018, is so much in point that if it had been a decision of this court it would have compelled the ruling which was made by the trial court in the case at bar.

Appellants apparently lose sight of the fact that their right to relief herein must rest upon the foundation of a contract between the original grantor and defendants' predecessor in interest, whereby it was agreed that the restrictions should be for the benefit of all the lots in the tract, not merely for the benefit of the grantor, and upon the further foundation that defendants purchased their lot with knowledge or notice of such agreement. As Lord Cottenham said in Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phil. Ch. 774:

> "The question is not whether the covenants run with the land, but whether a party shall be permitted to use the land in a manner inconsistent with the contract entered into by his vendor and with notice of which he purchased." (Italics added.)

And, as was said in Nottingham Patent Brick, etc., Co. v. Butler, 15 Q. B. Div. 261:

> "Where the same vendor selling to several persons plots of land, parts of a larger property, exacts from each of them covenants imposing restrictions on the use of the plots sold, without putting himself under any corresponding obligation, it is a question of fact whether the restrictions are merely matters of agreement between the vendor himself and his vendees, imposed for his own benefit and protection, or are meant by him and understood by the buyers to be for the common advantage of the several purchasers." (Italics added.)

It takes two to make a contract. There must be a meeting of the minds of both parties thereto. The mere fact that the vendor in the exaction of uniform building restrictions had in his own mind a general plan or scheme of improvement falls short of establishing even his own intention that such restrictions shall be for the benefit of any one other than himself, and much less does it establish such a meeting of minds between him and his grantee as is necessary to create a contract. Given such intention in the mind of the grantor, there must have co-existed a like intention in the mind of his grantee before the first element of plaintiff's cause of action can come into existence. A purchaser, realizing that changed conditions in the future might render a release of the restrictions most desirable, might be willing to purchase subject to restrictions for the benefit of a single vendor, while he would be wholly unwilling to purchase subject to the same restrictions in favor of 50 or 500 other lot owners, any one of whom could prevent the release thereof in the future. He might be willing to take the chance of being able to negotiate with his vendor for a release of the restrictions at a later date, but would realize that such a prospect would be hopeless if there should be a large number of separate lot owners each entitled to insist upon the maintenance of the restrictions.

[3] It is not necessary to invoke the rule of the Werner Case herein in order to sustain the judgment appealed from, because the complaint is wholly lacking in any averment that the restrictions were intended by both parties thereto to be for the benefit of all the lots in the tract, and is wholly lacking in any allegation that the defendants purchased their lot with knowledge or notice of any such intention or agreement.

The case of De Gray v. Monmouth Beach Club House Co., 50 N. J. Eq. 329, 24 Atl. 388, chiefly relied upon by appellants makes it clear that—

> "The right of the owner of a lot to enforce a covenant restrictive of the use of another tract, entered into between former owners, depends primarily on the covenant having been made for the benefit of the land embracing said lot."

That case is at variance with the Werner Case in that it holds impliedly that parol evidence may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the intention above referred to. But the principal ground of decision in that case appears to have been that such intention clearly appeared from the language of the deed itself there under consideration, when read in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution. The restrictions embodied in all the deeds therein forbade the use of the property conveyed for any "uses or purposes that shall depreciate the value of the neighboring property for dwelling houses." The court said:

> "The phraseology of the covenant indicates it is for the benefit of neighboring property. There can be no doubt that each purchaser from the trustees was aware of the plan, and bought with the understanding that all the deeds were to contain the covenant, and bought with that consideration in view."

It also appeared that the title to the entire tract was vested in trustees, who held the same for the purpose of selling and making conveyances of all the lots in the tract, and in this connection the court said:

> "The trustees had no other interest in the title than as holding it for sale. The case does not admit of the idea that the covenant was only for the advantage or benefit of the grantors, or that it was other than for the benefit of all the lands and each purchaser. These considerations make the right of the complainant to maintain this action clear."

[4, 5] Appellants' contention that they should have been permitted to introduce parol evidence to establish the intention of the parties may be sufficiently answered by pointing out that they were not entitled to introduce any evidence thereof because their complaint contained no allegation as to the intention of the grantees in said deeds, and therefore tendered no issue to which such evidence would be relevant. But, aside from this consideration, we are satisfied that it is our duty to adhere to the conclusion expressed in the Werner Case:

> "That if the parties desire to create mutual rights in real property of the character of those claimed here they must say so, and must say it in the only place where it can be given legal effect, namely, in the written instruments exchanged between them which constitute the final expression of their understanding."

Any other rule would make important questions of the title to real estate largely dependent upon the uncertain recollection and testimony of interested witnesses. The rule of the Werner Case is supported by every consideration of sound public policy which has led to the enactment and enforcement of statutes of frauds in every English-speaking commonwealth.

The judgment is affirmed.

(191 Cal. 139)

FLYNN et al. v. CHIAPPARI et al.

(S. F. 9762.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 12, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚷495—Discretion of authorities in method of assessments not reviewed in absence of fraud or mistake.

Where the matter of selecting the method of assessment of benefits from street improvements has been committed to municipal authorities, the exercise of their discretion therein will not be reviewed by the courts in absence of fraud or mistake.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷413(1) — Improvement of avenue held within ordinance providing for improvement of "main streets."

Where a street improvement ordinance defined a "main street" as being a street that bounds a block, and a "block" as "the blocks known or described as such upon maps and books of the assessors," and there was no requirement that a block should be rectangular in shape, and the only kinds of streets defined therein were main streets, an avenue for which benefits were assessed was a "main street," notwithstanding that the blocks on which it abutted were irregular in shape.

3. Municipal corporations ⚷456(1)—Location of defendant's property not fronting on street held to present situation requiring a method of assessment other than prescribed in ordinance.

Where an ordinance of San Francisco, adopted in 1913, authorizing street improvements, provided certain methods of making assessment to pay expenses thereof, but, if none of the methods provided were sufficient, the board might establish by resolution a method for such assessment, and where property practically fronted on a street, but in fact it neither fronted nor cornered on it, on account of a portion of another street intervening between the first street and the property line, and such property could not be assessed under any prescribed plan of the ordinance, it presented a situation under the ordinance for the board's establishing a method by means of which assessment could be made.

4. Constitutional law ⚷290(3)—Notice to property owners not required when Legislature determines benefits to property by improvements.

Where the Legislature determines the amount of benefits and property to be benefited, by describing the property to be charged or by establishing a rule which automatically determines the property to be charged when applied to the physical facts, notice to property owners is not required to satisfy due process.

5. Constitutional law ⚷290(3)—Due process requires notice to property owners where administrative board determines property to be charged and fixes benefits.

Where the determination of the property to be charged with assessments for street improvements and the benefits to accrue thereto is committed to an administrative board, due process requires that property owners affected thereby shall be given adequate notice and opportunity to be heard.

6. Constitutional law ⚷290(3) — Notice of assessment of benefit by board of public works held insufficient as due process.

Where a board of public works of a city adopted a resolution describing property to be charged for street improvement, but its ordinance of intention, which was published and posted, failed to describe any property to be charged and contained no hint that property would be charged other than that chargeable under the front foot rule, such notice was insufficient as due process as affecting property which did not front on the improvement.

7. Municipal corporations 🔑486(3)—Rule of notice to property holders of benefits assessed where none prescribed by Legislature stated.

In the absence of any rule established by legislative authority, whereby property to be charged can be ascertained, a notice to property holders must, if not directly, at least by adequate reference, describe the property to be charged, in order that owners affected thereby may have opportunity to be heard.

8. Constitutional law 🔑290(3)—Right of appeal from assessments held not to cure omission of notice necessary to satisfy due process.

Where the notice of assessment of benefits for street improvements was insufficient to satisfy due process, the fact that the ordinance provided for taking of appeals by the owners affected and for hearing thereon could not operate to cure such omission.

9. Appeal and error 🔑171(1)—Trial theory that method of assessment was not under front-foot rule conclusive on appeal.

In an action to foreclose liens for street work under a street improvement ordinance, where plaintiffs alleged that the front-foot method was insufficient to authorize the board of public works to make an assessment and that it proceeded to make assessment in another manner, plaintiffs are concluded thereby on appeal.

10. Municipal corporations 🔑469(3)—"Fronting on street," as used in assessment ordinance, held to refer to boundary line between street and a lot.

In suit to foreclose liens for street work under a street improvement ordinance, in view of the ordinance's reference to lots "fronting on a street," "fronting on the improvement," having reference to the boundary line between street and lot, and not to the boundary line of the lot which is in the center of the street, an assessment of benefits under the front-foot rule was not contemplated where there was part of another street between defendant's lot line and the street line of the street improved.

11. Municipal corporations 🔑469(1)—Lot not fronting on street not assessable under front-foot rule.

A lot which does not front on a street is not assessable for improvements of such street under the front-foot rule.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

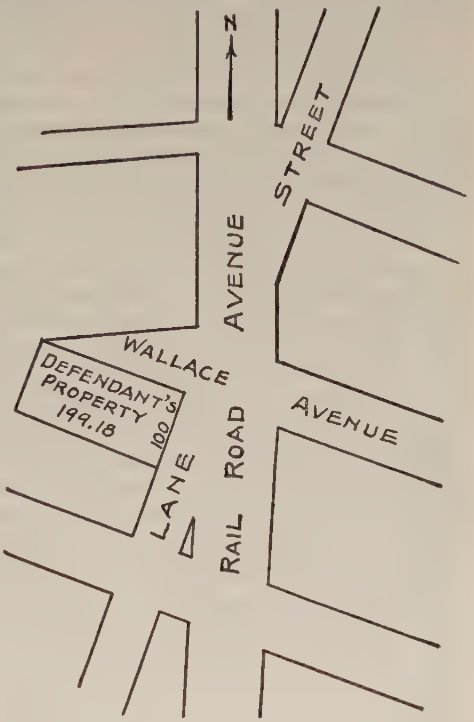
Action by James J. Flynn and another against Giovanni Chiappari and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Fabius T. Finch and Paul F. Fratessa, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

John B. Gartland, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ.

MYERS, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs foreclosing certain liens for street work under the street improvement ordinance of San Francisco adopted in 1913. The following rough description of the physical situation, while not strictly accurate, will suffice to illustrate the questions raised herein: Lane street, running northeast and southwest, is intersected at right angles by Wallace avenue, running southeast and northwest. These two, in turn, are crossed by Railroad avenue, running north and south. The last-named street overlaps, in part, the intersection of the two first named, but does not precisely coincide therewith; its center line being perhaps 20 feet east of the center of said intersection. Appellants' property is within the quarter block bounded on its southeasterly side by Lane street and on its northeasterly side by Wallace avenue, and fronts upon those two streets. The work for which appellants' property is assessed is in the westerly half of Railroad avenue. Of this work about one-third is within the intersection of Lane street and Wallace avenue, as well as within the lines of Railroad avenue. One-third is within the intersection of Lane street and Railroad avenue, but without the lines of Wallace avenue, and one-third within the lines of Railroad avenue, but not within the lines of either of the other two streets.



The San Francisco street improvement ordinance has been under consideration of the courts in the cases of Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 Pac. 225; McGinn v. Van Ness, 40 Cal. App. 600, 181 Pac. 70, 183 Pac. 950; Federal Const. Co. v. Wolfson, 186 Cal. 267, 199 Pac. 512; Federal Const. Co. v. Newhouse, 186 Cal. 284, 199 Pac. 519; City St. Imp. Co. v. Pearson, 181 Cal. 640, 185 Pac. 962, 20 A. L. R. 1317, and Flinn v. Shafter Realty Co. (Cal. Sup.) 212 Pac. 194, and a résumé of its provisions is to be found in the Pearson Case, supra. It is similar in most of its provisions to the Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730). In proceeding under it the board of public works first declares the expediency of the proposed improvement, wherein it directs the preparation of plans and specifications, after which it passes a resolution of its intention to recommend to the supervisors that the improvements be made, in which resolution a day is fixed for the board's action thereon. A copy of said resolution is required to be published in the official newspaper, to be posted in the board's office, and notices of the proposed improvement, which refer to the resolution of intention for further particulars, are required to be posted along the line of the contemplated improvement, and, if the improvement is to be made upon a crossing or intersection or any part thereof, one at least in front of each quarter block or irregular block liable to be assessed for such improvement, and in the case of the proposed formation of a district, along all the streets within such district. If upon such notice and after a hearing the board so determines, it shall pass a resolution recommending to the supervisors that they order such improvement to be made. When the contemplated improvement in the opinion of the board of public works is of more than local or ordinary public benefit, the expense of the improvement may be made chargeable upon a district and the board shall set out such district in its resolution of intention. Provision is made for an appeal from such resolution, but where there is no appeal, or where the supervisors do not sustain it, the supervisors order the work to be done, whereupon the board of public works invites sealed proposals for the improvement, awards the contract therefor, and upon its completion makes the assessment. Section 17 of the ordinance provides that, except where the expense is to be assessed upon a district, it "shall be assessed upon the lots and lands fronting thereon, except as hereinafter specifically provided; each lot or portion of a lot being separately assessed in proportion to the frontage, at a rate per front foot sufficient to cover the total expense of the work." It provides that—

> "The expense of the work done on main street crossings shall be assessed at a uniform rate per front foot on the quarter blocks and irregular blocks adjoining and cornering upon the crossings."

This is followed by various provisions for allotting the expense in specific cases of intersections of subdivision streets, alleys, terminations, etc., provisions for the allowance of credits where work has already been done by the property owners, and provisions for the levying of the assessment "when the resolution of intention declares that the expense of the work and improvement is to be assessed upon a district" and these are followed by section 18, which provides as follows:

> "If at any time there shall be any street work or improvement done, and none of the methods herein provided are sufficient to authorize the board of public works to make an assessment to pay for the expenses thereof, then said board shall, before it passes a resolution of its intention to recommend the ordering of said work or improvement, establish by resolution a method by means of which such assessment shall be made; and on the completion of the work or improvement to the satisfaction of said board, or to the satisfaction of the supervisors on appeal, said board shall make an assessment, to pay the expense thereof according to the method established by said resolution."

It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that none of the methods provided in said ordinance was or is sufficient to authorize the board of public works to make an assessment to pay for the expense of said work, and that it, therefore, before adoption of its resolution of intention, duly adopted a resolution by which it established a method by which such assessment should be made, and that upon the completion of the work it made an assessment in accordance with the method thus established by it.

[1] It appears from the evidence that Railroad avenue is an important thoroughfare, serving a considerable district of the city. Appellants contend that the improvement was therefore "of more than local or ordinary public benefit," and that the board should accordingly have proceeded under the district method of assessment. This is not a ground upon which courts are justified in holding an assessment void. The matter of selecting the method of assessment has been committed to the municipal authorities, and the exercise of their discretion therein should not and will not be reviewed by the courts, in the absence of fraud or mistake. Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 62 Pac. 500; Fallbrook Irr. Dist. v. Bradley, 164 U. S. 112, 17 Sup. Ct. 56, 41 L. Ed. 369; French v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 181 U. S. 324, 21 Sup. Ct. 625, 45 L. Ed. 879; Larsen v. San Francisco, 182 Cal. 1, 14, 186 Pac. 757.

[2] Appellants also assert that Railroad avenue is not a main street, as defined in the ordinance, because of the circumstance that it extends diagonally through rectangular blocks which had already been platted and laid out. The ordinance defines a "main street" as being a street that bounds a block, and a "block" as "the blocks known or designated as such, upon the maps and books of the assessor." There is no definition or requirement in the ordinance, nor elsewhere so far as we are advised requiring that a block shall be rectangular in shape. The complaint alleged and the court found it to be a main street. The only kinds of streets mentioned in the ordinance are main streets, alleys, subdivision streets, avenues, lanes, places, and courts, and main streets are the only ones defined therein. We are of the opinion that Railroad avenue must be held to be a main street, notwithstanding the circumstance that the blocks which it assists in bounding are irregular in shape.

[3] In City Imp. Co. v. Pearson, supra, referring to section 18, it was said:

> "It is difficult to give this section any meaning unless it was intended to require the board of works to look into the matter at the beginning and provide for installments if it found that the assessment was likely to exceed one-half of the tax valuation on the properties."

In the light of the facts disclosed in the instant case and the practical application made of this section by the board of public works herein, it is now apparent that the section was probably designed to meet such a situation as here obtains. Appellants' property herein, to all practical intents and purposes, fronts and corners upon Railroad avenue, and therefore benefits especially from the improvement thereof. But in fact and in law it neither fronts nor corners upon Railroad avenue because of the fact that the easterly line of plaintiffs' property is distant from 18 to 40 feet westerly from the westerly line of Railroad avenue, and a portion of Lane street intervenes between the westerly line of Railroad avenue and the easterly line of appellants' property. Therefore, under the front-foot plan of assessment appellants could not be made to pay any portion of the cost because their property does not front upon the improvement, and the quarter block in which it is contained is neither adjoining nor cornering upon the crossing. Under these circumstances, if the board should determine, as it evidently did here, that the improvement was not of more than local benefit or importance, and therefore did not justify the creation of an assessment district, there was no method available by which appellants' property could be made to bear its proper portion of the cost except by proceeding under some method devised pursuant to the authorization contained in section 18.

[4] Appellants contend that if it be determined that the provisions of section 18 were properly applicable to the situation here obtaining, the proceedings herein were nevertheless void because of the absence of notice to the property owners sought to be charged sufficient to confer jurisdiction and to satisfy the requirements of due process. This contention must be sustained. Such notice is not required where the Legislature itself determines the amount of the benefits and the property to be benefited, either by describing the property to be charged (Miller & Lux v. Drainage Dist., 182 Cal. 252, 265, 187 Pac. 1041), or by establishing a rule or criterion which will automatically determine the property to be charged when applied to the physical facts, such as the "front-foot" rule (Hadley v. Dague, supra, 130 Cal. p. 217 et seq., 62 Pac. 500; French v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., supra; Louisville v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co., 197 U. S. 430, 25 Sup. Ct. 466, 49 L. Ed. 819). The reason for this is that the property owners are conclusively presumed to have been heard through their representatives in the Legislature. Tarpey v. McClure (Cal. Sup.) 213 Pac. 983. It is also true that for the purposes of the instant case the board of supervisors is the Legislature. Larsen v. San Francisco, supra. But the supervisors in this case did not determine either the property to be charged or the benefits to be charged against it, nor did they fix any rules by which these were to be determined. These were determined by the board of public works, and never even reported to the supervisors.

[5, 6] Where, as here, the determination of the property to be charged and the benefits to accrue thereto is committed to an administrative board, due process requires that the property owners affected thereby shall be given adequate notice and an opportunity to be heard upon both these questions. Brookes v. City of Oakland, 160 Cal. 423, 117 Pac. 433; People v. Van Nuys Lighting Dist., 173 Cal. 792, 162 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 255. No such notice was given in this case. The board of public works adopted a resolution describing the property to be charged which was spread upon its own records, and a map showing the location thereof which remained in its own files. Its resolution of intention, which was posted in its office and published, not only failed to describe any property to be charged, but it contained no hint or suggestion that any property would be charged other than that chargeable under the front-foot rule. Notices were posted along the line of the improvement and in front of the quarter blocks in which appellants' property is situate. But they merely contained a brief description of the proposed improvement and a reference to the resolution of intention for further particulars. If appellants, seeing those notices, had been led thereby to examine the resolution of intention, they would have found therein a description of the proposed improvement, but no reference to any property to be charged therefor. They would thus naturally conclude that the assessment was to be made by the front-foot method, and knowing that their property did not front upon the improvement, or upon a quarter block cornering thereon, they would rest assured that it was not to be charged.

[7] In the absence of any predetermined rule established by legislative authority (such as the front-foot rule), whereby the property to be charged can be ascertained, the notice must, if not directly, at least by adequate reference, describe the property to be charged, in order that the property owners affected thereby may be accorded a real opportunity to be heard. Anaheim Sugar Co. v. County of Orange, 181 Cal. 212, 183 Pac. 809; People v. Lake Co. Water Dist., 183 Cal. 137, 190 Pac. 630. The mere fact that the records and files of the board of public works contained such description, and that they were open to inspection by the public, in no way cures this omission. Anaheim Sugar Co. v. County of Orange, supra, 181 Cal. 224, 183 Pac. 809.

[8] There are various provisions in the ordinance for the taking of appeals by property owners affected and for hearings thereon. But, manifestly, an opportunity to appeal is of no value to a property owner who, because of insufficient notice, has never had an adequate opportunity for a hearing in the first instance. The curative provisions in the ordinance do not and cannot operate to cure the omission of such notice as was necessary to satisfy the requirements of due process. Imperial Land Co. v. Imperial Irr. Dist., 173 Cal. 660, 161 Pac. 113.

[9-11] In the effort to meet this objection, respondents now contend, upon this appeal, that this was in reality a front-foot assessment; that appellants' property both fronts and corners upon the improvement, under the principle of law that the title of the lot owner extends to the center of the street. Respondents alleged in their complaint and the court found, in effect, that the front-foot method was insufficient to authorize the board of public works to make an assessment, and that it therefore proceeded under section 18, and they are concluded thereby upon this appeal. But aside from this, it is perfectly clear that the procedural ordinance in its numerous references to lots "fronting on a street," "fronting on the improvement," "blocks adjoining and cornering upon the crossings," etc., has reference to the boundary line between the street and the lot, and not to the boundary line of the lot which is in the center of the street. In the latter view, there is no such thing as a lot fronting upon a street. It would front upon an adjoining lot in the middle of the street. Moreover, the trial court found, in response to allegations of the answer, that appellants' lands do not "front, abut upon, adjoin or are contiguous to any portion of Railroad avenue," and that "the quarter block in which they are situate is distant 18.29 feet in a straight line from the nearest point on the westerly line of Railroad avenue." Even if we should assume that the portion of the improvement charged against appellants' property was all within an intersection of streets, still it is not chargeable against appellants' property under the front-foot rule because it does not "corner on the work," as was the case in Martin v. Wagner, 120 Cal. 623, 53 Pac. 167.

It is not necessary to consider what would have been the legal consequence if the board of public works had submitted its plan for spreading the assessment to the board of supervisors and the latter had approved and adopted the same before ordering the work, because nothing of the sort was done. The conclusion that the notice herein was insufficient to confer jurisdiction renders it unnecessary to discuss the other points raised by appellants.

The judgment is reversed.

VERMILYEA v. VERMILYEA. (Civ. 3788.)

1. Limitation of actions ⟹48(2)—When right accrues where indefinite delay in payment contemplated stated.

Where an agreement for the payment of money contemplates an indefinite delay in payment, the statute of limitations does not begin to run until actual demand has been made, or the happening of some event designated as the extreme limit of time for payment.

2. Limitation of actions ⟹66(2)—Duebill and letter accompanying it held to evidence an indebtedness immediately due without demand.

A duebill, acknowledging an indebtedness to another, and a letter accompanying it, held to evidence an indebtedness which was due immediately and without demand as to which the four-year statute of limitations would run, though no demand was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by J. K. Vermilyea against Minerva D. Vermilyea, as executrix of the estate of Samuel E. Vermilyea, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

S. L. Carpenter, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Flint & MacKay, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Defendant demurred to the plaintiff's amended complaint filed against the estate of Samuel E. Vermilyea, deceased, on the ground that the claim sued upon was barred by the four-year provision of the statute of limitations. The demurrer was overruled. The only question here presented is as to the correctness of this ruling.

The action is based upon two writings received by the plaintiff from the deceased inclosed in the same envelope, and which must be read together to determine the intent of their author and the legal obligation resulting from his act in executing them. The letter is as follows:

> "In relation to that $1,000 will say am glad you mentioned it for I should have given you some writing before now that would be a legal obligation in case of my death, but have been expecting to make a sale of some of my property all the time and then intended to pay it off and so have put it off. I inclose a little statement in relation to the deal which would be paid by my estate if anything should happen. I have made the interest 7%, as you will observe, so no question could arise in relation to illegal interest in case of my death. I have deemed wise to make the statement fully full, so you would not have to make any proof of the circumstances, but could simply file the paper with my administrator in case of my death, and the claim would be allowed. Of course I may die any moment, but hope to live some time yet, and, if I do, think will be able to pay you the money before the summer is over."

The statement to which reference is made reads:

> "Due John K. Vermilyea, for value received, one thousand dollars, with interest thereon from October 4th, 1906, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum.

[1] Appellant contends that immediately upon delivery of the duebill the statute of limitations pleaded began to run; that the letter was intended by the deceased to make provision against the running of the statute, which, not being permitted by law, must be held ineffective. He asserts the legal proposition that, as public policy is the foundation of the statute of limitations, it cannot be waived in advance. This respondent does not dispute, but asserts that the statute did not begin to run in this instance because the contract contemplated indefinite delay in the payment of the amount due on demand, in which case he contends the law does not require that the demand be made within the statutory period of limitations, and that the statute does not begin to run until actual demand or the happening of an event designated in the contract as the extreme limit of time for payment, in this instance the death of the deceased. The legal principles upheld by respondent are sound.

[2] However, from the construction we place upon the writings they are inapplicable to the facts of the instant case. It seems clear that the intent indicated by the writings before us was to recognize the existence of an obligation to John K. Vermilyea by the deceased in the sum of $1,000 with interest from October 4, 1906, until March 29, 1913, when the writings were executed, and until payment; that this obligation is expressly admitted as an existing one due immediately and without demand. Such, unquestionably, would be the legal effect of the duebill if considered alone. Lee v. Balcom, 9 Colo. 216, 11 Pac. 74. We think the letter was intended as one of transmission only, and was not meant by S. E. Vermilyea to qualify the unconditional nature of the duebill in any respect. It must be borne in mind, also, that as the language of the duebill is unequivocal it cannot be modified unless the letter contains some provision making a demand a condition precedent to a right of action upon the part of the payee. We find no statement to that effect, but on the contrary it says that in case of the writer's death his brother would not need to make any proof, but "could simply file the paper" with the administrator of the estate of the decedent. Therefore the statute began to run at once upon the execution of the writings. The cases cited by respondent are applicable only where a demand is necessary to the accrual of the plaintiff's right of action. This is true of both Jamieson v. Jamieson, 72 Mo. 640, and Vickrey v. Maier, 164 Cal. 384, 129 Pac. 273.

More than seven years had elapsed from the date of the letter, and writing accompanying it, before the death of the maker. Hence, the plaintiff's right of action was barred, and the demurrer should have been sustained.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

E. B. & A. L. STONE CO. v. DE FREMERY WHARF & LAND CO. et al.
(Civ. 4462.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 13, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹1011(1)—Findings of trial court conclusive on appeal.

Findings of the trial court on conflicting evidence are conclusive on the appellate court.

2. Damages ⟹78(2)—Contract held not to provide a penalty contrary to statute.

A contract between plaintiff stone company and defendant wharf company provided that plaintiff might use defendant's wharf and as rental to pay to defendant five cents per cubic yard of stone landed at the wharf. The contract further provided that for the first two years the aggregate rentals should not be less than $3,000, and for the next three years not less than $3,600 per year. The contract also provided that in case of default by plaintiff defendant might terminate the contract and retake possession of the wharf "and that such retaking of possession of said wharves and property shall be the extent of the penalty the wharf company may exact of the stone company." Held, in view of the circumstances and the situation of the parties, that the word "penalty" had no particular significance, and the contract was not open to the objection that it provided a penalty contrary to Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the E. B. & A. L. Stone Company against the De Fremery Wharf & Land Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Moran & Heer, Charles S. Wheeler, and John F. Bowie, all of San Francisco (Nathan Moran, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants.

W. F. Williamson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Defendant De Fremery Wharf & Land Company was the owner of certain waterfront property in Oakland upon which it conducted a wharfage business. In 1914 the wharf company entered into a contract with plaintiff, E. B. & A. L. Stone Company, for a period of years. Defendant Barron Estate Company, during the second year of the contract, acquired, by purchase, the De Fremery wharves; hence its presence as a party to the action. Its interest is identical with that of the wharf company. In the aforementioned contract the Stone Company agreed to "handle and route the transportation of a portion of its rock, sand and gravel business, incoming * * * upon and through the wharves and bunkers of the wharf company," at a price of five cents per cubic yard or long ton, with the stipulation that if plaintiff failed to move the given tonnage per year it should pay for the short tonnage at the rate of five cents per ton or cubic yard.

The contract further provided:

> "The Stone Company further guarantees to the wharf company that the aforesaid business handled by it upon or over the property of the wharf company will be sufficient to produce to the wharf company a sum of money, at the rate per ton aforesaid, of not less than three thousand dollars ($3,000.00) for each and every year during the first two of the said five (5) years, and not less than three thousand six hundred ($3,600.00) dollars for each and every year during the last three (3) years of the said five (5) years. The Stone Company further agrees that it will, on or before the 15th day of each calendar month during the said five (5) years make settlement with and payment to the wharf company for the business done by it as aforesaid during the preceding month, and if such business, at the end of each year during the time this contract shall remain in force, be found not to amount to the minimum sum applying as aforesaid to such preceding year, the Stone Company agrees to pay to the wharf company any deficiency existing to bring such payment up to said minimum."

And a further paragraph reads:

> "It is mutually understood and agreed that in the event of a violation of the Stone Company of any of the covenants or agreements herein contained on its part to be performed, the wharf company shall have the right, by notice in writing, to terminate this contract and immediately thereupon to take possession of any portion of the said wharves or property then occupied by the Stone Company, and that such retaking of possession of said wharves and property shall be the extent of the penalty the wharf company may exact of the Stone Company." (The concluding clause is italicized by us for the reason that we intend to hereinafter make particular reference to it.)

At the end of the first year of the operation and performance of the contract there was a deficiency in the aggregate of the monthly tolls, and, after some controversy as to the interpretation of the contract, the Stone Company paid the deficiency.

At the end of the second year the tolls paid amounted to less than $1,000, leaving an unpaid deficiency of $2,331.50, which, after demand, remains unpaid.

The action was commenced by the Stone Company for reformation of the contract upon the ground of mutual mistake. The plaintiff alleged in its complaint, in connection with the payment provision of the contract, that it was mutually understood and agreed that—

> "Plaintiff might elect either to pay the difference between the amount of tolls actually earned and the said minimum sum, or to make default in such payment and suffer the cancellation of the said agreement by the wharf company, defendant herein, but that in the event the said wharf company did cancel and terminate the said agreement, such cancellation and termination should be the only remedy or right of the said wharf company, and the only liability or obligation of the plaintiff under such circumstances, and that if the said wharf company did not cancel or terminate said agreement, plaintiff would only be required to pay the said tolls upon the quantity of such materials actually delivered upon or transported across the property of the said wharf company."

And it was further alleged that instead of stating the understanding and agreement of the parties, as in the last paragraph set forth, the contract merely stated what appears in the paragraph hereinbefore quoted containing the italicized clause.

Defendants answered with specific denials and various defenses, and, by way of cross-complaint, sought to recover the unpaid deficiency, amounting to $2,331.50. The trial court denied reformation. It found that a deficiency existed to the amount claimed by defendants, but denied recovery.

Defendants appeal from the judgment denying them relief upon their cross-complaint. The error they complain of is that from the facts as found by the trial court it has drawn an incorrect conclusion of law and entered a judgment erroneous in law. A reversal is sought directing the entry of a judgment in favor of defendants in accordance with the findings.

Counsel for the respective parties earnestly argue the question as to whether or not the agreement made between the wharf company and the Stone Company is a lease. We think it immaterial what the instrument is labeled. Its form is of little account. Stockton Savings & Loan Society v. Purvis, 112 Cal. 239, 44 Pac. 561, 53 Am. St. Rep. 210. We have preferred to call it a contract. The question involved in the appeal is the interpretation of the instrument in accordance with familiar rules found in the Civil Code.

The negotiations for the contract covered a period of several weeks, and were conducted by Mr. A. L. Stone on behalf of the Stone Company, and Mr. Cadman on behalf of the wharf company. The proposed contract was prepared by the attorneys for the wharf company and delivered to Mr. Stone for his approval, and he added to it the following clause:

> "And that such retaking of possession of said wharves and property will be the extent of the penalty the wharf company may exact of the Stone Company." (This clause appears italicized in a portion of the contract hereinabove quoted.)

The contract, with the additional clause, was accepted by the wharf company and executed by the parties.

[1] Up to this point there is no conflict in the evidence. Now comes the rub. Mr. Stone says that it was understood between himself and Mr. Cadman that the contract should provide that the Stone Company might elect to pay the difference between the amount of tolls actually earned and the minimum sum, or to make default in such payment and suffer cancellation of the agreement by the wharf company, and that in the event of such cancellation the Stone Company would be relieved of further liability and would only be required to pay tolls upon the quantity of materials actually delivered or transported across the property. Mr. Cadman flatly contradicts Mr. Stone. This issue was tried by the lower court in the suit for reformation. It was finally disposed of when the court found that no grounds for reformation existed, and it can now concern us only in so far as its consideration may be helpful in construing the contract.

[2] Counsel for defendant contends that—

> "The provision for liquidated penalty or damage is void under Civil Code, §§ 1670 and 1671. Furthermore, there being no allegation of damage on the part of appellant wharf company, and no proof of actual damage so suffered, said appellant was not entitled to recover damages in any amount whatever."

We are mindful that the word "penalty," appearing in the clause added to the contract by Mr. Stone, has a well-defined legal meaning. But considering the whole contract, and viewing it in the light of the facts, circumstances, and situation of the parties, we believe that the use of the word had no particular significance and in no way altered the intention of the parties, so clearly expressed in the instrument. It seems to us that the case of McComber v. Kellerman, 162 Cal. 749, 752, 124 Pac. 431, contains a complete answer to plaintiff's contention. In the cited case an "oil lease" or mining license was under consideration. The lease provided for rentals reserved in default of licensee's drilling the well. Objections almost identical with those made in the case before us were there interposed. There, as here, the consideration for the contract was the specified price which the defendant was to pay for the privilege exercised or unexercised. "It was clearly in the nature of rental for the premises or compensation for the right and not an attempt to fix a penalty or liquidated damages." McComber v. Kellerman, supra.

It being admitted that there is an unpaid deficiency of $2,331.50, and the trial court having so found, it was error on its part to refuse defendants recovery. We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be reversed, with direction to the lower court to enter judgment for defendants in the sum of $2,331.50, and interest thereon from February 10, 1917.

It is so ordered.

We concur: TYLER, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

DROWN v. HADDOCK. (Civ. 3791.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 14, 1923.)

In an action on a note which was given in payment for "1 Admiral hay press with 8 H. P. International harvester engine attached, and one pair of small platform scales," evidence held insufficient to establish that such items were sold for use together as a hay baler, and that for such purpose they were worthless, thus establishing a failure of consideration.

2. Sales 🔑181(11)—Evidence held insufficient to establish a destruction of property for which note was given in payment, thus relieving maker.

In an action on a note given in payment for "1 Admiral hay press with 8 H. P. International-al harvester engine attached, and one pair of small platform scales," evidence that such items had been sold as a hay-baling outfit and that for such purpose they were unfitted held insufficient to establish that the "hay-baling outfit," the consideration for the note, was destroyed, thereby relieving the purchaser from liability on the note.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by D. I. Drown against M. C. Haddock. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Nowell & Moran and Russell & Heid, all of Tulare, for appellant.

K. Van Zante, of Hanford, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Defendant purchased from plaintiff, under a written conditional sale contract, "1 Admiral hay press with 8 H. P. International harvester engine attached, and one pair of small platform scales." These articles were to have been paid for, at a date fixed in the contract, by a certain lump sum, with interest and attorney's fees. Payment not having been made upon the day designated, plaintiff commenced this action to recover the amount due. He had judgment, and defendant appeals.

[1] The sole point argued by appellant is that there was a "lack or failure of consideration" for the contract between the parties. Although the agreement listed the articles described in it as we have listed them above, appellant refers to them in his brief, collectively, as a "hay-baling outfit." Treating the subject of the sale as a single thing, that is, as a hay-baling outfit, appellant contends that the transfer was without consideration for the reason that several witnesses testified that the three articles actually listed in the contract of sale would not work as a hay baler and that parts of the machinery broke down when the attempt was made to use them for that purpose. Appellant's view is that this testimony shows that the hay-baling outfit was worthless. We are pointed to nothing in the record to show that the articles were to be sold as, or that it was understood between the parties that they were together to be used as, a hay-baling outfit. Neither are we shown that each of the three articles had not an intrinsic value, either great or small, of its own. The articles may have been of considerable value, when taken all together, even though some parts of one or two of them may have broken down when they were subjected to the use to which appellant assumed to put them. These considerations render inapplicable the cases of Waltz v. Silveria, 25 Cal. App. 717, 145 Pac. 169, and Stanton v. Weldy, 19 Cal. App. 374, 126 Pac. 175. In truth, we cannot perceive that either of these cases has any bearing whatever upon the point now under discussion, although appellant seeks to apply them to it.

[2] It is contended by appellant that the "hay-baling outfit" was destroyed, as a whole, before title was to have vested in him under the contract, and that the loss resulting from such destruction must be borne by respondent. Waltz v. Silveria, supra, is relied upon to support this contention. The idea that the "outfit" was destroyed is predicated solely of the testimony to the effect that the articles mentioned in the contract would not work together as a hay-baling outfit—that they were together worthless when devoted to such a use. There is no contention that the articles described in the contract, or any of them, were actually destroyed, even in the sense in which that term is employed in Waltz v. Silveria. The case does not support appellant's contention upon this point.

BIURRUN v. ELIZALDE et al. (Civ. 2604.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1923.)

1. Trial ⟹384—Rules of nonsuit on trial to court same as on trial to jury.

The rules governing nonsuits are the same when the trial is to the court as on trial to the jury.

2. Trial ⟹384—Court should disregard conflicting evidence on motion for nonsuit.

In considering defendants' motion for nonsuit, the court trying the facts should disregard unfavorable conflicting evidence.

3. Money received ⟹19(1)—Evidence showed receipt of money from the sale of sheep to plaintiff's use.

In an action for money had and received, where plaintiff's evidence tended to show that defendant knew that 700 sheep and the proceeds of sale thereof, to the extent of $8 a head, belonged to plaintiff, and that he received the proceeds of the sale to the use and benefit of plaintiff, granting nonsuit was error.

Action by Vicente Biurrun against Eulalio Elizalde and another. From judgment granting nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment of the trial court granting the motion of defendant Ramirez for a nonsuit.

⟹For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

The action is for money had and received. The plaintiff testified:

"On the 26th day of December, 1919, I had business dealings with the defendant Elizalde. * * * Defendant Ramirez was present at that time. I offered to let Mr. Elizalde run my sheep until he could sell them, and agreed with him that I would pay him $2,176 as expenses for running them, and when he sold the sheep he was to pay me $8 per head and keep for himself all that he received over that sum. * * * I had 728 head of sheep that I turned over to Mr. Elizalde. * * * We had a conversation outside on the same day, and Mr. Ramirez suggested that we make a note, and Mr. Ramirez wrote a note for us for the sum of $8,000. After I got the note I took it up to Mr. Carlin's office, and Mr. Carlin said it was no good, and he drew another note, which note Elizalde signed. * * * I took Elizalde's note in payment of the sheep. * * * Q. Did you sell your sheep at that time to Elizalde? A. I gave him to run the sheep. * * * Q. Did you sell them to him on that day? A. No sir. Q. Why did you take that note for $8,000? * * * A. For security. * * * Q. Did you take the note as the balance due on your sheep? A. As security to pay me later on."

Elizalde testified:

"I was present * * * on the 26th day of December, 1919, in company with Mr. Ramirez and Mr. Biurrun, and we had a talk on condition when I took the wethers that I had to pay Mr. Biurrun $8 when I sold them. * * * Mr. Ramirez and myself we asked Mr. Biurrun $2,176 to run the sheep, running expenses, and Mr. Biurrun put that money at the First National Bank for us. * * * Q. Did you receive 728 head of sheep from him at that time? * * * A. Yes, sir; I did. Q. You had a lot of sheep of your own at that time, did you not? A. I had 2,400 at the time. * * * I didn't buy the wethers from Mr. Biurrun, I took the sheep to run and to deliver after the sale $8 a head. * * * Later I sold the wethers at $9 per head * * * 8th of January, 1920. * * * I sold more sheep than the 700, and I took the whole check together and I gave it to Mr. Ramirez. * * * Q. How many sheep did you sell at that time? * * * A. Eight hundred and eight head. * * * Q. How many of those sheep were your own sheep? A. One hundred and eight head. Q. To whom did the other 700 belong? A. Vicente Biurrun. * * * I told Mr. Ramirez at the time I delivered the check to him that the price of 700 head of sheep at $8 a head was for Mr. Biurrun and the balance was to be put to my credit, and I indorsed the check and delivered it to him. At that time I owed Mr. Ramirez on a mortgage about $16,000. * * * I gave him (plaintiff) a note for $8,000, which represented the value of the sheep and the money borrowed from Mr. Biurrun. * * * The note which I gave him * * * was in payment of the sheep, together with the money that I borrowed from him. * * * That note was made just as security to be paid from the money Mr. Ramirez took. * * * At the time I sold the sheep 700 belonged to Mr. Biurrun."

No other witnesses were called. The testimony shows that plaintiff had not been paid any part of the money received by Elizalde for the 700 sheep sold, but that Ramirez retained the whole thereof.

"The rules as to nonsuit are the same, whether the trial is by the court or by a jury." Freese v. Hibernia Sav., etc., Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 395, 73 Pac. 172.

"It is beyond controversy that the right of a court to direct a verdict is, touching the condition of the evidence, absolutely the same as the right of the court to grant a nonsuit. It may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given. * * * The rule as to directed verdicts is not that a verdict may be directed whenever the evidence is such that upon motion the court would grant a new trial. The court may grant a new trial even when there is substantial evidence to sustain the verdict, if it believes that the evidence preponderates against the verdict. It is under compulsion to order a new trial, and may do this of its own motion, when the evidence is wholly insufficient to sustain the verdict." Estate of Caspar, 172 Cal. 147, 149, 155 Pac. 631.

[1, 2] If it be conceded that there is evidence sufficient to justify the inference that the plaintiff sold the sheep to Elizalde and accepted the latter's note as payment therefor, such conflicting evidence must be disregarded on motion for a nonsuit.

[3] The evidence shows that Ramirez knew the 700 sheep and the proceeds of the sale thereof to the extent of $8 a head belonged to plaintiff and Ramirez received $5,600 of such proceeds "to the use and benefit of said plaintiff" as alleged in the complaint. If any authorities are necessary to show that plaintiff had a cause of action against Ramirez under such circumstances, the following are in point: Kreutz v. Livingston, 15 Cal. 345; Heydenfeldt v. Jacobs, 107 Cal. 373, 40 Pac. 492; Montgomery v. Rauer, 125 Cal. 227, 57 Pac. 894; First National Bank v. Wakefield, 148 Cal. 558, 83 Pac. 1076; Smith v. Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, 2 Cal. App. 377, 84 Pac. 348; Freitas v. Freitas, 31 Cal. App. 19, 159 Pac. 613; Bridgeford v. McAdoo, 48 Cal. App. 305, 191 Pac. 1113. Respondent does not suggest any theory upon which the judgment can be affirmed, and none suggests itself to the court.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Ira C. Lambert and another against F. E. Valentine and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Leonard Evans, of Anaheim, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action for claim and delivery, the property involved being an automobile truck. Defendants were in the automobile repair business. The truck was taken to their garage by one Lopez, who requested that certain repairs be made upon it. Defendants made the repairs and held the truck as security for their charges. Plaintiffs, claiming to be the owners of the vehicle, made tender to defendants of the amount of the charges, and demanded a delivery of the property to them. This defendants refused unless plaintiffs should first procure from Lopez a consent to the delivery. Plaintiffs did not procure such consent, but commenced the present action instead. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal.

[1, 2] Appellants insist that several of the findings of the trial court were not sustained by the evidence, and these are the only points contended for by them. A solution of the questions thus presented may be made upon an examination of certain general features of the evidence and by the application of certain propositions of law to those features. The evidence is not without dispute as to some points, but in stating it we shall present those phases of it which are most favorable to appellants. Appellants, at the time when the demand for the possession of the truck was made, stated to respondents that they were the owners of it. The vehicle had attached to it, at the time it was left with respondents for repairs, certified copies of certain documents issued by the motor vehicle department of the state. These showed that Lopez was the registered owner of the truck and that appellants were its legal owners. Granting that respondents examined these copies—whether they did or not being one of the disputed questions in the evidence—it becomes material to determine what notice was thereby conveyed to them. Section 1 of the Motor Vehicle Act (as amended, Stats. 1919, p. 193; Deering's Consol. Suppl. to Gen. Laws, 1917–1921, p. 1646) defines the word "owner" as used in the act as "any person * * * having the lawful use or control, or the right to the use or control, of a vehicle, under a lease or otherwise, for a period of ten or more successive days." An examination of the section of the act providing for registration (section 3, as amended, Stats. 1919, p. 196; Deering's Consol. Suppl. 1917–1921, p. 1648) demonstrates that this definition includes those described in documents issued by the motor vehicle department, as in the present instance, as "registered owners." Coming now to the designation of appellants as "legal owners" in the copies of documents mentioned, it is to be noted that the Motor Vehicle Act (section 1 as amended, supra) defines the expression "legal owner" as "the owner of the legal title." By way of recapitulation, then, of the showing made by the evidence most favorable to appellants, it is to be noted that at the time demand was made for the possession of the truck respondents were notified of the fact that appellants were the owners of the legal title to it, but that Lopez was in lawful possession of it "under a lease or otherwise." It is plain under all the circumstances that at the time Lopez left the truck with respondents for repairs he was a bailor of the vehicle and they were his bailees (6 C. J. p. 1105, § 28). This condition of affairs remained after appellants had made their demand for the possession of the truck, for they made to respondents no communication which could have changed the situation. Undoubtedly it is the rule that a bailee of property is bound to return it to his bailor, under pain of an action of conversion at the hands of the latter if he delivers the property to any other person, unless he believes after the exercise of reasonable care and vigilance that such other person has a claim to the possession of the property superior to that of the bailor (6 C. J., p. 1143, sec. 99). We conclude that respondents were justified in refusing to deliver the truck to appellants except upon the consent of Lopez, or, at least, until the latter could be heard as to the nature of his claim to the possession of the car as indicated by the terms of the documents issued by the motor vehicle department; and we are pointed to nothing in the law of bailments which made it the duty of respondents to search out Lopez and thus ascertain his rights in the premises. We think the disputed findings were supported by the evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VITELLE. (Cr. 918.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1923.)

1. Criminal law ⚷1166½(8)—One obliged to accept biased juror entitled to reversal of verdict of guilt, without inquiry as to sufficiency of evidence.

One who, because he has exhausted his peremptory challenges, is obliged to accept a juror, incompetent for actual bias, his challenge for cause being erroneously overruled, is entitled to a reversal, without inquiry as to the sufficiency of evidence of guilt, for infringement of his right to a fair and impartial trial.

2. Jury ⚷97(3)—Juror admitting prejudice from defendant's membership in Ku Klux Klan disqualified.

A juror cannot be said to be fair or impartial towards a defendant nor qualified to weigh evidence touching guilt or innocence on a criminal charge, when he admits that in weighing the evidence he will be prejudiced against defendant solely because defendant was a member of the Ku Klux Klan, an organization to which the juror was opposed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

John H. Vitelle was convicted of assault to do great bodily harm, and he appeals. Reversed.

Emmons & Aldrich, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant was convicted on the third count of the indictment. The offense charged was that of a felonious assault upon the person of one Mason, by means of force likely to produce, and which did produce, great bodily injury. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The sole ground of appeal is that the court erred in overruling defendant's challenges for cause to four jurors of the panel.

It seems to be conceded by counsel on both sides that at the time of the examination of these jurors it was well understood that the evidence would show that the defendant was a member of an organization known as the Ku Klux Klan, and that his alleged actions and conduct toward the complaining witness upon the occasion mentioned in the indictment were, according to the prosecution, a part of his activities as a member of that organization. Defendant's challenge to each of the four jurors was based upon the claim that the examination of the jurors showed that they were prejudiced against the defendant because he was a member of the Klan, and that they were disqualified on account of actual bias as defined in section 1073 of the Penal Code. It is there provided that a particular cause of challenge exists—

> "for the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case, or to either of the parties, which will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of either party. * * *"

The right of challenge for actual bias is limited by section 1076 of the Penal Code as follows:

> "But no person shall be disqualified as a juror by reason of having formed or expressed an opinion upon the matter or cause to be submitted to such jury, founded upon public rumor, statements in public journals, or common notoriety; provided it appear to the court, upon his declaration, under oath or otherwise, that he can and will, notwithstanding such an opinion, act impartially and fairly upon the matters to be submitted to him."

The four jurors to whom these challenges were made were Kanawyer, Ammon, Lauder, and McAdam. Kanawyer, Ammon, and Lauder were excused on peremptory challenge of the defendant after his challenges of those jurors for cause had been denied. After the defendant had used ten peremptory challenges (being the total number allowed to him by law) the defendant asked permission to use another peremptory challenge, which request was denied. At this time Mr. McAdam was in the jury box and had been examined as to his qualifications, and had been challenged for cause and the challenge denied. It resulted that McAdam was sworn as a juror and acted as a juror at the trial.

[1] On the record thus made, if McAdam was not qualified to act as a juror in the case, the denial of the challenge for cause constituted prejudicial error, for which neces-

Mr. McAdam testified that he knew the defendant; that he had read about the case; that he had heard it talked of since the indictment was found.

I haven't in regard to this case. Q. Are you conscious now, at the present time, of having any opinion one way or the other? A. Not in regard to this case; no. Q. Why do you qualify that? A. I am not in favor of the Klan. Q. That is what you have reference to? A. Yes. Q. You know now that Mr. Vitelle has been indicted as a member of the Klan, does that create in your mind a bias and prejudice against him? A. I don't think it would. Q. If it should transpire in this case that he was a leading member of the Klan, would that create in your mind any bias and prejudice against him? A. It would. Q. Do you think that with that bias and prejudice, you could act absolutely fairly and impartially toward him? A. I don't think I could. Q. You think if you were selected as a juror in this case, that the bias and prejudice you might have against him by reason of his connection with the Klan, would influence you in hearing testimony here? A. I could hear the testimony here, but his membership * * * Q. (Interrupting) Knowing your own mind as you do, if you were sitting as Mr. Vitelle is, would you be willing to be tried by 12 men who felt toward you and your case as you feel toward him and his case? A. I would not. Q. You think you are liable to be unfair in the matter? A. Well, I would weigh the testimony. Q. Well, why wouldn't you want to be tried by 12 men feeling as you do? A. Well, my membership would be against me, I think. Q. That is, you think the fact he is a member of it, would weigh with you to such an extent that you would be influenced in hearing the testimony? A. Yes. Q. Have you ever sat on a jury before? A. I have not. Q. If the court should instruct you in this case that it is the duty of the prosecution to prove every material fact necessary to constitute the offense charged against the defendant, beyond a reasonable doubt and to a moral certainty, would you be prejudiced against an instruction of that kind? A. I would not. Q. If given, you would follow it? A. Yes. Q. If the court should further instruct you that the law presumed the defendant to be innocent as he sits here now, and that that presumption of innocence goes with him all through the trial, up to and including the time of finding the verdict, and that you, as a juror, are not at liberty to disregard that presumption of innocence, but must weigh it with all the testimony in the case, and reconcile the evidence, if possible, with this presumption of innocence, would you follow that instruction? A. I would. Q. Would you have any prejudice against it? A. I would not. Q. If the court gives you that, and also gives you an instruction in regard to what reasonable doubt is, and you had in your mind a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant and were about to vote not guilty, would you stop and consider what your neighbors might think about your verdict and allow that to influence you? A. I would not. Q. If Mr. Vitelle should go on the stand and testify in his own behalf, would you be inclined to reject his testimony simply because he was the defendant? A. I would not. Q. If, from his testimony alone, there arose in your mind a reasonable doubt as to his guilt, would you give him the benefit of that doubt by an acquittal? A. I would. Q. Do you know of any reason, outside of this bias and prejudice you spoke of, that might influence or bias you in this case? A. Not except it would take evidence to remove my bias against the Klan. Q. Outside of that, is there anything else? A. No. Q. Then you are pretty well satisfied in your own mind that the fact that he is a member of the Klan would, of itself, bias you against him? A. It would. Q. And that is the attitude of mind you have when you go on the jury? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Emmons: Challenge the juror under subdivision 2, § 1073, for existence of a state of mind with reference to the case and the defendant, which would prevent him from acting with entire impartiality.

"Mr. Dorsey: We will deny the challenge for a moment. Mr. McAdam, do you have any opinion now as to whether or not the defendant does belong to the organization? A. Except what I have seen published. Q. Then your opinion on that is merely from what you have seen in the newspapers? A. That is in regard to membership. Q. Well, at this time have you any prejudice against him by reason of the fact that his name was published in the paper as a member? A. Well, I would have to have it proved that he was connected with it. Q. Well, if it was proved that he was a member, you would then have a prejudice against him? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that prejudice to the extent that you would be willing to find him guilty of this charge? A. Not unless it was proven up on the charge. Q. Unless it was proved he was guilty of this charge. Well, in determining whether or not he was guilty of this charge, would you allow any prejudice to creep in against him in determining on the evidence produced here? A. Well, I couldn't, unless it was proven he was a member. Q. You would have some opinion about his being a member of the organization? A. Yes. Q. Would you convict him of this charge merely because he was a member? A. No; only on the evidence. Q. If the evidence came in and showed he took part in any activities as a member, you would have a prejudice against him? A. Yes. Q. Until that time, would you have? A. I couldn't have. Q. You couldn't have until that appeared in the evidence? A. No. Q. As you are sitting now, you haven't any prejudice against this defendant here from anything at all, have you? A. Not personally; I have against the Klan. Q. You don't know he is a member of any organization yet, do you? A. No. Q. You would have to wait and find out what the evidence was, wouldn't you? A. Yes."

Thereupon the challenge was submitted and was denied.

[2] From the foregoing examination of the juror, it appears that he was willing to accept the court's instructions and to attempt to decide the case in accordance with the law as he should be instructed by the court, which instructions presumably would require the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the facts necessary to constitute the offense charged against the defendant, and to give the defendant the legal presumption of innocence to which a defendant is entitled at all times prior to the complete establishment of his guilt. But McAdam assured the court that, immediately upon the production of evidence that the defendant was a member of the Klan, that would create in his mind a bias and prejudice against the defendant which would prevent him from acting fairly and impartially toward the defendant; that this prejudice would weigh with him to such an extent that he would be influenced in hearing the testimony; that it would take evidence to remove his bias against the Klan. True, he said that this prejudice would not be such that he would be willing to find the defendant guilty of this charge unless the fact of his guilt was proven; but, in determining whether the evidence amounted to proof, his prejudice against the Klan would influence him in passing upon the sufficiency of the evidence.

We find no escape from the conclusion that there existed in the mind of McAdam a state of mind in reference to the case which necessarily prevented him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant.

To disqualify the juror, it was not necessary in this instance that he should have stated that he had an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The challenge was not based upon the fact of such an opinion, but upon the existence of the state of mind to which we have referred. This disqualification exists in both civil and criminal cases, but, if there could be any difference, it would be more important in criminal cases. Yet, even in a civil action by a landlord against his tenant, where the juror, upon being informed what kind of an action was pending, declared himself hostile to all landlords, it was held that on account of this state of mind, the juror was incompetent and that the court exercised a sound discretion in allowing the challenge. Lawlor v. Linforth, 72 Cal. 205, 13 Pac. 496.

Actual bias, as described in the Code—"may consist of an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused, based upon some knowledge or information of the facts embraced in the charge or of the evidence to be produced, or it may exist without such knowledge or information, and may consist of a preconceived opinion concerning the defendant or the prosecuting witness which would prevent a fair consideration by the juror of the evidence given or facts proven in the case." People v. Riggins, 159 Cal. 113, 117, 112 Pac. 862, 864.

In the case at bar the prosecuting witness, in testifying to the assault, directly identified the defendant as one of the men who forced him to go with them to the place where they flogged him with ropes; and there was other testimony tending to prove further participation of the defendant in that assault. The evidence for the prosecution fixed the time of the assault at between 8 and 9 o'clock of the evening of October 27, 1921. On the other hand, according to the testimony of the defendant and several other witnesses, the defendant at that time was playing cards at the home of a friend at a considerable distance away from the baseball park where the assault occurred.

For the purposes of the question at issue on this appeal, we are not concerned with the sufficiency of the evidence to have justified the jury in finding the defendant guilty. Let it be assumed that it is sufficient. But when it is said that it is for a jury to weigh and determine the effect of the evidence upon a disputed question of fact, the law intends that the accused shall have the right to have that issue determined by a fair and impartial jury. A juror cannot be said to be fair or impartial towards a defendant, and he cannot be qualified to weigh the evidence touching the guilt or innocence of a defendant upon a criminal charge, when such juror admits that in weighing the evidence he will be prejudiced against the defendant solely by reason of the fact that the defendant is a member of an organization to which the juror feels that he is opposed. And it matters not whether that prejudice (prejudgment) against the organization is, or is not, well founded. To compel a person to submit his liberty to jeopardy depending on the decision of a tribunal thus prejudiced would be to deny the protection of a fundamental right.

The judgment and order are reversed.

If plaintiff in ejectment relies on a record or paper title, he must show a regular chain from the government, or from some grantor in possession, or from a common source from which each of the litigants claim, and introduction of a deed conveying the property to plaintiffs without showing title in the grantor or that grantor was the common source of title was ineffective.

2. Ejectment 🔑9(1)—Mere occupancy by defendant defeated plaintiff's action where element thereof lacking.

Where one of the essential elements is lacking in the showing on which plaintiffs in ejectment rely to establish their title, mere occupancy by defendants is sufficient to defeat it.

3. Adverse possession 🔑87—Act requiring payment of taxes as condition to adverse possession not retroactive.

Where possession and use were for more than five years prior to June 1, 1878, the date of adoption of the amendment to Code Civ. Proc. § 325, requiring the payment of taxes as condition of adverse possession, the question as to payment of taxes becomes immaterial, since the amendment was not retroactive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by John Waechter and another against Robert Bullard. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles H. Crocker, of Sacramento, for appellant.

George E. Foote, of Sacramento, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action is in ejectment, and plaintiffs had judgment from which the appeal has been taken. The answer of defendant consists of a specific denial of plaintiffs' ownership and alleged right of possession and plea of the statute of limitations and of title by adverse possession, and is followed by a cross-complaint seeking to quiet title as against plaintiffs. The principal point made by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the conclusion of the court in favor of plaintiffs. The land in dispute is described in the complaint as follows:

> "That certain real property situated in the city of Sacramento, county of Sacramento, state of California, known and described as the east 33 inches of the south one-fourth of lot No. 1, bounded by and between F and G streets and Fourteenth and Fifteenth streets."

[1] The only evidence offered and received on behalf of plaintiffs is a deed to them from Viola Amsden, a widow, dated February 11, 1920. In that deed the lot is described "as south one-quarter (S.¼) of lot one (1) bounded by and between F and G and 14th and 15th streets" in the city of Sacramento. After this deed was received in evidence, counsel for plaintiffs said:

> "I think that will complete my proof, your honor, as to offering my record of the title."

Plaintiffs thereupon rested, and defendant introduced the testimony of many witnesses, including himself, showing that he and his predecessors in interest had been in possession of the disputed strip for nearly 60 years. It seems clear that under the authorities and the rule that prevails in actions of ejectment the evidence on behalf of plaintiffs is insufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of title. It is to be observed that no contention was made that said Viola Amsden constituted the common source of title, nor was any evidence offered whatever that at the time of the execution of the deed she had any interest in the property. There is nothing to show that she or any one from whom she may have derived title was ever in possession of the property or had any right to such possession. The plaintiffs, of course, must rely upon the strength of their own title, and must show that they have a right superior to that of defendant. This they failed to do. The plaintiff, in an action of ejectment, if he relies upon a record or paper title, must show a regular chain from the government, or from some grantor in possession, or from a common source from which each of the litigants claims. Anything short of this is not sufficient to constitute prima facie evidence of title. 9 R. C. L. p. 843.

In Warvelle on Ejectment, § 235, it is said:

> "At common law, to authorize a recovery in ejectment, where the defendant is in possession, a valid legal title must be shown. * * * Where the rule, as stated, prevails, the plaintiff must establish his legal title, at the time of the demise laid in the declaration, either upon a connected documentary chain of evidence, or upon proofs of possession under a claim of right of sufficient duration to warrant the conclusion of the existence of such written title."

In 9 Cal. Jur. p. 982, we find this statement:

> "To establish his right of present possession, the plaintiff in an action to recover real property must show either title or prior possession. And if neither the plaintiff nor his grantors have ever been in possession, it is obvious that he must rely upon a strict title. In that event it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove a proper conveyance from a party having title or from a party in peaceable possession claiming title at the time the conveyance was ex> ecuted, in which case possession is prima facie evidence of title. The title relied upon must, however, be a legal and not merely an equitable title; since it is a settled rule that the holder of a mere equitable title cannot bring an action of this kind as against one having the legal title."

All of the authorities seem to be of the same effect and it is unnecessary to cite or quote further.

Considered most favorably to plaintiffs the case presents a contest for the right of possession between one who has been in actual and undisputed possession for many years and another whose claim arises solely from the naked deed of a stranger. The record thus exhibits a superior right in defendant.

But respondents say:

> "This case and the facts contained therein are similar to the case and the facts in Janke v. McMahon, 21 Cal. App. 781, 133 Pac. 21, and it is upon this case, and this case alone, that plaintiffs and respondents submit their case."

The decisive question therein, however, related to the claim of adverse possession. It was admitted by the appellant that the record title was in the respondent, and this court said:

> "Of course, if plaintiff had shown no title there would be significance and potency in the suggestion of appellant that defendant being in possession is entitled to judgment 'regardless of whether he had acquired a prescriptive title by adverse possession or not.' But, during all the time in controversy, the record title was in plaintiff or her predecessors in interest and the 'occupancy' referred to in section 1007 of the Civil Code must be construed in connection with the corresponding provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, thus, the conclusion is reached that to overcome the legal title the occupancy must be under a claim of right, or adverse, as that term is used in the law."

After a review of the evidence and the authorities this court held that the evidence in the trial court was sufficient to support the finding that the possession of the defendant was not under a claim of right, and that it could not prevail against the undisputed record title of the plaintiff.

[2] But herein, as we have seen, an essential element is lacking in the showing upon which plaintiffs rely to establish their title, and the mere occupancy by defendant is sufficient to defeat it. There is no doubt of the rule, as quoted by respondents:

> "That in every action for the recovery of real property or the possession thereof the person establishing a legal title to the property is presumed to have been possessed thereof within the time required by law and the occupancy of the property by any other person is deemed to have been under and in subordination to the legal title unless it appears that the property has been held and possessed adversely to such legal title for five years before the commencement of the action."

But, as we have seen, plaintiffs are not in position to invoke it. Moreover, if we assume that the evidence was sufficient as to record title, then it is at least doubtful whether the finding should not have been in favor of appellant upon the other issue.

[3] It was shown that defendant's father and predecessor in interest went into possession of the lot, including the strip in controversy, in 1862; that it was inclosed by a fence; that the possession was open, notorious, continuous and exclusive, and during all the years down to the present time the father and mother of defendant used the property for the purpose of growing vines and vegetables. The question of the payment of the taxes is not material, since such possession and use were for more than five years prior to June 1, 1878, at which date the amendment to section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the payment of taxes as a condition of adverse possession, was adopted. Said amendment was not retroactive and would not affect any title that may have been acquired prior to its enactment by defendant's predecessor in interest. Sharp v. Blankenship, 59 Cal. 288; Webber v. Clarke, 74 Cal. 11, 15 Pac. 431.

The only uncertainty relates to the question whether the use and possession were "under a claim of right." This element, like other facts, may be shown by circumstantial as well as direct evidence, and it must be admitted that the manner in which the lot was used by defendant and by his father and mother would indicate strongly that they intended thereby to assert their ownership of the whole tract. In this connection we quote from defendant's testimony as follows:

> "Q. When did you first acquire any title in this property? A. Oh, it was along in 1889, somewheres along there before 1900. * * * Q. Now, then, did anybody ever dispute any part or portion of the property, or your right to the property, especially the south 40 feet—33 inches wide, a strip of parallelogram, 33 inches wide and 40 feet long, on the south of that fence, until these people came into the matter? A. Not till he came there. Q. That is the only dispute you have ever had over it? A. Yes. * * * Q. And have you ever—you or your father ever had any agreement with any one with reference to that line of fence? A. No, sir. Q. And you have always claimed the right to that property? A. Yes, sir. Q. You and your father have at all times paid all taxes that was ever levied against the properties there, have you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you ever obtain any permission, you or your father to erect that particular fence? A. No. sir. * * * Q. Now, then, why did you put that fence—why did your father put it there, or maintain that fence on that property? A. He went according to the surveyor's stakes and papers."

The case must, of course, be distinguished from one wherein the claimant admits that there was a question as to the boundary line. Such admission might be regarded as inconsistent with a claim of right to the whole of the land inclosed. But the fact that there may have been a mistake in locating the boundary line does not of itself preclude the claimant from establishing a title by prescription to the whole of the land inclosed if he shows that he actually claimed the whole of it and the other elements of adverse possession exist. The proper view of a situation like that is clearly stated in Woodward v. Faris, 109 Cal. 12, 41 Pac. 781, as follows:

> "Title to land may be acquired by adverse possession for five years within the limits of an inclosure, although the inclosure was made under a mistaken belief as to the boundary of the land, where it is claimed as matter of fact that the fences were upon the line; but, if the inclosure was made without claiming that the fences were upon the line, but with the expectation of moving them to the true line when it should be determined, the possession would not be adverse, and the statute would not run."

But while we think the showing made by the defendant as to this question is quite persuasive, and would justify a finding that he has acquired title by prescription, yet, in view of certain statements made by him on the witness stand that might be regarded as discrediting somewhat the testimony that we have quoted and of the conclusion we have reached as to plaintiffs' failure of proof, we leave open for further consideration, if the occasion should arise, the question whether there is or may be any substantial support for the contention that defendant has no such title.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte CLEMENTE. (Cr. 987.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 16, 1923.)

Health ⚷24—Information held to authorize quarantine of woman for infectious disease.

Information that a woman is not only conducting a house of ill fame, but personally participated in the unlawful acts carried on therein, furnishes reasonable ground to believe that she is affected with an infectious disease, authorizing the health department to enforce quarantine measures against her.

Petition by Marie Clemente for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the Chief of Police of Los Angeles. Petitioner remanded to custody.

Warren L. Williams, S. S. Silverton, and L. D. Barnett, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

W. D. McConnell, City Prosecutor, J. Friedlander, Asst. City Prosecutor, and J. D. Taggart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CURTIS, J. Petitioner is before this court upon a writ of habeas corpus. The petition therefor sets forth that she is illegally detained and restrained of her liberty by the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, acting under instructions from the health department of the city of Los Angeles not to release her until she had submitted to an examination ordered to be made by said health department for the purpose of determining whether she was affected with a contagious or infectious disease.

Upon the hearing the testimony showed that the petitioner had been arrested and charged with conducting a house of ill fame. Two police officers of the city of Los Angeles testified that they visited the house of the petitioner on the day of her arrest, and of the acts and conduct of petitioner on this occasion. There was also testimony to the effect that the reputation of petitioner's house was that of a house of ill fame. This information had all been furnished to the health department, and upon it the department made its order for the examination of petitioner and for her detention until she should submit to such an examination. Repeated demands had been made of petitioner by the health department that she submit to the required examination, all of which had been refused by her.

We are satisfied that the testimony produced at the hearing warranted the conclusion that the house conducted by petitioner was a house of ill fame, that she was an inmate thereof, and personally participated in the unlawful acts carried on therein. The health department having this information was, in our opinion justified in its detention of the petitioner. This information furnished reasonable ground to believe that the petitioner was affected with the kind of disease referred to, and this, in view of two recent decisions of this court, was all that was necessary to have authorized the health department to enforce quarantine measures against the petitioner. Petitioner is remanded to the custody of respondent.

PEOPLE v. FLAHERTY. (Cr. 956.)

Criminal law ⚷1071—Appeal held dismissable for failure to file statement of ground of appeal as required by statute.

Where, after conviction for a felony, defendant requested an order directing the reporter to make a transcript of the testimony taken at the trial to be used on appeal, but failed to state the grounds of appeal or points relied upon, as required by Pen. Code, § 1247, held that the appeal was wholly ineffectual and should be dismissed, nor could it be sustained on the ground that appellant desired only to urge certain grounds of appeal based on the record shown by the clerk's transcript or judgment roll.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Annette Flaherty was convicted of receiving stolen goods, and she appeals. Dismissed.

James Donovan, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. In the court below the defendant was convicted of the crime of receiving stolen property—a felony. She gave notice of appeal from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial. A clerk's transcript and a reporter's transcript are on file in this court. The Attorney General moves for dismissal of the appeal upon the ground that the record does not show that an application stating the grounds of appeal was filed by the defendant as required by section 1247 of the Penal Code. It does appear in the clerk's transcript that on the same day when she gave her notice of appeal the defendant filed with the clerk a request that the court make an order directing the reporter "to make a transcript of the testimony taken at the trial of said cause, to be used on appeal," but did not state the grounds of appeal or the points on which appellant relies.

Several times it has been held that the provisions of said section 1247 are mandatory. The section itself declares that —

> "If such application is not filed within said time, the appeal is wholly ineffectual and shall be deemed dismissed and the judgment or order may be enforced as if no appeal had been taken." People v. Ali, 38 Cal. App. 544, 176 Pac. 883.

Counsel for appellant argues that, even though she is thus precluded from asking consideration of any points arising out of the proceedings at the trial, and which would only appear in a record of the reporter's notes, nevertheless her appeal should stand, for the reason that she desires to urge certain grounds of appeal based upon the record shown by the clerk's transcript or "judgment roll." We appreciate the fact that, in a case where the defendant desires to appeal solely upon grounds which may be presented upon the record shown in the clerk's transcript, it would be a useless procedure to ask for a transcript of the reporter's notes. Nevertheless, the Legislature has seen fit to declare that the appellant must place in the record a statement showing the grounds of his appeal and the points upon which he relies. He is not required to do that in the notice of appeal, but within five days after giving his notice of appeal he must make this statement. We must presume that there was deemed to be good reason for requiring such a statement to be made. It furnishes in the record a certain evidence of good faith and is to that extent a protection against frivolous appeals. In the absence of such statement of the grounds of appeal, not only would it become unnecessary to prepare a reporter's transcript, but the clerk would be excused from preparing and filing the clerk's transcript provided for by section 1246 of the Penal Code. We are compelled to conclude and decide that this appeal "is wholly ineffectual."

The appeal is dismissed.

KELLEY-CLARKE CO. v. LESLIE et al. (Civ. 4471.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 5, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 4, 1923.)

1. Parties ⚷7(2)—Agent acting for undisclosed principal held "trustee of express trust" entitled to sue, though not real party in interest.

Though plaintiff suing for damages for breach of a contract be conceded to have been acting as agent for an undisclosed principal in entering into the contract, he is in any event a "trustee of an express trust," and, as such, under Code Civ. Proc. § 369, an exception to the rule requiring suits to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trustee of Express Trust.]

2. Set-off and counterclaim ⚷47—Defendants sued by agent of undisclosed principal may set up counterclaim against principal.

In an action by agent of an undisclosed principal to collect damages for a breach of a contract, defendants may set up against plaintiff any counterclaim or set-off they may have against the principal.

3. Frauds, statute of 🔑118(4)—Complete contract binding under statute may be gathered from letters, writings, and telegrams between parties.

A complete contract binding under the statute may be gathered from letters, writings, and telegrams between the parties relating to its subject-matter, and so connected with each other that they may be fairly said to constitute one paper relating to the contract.

4. Frauds, statute of 🔑118(4)—Contract made by telegrams held not invalid for lack of signature where telegrams referred to in subsequent signed letters and telegrams.

A contract for the purchase of pineapple entered into by defendants' agents through the exchange of telegrams held not invalid under Civ. Code, § 2309, requiring the signature of the parties to be charged, where defendants had by a subsequent signed telegram and letters which incorporated by reference the previous telegrams constituting the contract recognized the transaction as one under a contract.

5. Sales 🔑81(3)—Contract for the purchase of pineapple held to require "prompt shipment"; "immediate shipment."

A contract for the purchase of pineapple entered into through the exchange of telegrams held to provide for "prompt shipment," rather than immediate shipment, notwithstanding the vendor stated that it was "shipping immediately"; the term "prompt shipment" meaning within a reasonable time, and the term "immediate shipment" having a special significance in the shipping business, and meaning within five days, and not being synonymous with shipping immediately.

6. Appeal and error 🔑1064(1)—Conflict of instructions not prejudicial to appellant not reversible error.

A conflict in instructions which could not operate injuriously to appellant is not ground for reversal.

7. Sales 🔑384(7)—Measure of damages for breach of contract to purchase pineapple stated.

In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to purchase pineapple, held, that the proper measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price at which the goods were resold, plus expenses incident to the resale, under Civ. Code, § 3311, subd. 2.

8. Sales 🔑382—Testimony as to damages not objectionable because lump sum named.

In an action for damages for the breach of a contract to purchase pineapple, testimony on the measure of damages as to the amount of expenses incurred in a resale is not objectionable because given in a lump sum, particularly where defendants upon cross-examination could have obtained an itemization.

9. Trial 🔑320—Incorporation of amount of damages in form of verdict submitted to jury held not error.

Where the only evidence adduced at trial as to the amount of damages sustained by the breach of a contract shows the amount of damages to be the sum mentioned in the complaint, it is not error for the trial court to incorporate the amount in one of the forms of verdict submitted to the jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; T. I. Fitzpatrick, Judge.

Action by the Kelley-Clarke Company against John H. Leslie and George H. Leslie, as individuals and copartners doing business as the J. H. Leslie Company, and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ST. SURE, J. Action for damages for breach of contract for the purchase of pineapple. Appeal by defendants from a judgment, after verdict, in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $2,650.80. Plaintiff is a firm of brokers and manufacturers' agents with offices in San Francisco, and defendants have their place of business in Chicago.

The contract is evidenced by telegrams exchanged between F. A. Davis, a San Francisco broker, agent for plaintiff, and the Continental Brokerage Company in Chicago, acting for defendants. These telegrams show: (1) An offer on July 15, 1920, by Davis, to Continental Brokerage Company, of a lot of sliced pineapple, subject to confirmation, for prompt shipment; (2) request, on same day, from Continental Brokerage Company, for confirmation to defendants of all pineapple offered; (3) advice, on same day, from Davis to Continental Brokerage Company, confirming for prompt shipment part of the goods by plaintiff to defendants, with an offer of additional goods to complete carload; (4) request, on July 16, 1920, for confirmation of additional goods; (5) advice, on July 16, 1920, of Davis to Continental Brokerage Company, of confirmation by plaintiff of additional goods, "same terms my wire July 15 to complete carload. Shipping immediately."

We have made but brief reference to these telegrams, because it is undisputed that they contain all the terms of a complete contract, viz. the seller, the buyer, the quality and quantity of the commodity purchased, the price, the manner of shipment, the manner of payment, and the brokerage.

The goods were shipped July 24th, eight days later. On August 3d the Continental Brokerage Company advised Davis by wire that defendants refused to honor draft attached to bill of lading for the pineapple, claiming that the goods were bought for "immediate shipment," and shipped five days late. The market on pineapple had declined sharply—about 25 per cent.—in the meantime. Davis replied by wire to the telegram of August 3d on the following day, explaining that the goods were shipped as soon as car could be obtained, and offering a discount if the draft were paid within a certain time. On August 5th defendants themselves sent to Davis the following telegram:

> "Referring to telegram Continental Brokerage Kelley Clarke's car pineapple was confirmed immediate shipment other car was for prompt shipment. No stipulation as to car shortgage which they were fully aware of and should not have confirmed if they could not comply with contract so we cannot accept as they were not shipped according to contracts.
> "John H. Leslie & Co."

Plaintiff then sent to defendants a telegram, in reply, in part as follows:

> "Very much surprised your attitude regarding pineapple which we confirmed July sixteenth for immediate shipment and shipped July twenty-fourth. Surely three days delay made no difference to you."

The use of the term "immediate shipment" in the foregoing telegram is explained in the following letter written by Mr. Adams, vice president of plaintiff corporation to the defendants:

> "San Francisco, California, August 14th, 1920.
> "John H. Leslie & Company, Chicago, Ill.—Gentlemen: The writer conducted a little investigation yesterday and discovered that the car of pineapple, which was shipped you by us on July 24th, was never confirmed for immediate shipment. The writer's statement in our telegram of August 5th, was incorrect, this being only on his understanding of the matter, and not on the actual facts. In explanation, will state that the writer was out of town at the time these goods were confirmed, and it was only yesterday that we discovered that the goods had been confirmed you for prompt shipment, and also that they were originally offered on this basis. This being the case, we intend to protect our interest and suggest that you look into the matter and if you find we are correct take up our draft upon arrival of the goods.
> "Yours very truly,
> Kelley Clarke Company,
> "Per AWA."

Numerous telegrams and letters were exchanged between plaintiff and defendants as to whether the contract was one for "immediate shipment" or "prompt shipment." Plaintiff took the position that the goods were offered, accepted, and confirmed for prompt and not immediate shipment. Defendants were put upon notice that refusal to honor plaintiff's draft would result in suit by plaintiff for the full amount of the invoice or for any loss occasioned by resale. The car of pineapple arrived in Chicago August 17th, and was later sold to a New York buyer and shipped to New York. Damages claimed are made up of the difference between the invoice price under the contract and that on resale, demurrage on the car while held in Chicago, and expenses in carrying the goods to the new market. On the trial defendants offered no evidence, but relied on objections to the introduction of the documents offered by plaintiff and cross-examination of its witnesses.

[1, 2] Defendants urge five points for a reversal of the judgment. The first is that plaintiff is not the real party in interest, citing section 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and arguing that the case does not come within the exceptions set forth in section 369, Code of Civil Procedure. There is some evidence in the record to the effect that the pineapple in question was owned by Kockos Bros. Conceding plaintiff to have been, as defendants now contend, agent for an undisclosed principal, plaintiff was the trustee of an express trust, and as such an exception to the general rule requiring suits to be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest. Allen v. Chatfield, 34 Cal. App. 785, 786, 168 Pac. 1149, and cases cited therein. It makes no difference whether the principal knew of the suit or not. In such an action defendants may set up against the agent any counterclaim or set-off they might have against the principal. The record shows that defendants dealt with the plaintiff as the real party throughout the entire proceedings, and set up no objection to it on this ground in their answer.

[3] The second point is that there is no memorandum signed by defendants or their authorized agents, and that the contract is therefore void by reason of the statute of frauds. The record clearly shows a contract entered into between plaintiff and defendants through Davis in San Francisco and the Continental Brokerage Company in Chicago. It is the law that a complete contract, binding under the statute of frauds, may be gathered from letters, writings, and telegrams between the parties relating to its subject-matter, and so connected with each other that they may fairly be said to constitute one paper relating to the contract. Elbert v. Los Angeles Gas Co., 97 Cal. 244, 32 Pac. 9.

[4] Conceding that the telegrams contain all of the elements of a contract, nevertheless defendants contend that the contract yet lacks the greatest essential, to wit, the signature of the parties to be charged, either by the parties themselves or some one shown to be authorized by them. Section 2309, Civ. Code. By their signed telegram of August 5th, quoted above, defendants treated the contract as one made for them with plaintiff. Signed telegrams and letters between the parties incorporated by reference the previous telegrams constituting the contract. Defendants neither denied the contract nor repudiated the acts in their behalf of the Continental Brokerage Company. In a letter written by defendants to plaintiff on August 14th, before the goods arrived in Chicago, wherein defendants seek to justify their position in interpreting the contract as one for immediate shipment, they say:

> "We are sorry that a misunderstanding has arisen but a contract is a contract."

It will thus be seen that, while there was not an express ratification of the effect of the contract expressed in words, there was an express recognition that there was a contract. The uncontradicted evidence is that the respective parties recognized the transaction as one under a contract, the difference between them being as to whether the contract called for "prompt shipment" or "immediate shipment." As was said by our Supreme Court in Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 588, 597, 72 Pac. 156, 159:

> "Of course authority must be shown, but it need not be express authority; it may be implied and one of the recognized legal methods of proving authority is by ratification. From such proofs the law implies previous authority to the same extent as if in the first instance it had been expressly conferred. The doctrine of ratification proceeds upon the theory that there was no previous authority, and that the relation of principal and agent did not in fact exist, but implies it from the acts and conduct of the parties, and when so implied, is equivalent to previous authority, and results as effectively to establish the relations of principal and agent as if the agency had been authorized in the beginning."

See section 2307, Civ. Code; Quinn v. Dresbach, 75 Cal. 162, 16 Pac. 762, 7 Am. St. Rep. 138; Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 301, 32 Pac. 243; Pope v. Armsby Co., 111 Cal. 159, 43 Pac. 589; Ford v. Lou Kum Shu, 26 Cal. App. 203, 146 Pac. 199; Anglo-California Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 393, 399, 81 Pac. 1081; Union Trust & Realty Co. v. Best, 160 Cal. 263, 267, 116 Pac. 737; Phillips v. Phillips, 163 Cal. 530, 535, 127 Pac. 346.

The third point is that—

> "The jury arbitrarily and without warrant disregarded the peremptory instructions of the court with regard to the effect of the immediate shipment clause."

[5] The trial court erroneously interpreted the contract to be one for immediate shipment." The contract is contained in the first five telegrams exchanged between Davis on behalf of plaintiff and the Continental Brokerage Company on behalf of defendants. The offer was made and accepted for prompt shipment. An additional offer was made upon the same terms as the first, and was thereafter accepted. In the telegram confirming the sale of additional goods the agent for plaintiff uses these words:

> "Same terms my wire July 15th to complete car. Shipping immediately."

The words "shipping immediately" were not a necessary part of the contract between the parties. The contract used the term "prompt shipment"—the goods were offered and accepted on that basis. In the interchange of telegrams the term "immediate shipment" was not used or suggested by either party to the contract, although, in the shipping business, the term "immediate shipment" has a special significance. There is evidence in the record to show that it means within five days. "Shipping immediately" has no particular significance other than is conveyed by the ordinary meaning of the words. "Prompt shipment" means within a reasonable time. It may therefore be said that in the shipping business "immediate shipment" and "shipping immediately" are not regarded as synonymous terms. We think that the use of the words "shipping immediately" were merely incidental to the telegram of confirmation in which they appeared, and were added by plaintiff's agent for the purpose of indicating to the buyer that the shipment would be made without unreasonable delay. The goods were shipped within eight days.

The trial court instructed the jury in part as follows:

> "I charge you that the word 'immediately' undoubtedly has a relative meaning, and must be read in the light of surrounding circumstances."
> "I hereby instruct you that the words 'immediate shipment,' as used in the contract involved in this action, if any, meant not in excess of five business days."
> "I furthermore instruct you that, if you believe from the evidence in this case that the term 'immediate shipment' meant shipment within five days from the making of the contract, if any, and that the shipment in question was not made until eight days thereafter, your verdict shall be in favor of the defendants and against the plaintiff, even though the failure to ship within five days was due to inability upon the part of plaintiff to secure transportation."
> "I instruct you that there is no note or memorandum signed by any of the defendants herein, stating that the terms of shipment, if any, were otherwise than immediate shipment; you are therefore to take it as the fact that, if there existed any contract in the present matter, such contract provided for immediate shipment."

[6] A reading of these instructions renders analysis of them unnecessary. They are obviously conflicting, and the last is so strongly favorable to the defendants that we are willing to adopt defendants' characterization of it as "peremptory." The trial court accepted the erroneous construction given to the contract by defendants, as the last of the above-quoted instructions virtually directed the jury to find for the defendants. But the trial court must have been confused about the matter, because there is a conflict in the instructions, and, further, while in effect doing so, it refused to give an instruction for a directed verdict, in terms, in favor of defendants, and submitted the case to the jury with two forms of verdict, one for damages for plaintiff in the full amount prayed for, and the other a general verdict in favor of defendants. The jury either disregarded or misunderstood the instructions of the court. The verdict was in favor of plaintiff and against defendants for the amount sued for. This presents an interesting, but by no means novel, question. It has been repeatedly held that—

> "A conflict in instructions which could not operate injuriously to appellant is not ground for reversal." Dennison v. Chapman, 105 Cal. 447, 458, 39 Pac. 61, 64, and cases therein cited.

It is only when an erroneous instruction has resulted in prejudicing the rights of the complaining party that the judgment will be reversed, and it is the general rule that such action will not be taken by the appellate court for error in giving or refusing to give instructions if the verdict is manifestly right. 14 R. C. L. § 74, pp. 815, 816. Mr. Thompson, in his work on Trials (section 2431), says that instructions faulty or technically erroneous will not work a reversal of the judgment if the jury are not misled, or if as a whole the case was fairly presented to them, and especially if their verdict is obviously correct. And, further, as having some bearing on this case, we find in Yolo Water & Power Co. v. Hudson, 182 Cal. 48, 51, 186 Pac. 772, 774:

> "A party cannot complain of an instruction given at his own request or of an error in an instruction given at the instance of his adversary when he requests a substantially similar one."

Interpreting the contract as being one for "prompt shipment," and not for "immediate shipment," we are of the opinion that the verdict of the jury was manifestly right, and therefore should not be disturbed.

[7] The next point is that "the amount of the damages cannot be sustained, and the manner in which the assessment of said damages was submitted to the jury constituted prejudicial error." Plaintiff sued for $2,650.80, and the jury's verdict was for that amount. The complaint, following the language contained in subdivision 2 of section 3311 of the Civil Code, alleged:

> "That by reason of said breach of contract said plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $2,650.80, which is the difference between the actual amount due from the defendants under the terms of the contract, hereinbefore referred to over the value to plaintiff, together with the expenses properly incurred in carrying said merchandise to market, which would not have been incurred if defendants had accepted said merchandise."

The evidence showed that the difference between the contract price and the price at which plaintiff resold the goods was the sum of $1,911.10, and that the sum of $739.70 was for the additional expenses incident to the resale of the pineapple in New York. Defendants say in their brief:

> "The theory upon which plaintiff proceeded in attempting to prove its damage was apparently that it was entitled to the difference between the contract price and the resale price, plus the additional expense in getting the goods to market where they were resold."

[8] We think the theory was correct, and that the modifications suggested by defendants do not apply. The undisputed evidence of the resale and the price obtained thereupon is sufficient. The testimony as to the amount of the expenses was not objectionable because given in a lump sum. Defendants could have obtained itemization of the charges when opportunity was given to do so upon cross-examination. It is too late to complain of that now.

The objection that the sale was not conducted in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Code is without merit. The uncontradicted evidence shows that an effort was made to resell the goods in Chicago, and that there was no market in that city. Defendants admitted that they knew that the goods were offered for resale in Chicago, and, as plaintiff suggests, they were thus given an opportunity of saving the item of expense of which they complain.

[9] The only evidence adduced at the trial as to the amount of the damages was that introduced by plaintiff. It showed that the amount of damages was the sum mentioned in the complaint for which judgment was asked, to wit, $2,650.80. That being the only evidence before the court upon the subject, it was not error for the trial court to incorporate the amount in one of the forms of verdict submitted to the jury.

In urging their last point for reversal defendants say that the trial court committed an "unusual number" of errors in its rulings on evidence and in its giving or withholding of instructions. The record shows that the court had a somewhat difficult task to perform during the trial of the case, as almost every question asked by plaintiff of its witnesses was objected to by defendants. We have read the record, and find it free from error prejudicial to defendants. In view of what we have heretofore said about the court's instructions we think further discussion thereof unnecessary. The instructions given were most favorable to the defendants, and complaint that others more favorable were not given is supererogatory.

SOUTHWICK v. MOORE. (Civ. 4027.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 9, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 7, 1923.)

1. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑57(1) — When debtor insolvent stated.

A debtor is insolvent when he is unable to pay his debts, when they fall due, from his own means.

2. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑297—Evidence justified finding of grantor's insolvency at time of deed.

In action by a creditor of decedent to set aside a deed from decedent to his wife as in fraud of creditors, evidence held to justify a finding of decedent's insolvency at time of its execution.

3. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑300(5) — Evidence justified finding of lack of consideration in deed from debtor to his wife.

In action by a creditor of decedent to set aside a deed from decedent to his wife as in fraud of creditors, evidence held to justify a finding that deed was without consideration; any previous claim the wife might have had against grantor having been discharged by his proceedings in insolvency.

4. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑299(12)—Deed from debtor husband to wife held made in contemplation of insolvency.

In action by a creditor of decedent to set aside a deed from decedent to his wife as in fraud of creditors, evidence held to show that by making deed of the only property he owned decedent became insolvent, and the transfer made in contemplation of insolvency, and therefore void as to existing creditors.

5. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑69(1) — Deed without consideration may be void, as made with intent to defraud future creditors.

A deed without consideration may be void, as made with the specific intent to enable grantor to defraud future creditors.

6. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑298(4) — Deed fraudulent as to existing creditors prima facie fraudulent as to future creditors.

Proof of fraudulency of a deed as to existing creditors supplies a prima facie case against creditors whose claims arise subsequently.

7. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑146(2) — Continued acts of ownership by grantor after conveyance, with grantee's knowledge, held suggestive of fraud.

Where a husband executed a deed to his wife, which she withheld from record, acts of the husband thereafter in exercising acts of and claiming ownership in the premises, with the knowledge of the wife, held strongly suggestive of fraud.

8. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑163—By redemption of property from foreclosure sale, wife held not to be innocent purchaser.

Where a husband in fraud of creditors conveyed property to his wife, who secretly withheld deed from the record, the wife being a party to the fraud, by redemption of the property from foreclosure sale she could not become an innocent purchaser as to the creditors.

9. Fraudulent conveyances 🔑286(8) — Evidence of grantor's statements, subsequent to fraudulent deed to wife, held admissible.

In action to set aside a deed as fraudulent as to creditors, evidence of grantor's statements, subsequent to delivery of the deed, to the effect that he still owned the property, was admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by G. W. Southwick against Mary Theresa Moore, as administratrix with the will annexed of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, deceased, and individually. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. B. Canfield, Frank L. Rabe, and William G. Griffith, all of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Richards, Heaney & Price, of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an action by the plaintiff as a creditor of Thomas W. Moore, deceased, to set aside a deed from said decedent to his wife, Mary Theresa Moore, on the ground that the deed was given to defraud creditors. By this proceeding it was sought to claim the property conveyed and have it declared that of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, and as such applied to the statisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, which had been allowed and approved before the filing of the action, in the sum of $3,457.09. The deed in question was executed on the 24th day of March, 1898, and purported to convey a part of the Las Positas or Hope ranch, in the county of Santa Barbara. The case was tried before the superior court of Santa Barbara county, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, by which it was held that the deed was null and void as against the plaintiff, and it was adjudged that the property described therein is a part of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, deceased, to be applied to the payment of the plaintiff's claim.

The principal contention of the appellant is based upon the assertion that certain findings are not supported by the evidence. There is also a question raised that the court committed error in connection with the admission of evidence. The following further statement of the facts is necessary to a clear understanding of the issues:

Mary Theresa Moore was a daughter of Thomas Hope, who at one time owned the Rancho Las Positas, containing in all 3,281 acres. After the death of Thomas Hope, his ranch was distributed to his widow and six children, one of whom was Theresa Hope. Later this property was partitioned among the owners in common, and by the partition Mary Theresa Moore (née Hope) and her brother, James C. Hope, received lots 5 and 5½, which included the property described in the deed in question in this case. On May 19, 1890, James C. Hope conveyed his share of the property allowed to him by the partition to Thomas W. Moore, husband of the defendant herein. The consideration for the deed from James C. Hope to Moore was paid by the defendant from her separate funds and amounted to about $20,000. Thereafter Moore brought suit to quiet title to the property, making his wife defendant. Through that proceeding and other necessary steps, he removed what were apparently certain clouds upon the title. In 1893 defendant executed a quitclaim deed of this property to her husband; in 1894 he conveyed it to Mrs. Moore, the deed expressly stating that the estate alienated should be her separate property Thereafter he instituted proceedings and secured discharge from his debts by voluntary insolvency, receiving the final discharge on June 16, 1897. One of the debts listed and discharged was the obligation for the money advanced by defendant to purchase the property from her brother. On the following day the defendant conveyed the property involved in this suit to her husband as his separate property and for a recited consideration of $16,000. As heretofore stated, in 1898 he executed a deed of the same property to the defendant; this he delivered to her in the office of H. C. Booth, an attorney at law. In making the delivery, Moore said to Mrs. Moore, "This is the deed to your property." The defendant kept the deed in a private box in her home until a few hours before the death of her husband on the 19th day of March, 1916. She then gave it to her attorney and instructed him to record it, which he did. All of the previous deeds between the parties were recorded immediately after being executed. During the entire period from March, 1898, until March, 1916, Moore dealt with this property as his own, at all times holding himself out as its owner, to the full knowledge of the defendant; he executed many leases and other instruments of a proprietary character, of which 75 were recorded. In some of these instruments, in which the representation appeared that Thomas W. Moore was the legal owner, the defendant joined, signing as his wife. The property was at all times after Mrs. Moore's last deed to her husband assessed to him, and after the year 1900 he paid the taxes. At the time of Moore's death there was a mortgage upon the premises for about $24,000, owned by the Central Bank. This was subsequently foreclosed, and then Mrs. Moore redeemed the property from its incumbrance.

The claim of the plaintiff consisted of a promissory note, dated September 16, 1914, in the sum of $3,480 for services rendered in a certain sale of real estate. This note was unsecured. The plaintiff testified, however, that he extended the credit in reliance upon the ownership by Moore of the ranch in question; that he heard a rumor to the effect that the property had been transferred to Mrs. Moore, and examined the records of Santa Barbara county, and thereby ascertained that the title appeared there to be vested in Moore. The court found that on March 24, 1898, "Thomas W. Moore was and for a long time prior thereto had been insolvent"; also, referring to the deed in question, "that there was and is no consideration for said attempted conveyance or said purported deed;" further, that the deed was made with the intention to hinder, delay and defraud the creditors of Thomas W. Moore, present and future; and that Mary Theresa Moore actively participated in such fraud. These are the findings which appellant contends are not supported by the evidence.

The evidence relied upon by the respondent to establish the insolvency of Moore is the following: The county auditor testified from the records in his office that the only property assessed to Moore for the year 1898 was the land involved in this action, with furniture, wagons, and horses. Mrs. Moore testified that she did not know of any other property belonging to him. In 1898 Moore's personal property was sold by the state for unpaid taxes for that year. The taxes on the land in question were not paid, and had not been paid since 1896. During the year 1898, upon two occasions, Moore transferred a lease to secure a debt. A mortgage for $4,960 and a trust deed for $12,000 existed as security for obligations, these liens both being upon the ranch here in dispute. Since his discharge in insolvency, and in fact until 1910, Moore had no business or occupation of profit, except to lease out a part of the ranch, where the Moores lived, but which they did not farm. No witness testified to his earning any money during this period, except in overseeing a few transactions for Mrs. Moore.

[1-3] A debtor is insolvent when he is unable to pay his debts from his own means as they become due. In re Ramazzina, 110 Cal. 488, 42 Pac. 970; Washburn v. Huntington, 78 Cal. 573, 21 Pac. 305. Measured by this standard these facts are sufficient to sustain the finding of insolvency. They show that when the deed was executed Moore was a debtor; they constitute evidence from which the trial court might fairly infer—in fact, could hardly have avoided the conclusion—that he did not possess money or property with which to pay such debts. The evidence to sustain the finding that the deed in question was without consideration is also ample. If Mrs. Moore had formerly held any claim against Moore, it was discharged by the proceeding in insolvency. The only debt which is shown to have existed was for the advancement made by Mrs. Moore in the way of payment to her brother for the deed to Moore.

Appellant insists that this was not the claim presented by Mrs. Moore in the insolvency proceeding. However, we think the evidence is such as to permit the deduction that this was the same claim, and all inferences are to be so drawn, if possible, as to sustain the findings. One note of Moore's discharged in insolvency was dated May 10, 1890. The transaction by which James C. Hope transferred the ranch to Moore accrued at almost the same time, Hope's deed to Moore being dated May 19, 1890. In listing the claim for the note above mentioned, which when presented in the insolvency proceeding totaled $14,395, principal and interest, Moore's petition showed Mrs. Moore as a creditor for the principal sum of $10,000 as "indebtedness accrued from 1890 to 1896" upon notes for money borrowed and advanced during that period. This surely included the consideration for the purchase of the ranch from James C. Hope. Besides, if any other indebtedness existed against Moore in her favor, the burden rested upon her, the defendant, to prove it if she would avoid the disadvantage of the finding that the deed in question was without consideration. On the contrary, at one point, while testifying, she said that she did not remember that at the time this deed was made Mr. Moore owed her any money.

Having concluded that the evidence sustains the finding that the deed of March, 1890, was without consideration, and that when it was executed Moore was insolvent, it becomes unnecessary to consider the intent of Mrs. Moore, or determine whether or not she designedly participated in fraud which her husband may have perpetrated in making the deed. Knox v. Blanckenburg, 28 Cal. App. 298, 152 Pac. 59; Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 508, 24 Pac. 286; Ross v. Wellman, 102 Cal. 1, 36 Pac. 402. We pass to a consideration of the evidence as supporting the finding that the deed was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors.

[4, 5] If there could be any dispute as to Moore's insolvency before the deed was executed there certainly can be no shadow of doubt that by making the conveyance of the only property he owned he became insolvent and that the transfer was made "in contemplation of insolvency." Emmons v. Barton, 109 Cal. 662, 42 Pac. 303; Borgfeldt v. Curry, 25 Cal. App. 624, 144 Pac. 976; Knox v. Blanckenburg, supra. Such a transfer is void as to existing creditors. Section 3442, Civ. Code. Respondent was not an "existing creditor" when the deed was executed. A deed without consideration may be void, as made with the specific intent to enable the grantor to defraud future creditors. Schell v. Gamble, 153 Cal. 448, 95 Pac. 870; Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 Pac. 967. Whether such intent is shown is a question of fact, and not one of law. Section 3442, Civ. Code.

[6, 7] However, as bearing upon the point now under consideration, to wit, the bona fides of Moore when he made the transfer, the proof sufficient to establish fraud as to existing creditors supplies a prima facie case of fraud against those whose claims arose subsequently. Hemenway v. Thaxter, 150 Cal. 737, 90 Pac. 116. The continued control of the property after the conveyance is further evidence of fraudulent intent. Purkitt v. Polack, 17 Cal. 327; Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, supra; Murphy v. Mulgrew, 102 Cal. 547, 36 Pac. 857, 41 Am. St. Rep. 200. The exercise of acts of ownership and claims of ownership by Moore subsequent to the execution of the deed with the knowledge of Mrs. Moore is strongly suggestive of fraud. The deed was ready to be placed on record at any moment, although Moore was enabled to trade on the credit of the ownership of the ranch. It is apparent that he knew that it was unrecorded; otherwise, he would not have assumed the control of the estate as owner. He thus participated in the secrecy, and may properly be held to have intended deception through the concealment of the fact that a transfer of title had occurred.

As said in Schell v. Gamble, the burden of proof is upon the creditor to establish the fact of the fraudulent intention of the grantor; that burden is, however, sustained where a prima facie case is made out. As we have shown in the instant case, the creditor added other evidence to a prima facie showing. Of course, the evidence was circumstantial; but that is usual in such cases. It is also true that the record contains other testimony, especially that of the appellant, tending to contradict the respondent's proof. It has not been necessary to give this extended consideration, since it is not the province of an appellate court to weigh and contrast the evidence.

[8] The redemption of the property from the foreclosure sale did not give appellant a clear title as against the claim of a creditor of the deceased under the circumstances of this case. By the redemption she merely removed the lien of the mortgage. Being the grantee under the deed of March, 1898, and a party to the fraud against the creditors of Moore, she could not become an innocent purchaser by the redemption as to them. Phillips v. Hagart, 113 Cal. 552, 45 Pac. 843, 54 Am. St. Rep. 369.

[9] Appellant contends that it was error to permit witnesses to testify as to statements made by Moore, subsequent to the delivery of the deed, to the effect that be still owned the property. It is well established that such evidence is admissible where the issue is one of fraud. Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, supra. Emmons v. Barton is not in point, because it does not contain such an issue nor was concealment and deception charged therein. We have examined other alleged errors on the part of the court in admitting evidence, and find nothing therein of such importance as to warrant a reversal, even if slight technical errors occurred.

Judgment is affirmed.

LAUGHTON v. McDONALD et al.

(Civ. 2601.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 16, 1923.)

1. Frauds, statute of 🔑129(11)—One holding land under verbal agreement and making valuable improvements and paying purchase price entitled to have contract enforced.

One who enters into possession of land under a verbal agreement of sale, and who makes valuable improvements thereon, and particularly if he pays the purchase price, is entitled to have the contract enforced; the statute not applying to such case.

2. Specific performance 🔑121(5)—Evidence held to show defendants purchased land under verbal agreement, entered into possession, and improved it so as to be entitled to deed.

Evidence held to show defendants purchased land under a verbal agreement, entered into possession, and made valuable improvements thereon, so as to entitle them to a deed from plaintiff, claiming to be a bona fide purchaser.

3. Vendor and purchaser 🔑232(1)—Knowledge of possession of land by one other than vendor held sufficient to put purchaser on inquiry.

Where plaintiff, before purchasing land, saw the property and that defendants were in possession, such facts were sufficient to put him on inquiry.

4. Vendor and purchaser 🔑228(2)—One held not bona fide purchaser of land.

Where plaintiff, before purchasing land was told by defendants that they had purchased the property and were the owners thereof, plaintiff could not successfully maintain he was an innocent purchaser for value without notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Ejectment by Joseph Frederick Thompson Laughton against William McDonald and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ray Manwell, of Marysville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The complaint is in the usual form of an action in ejectment, and the prayer is:

"(1) For the recovery of the possession of the demanded premises and for the sum of $100 damages for withholding the possession thereof.

"(2) For the sum of $50, value of said rents, issues, and profits, and costs of suit."

The defendants denied the material allegations of the complaint, except admitting that they were in possession of the land in controversy, and, as a separate defense and by way of cross-complaint, they alleged:

"On or about the 1st day of January, 1900, one Katherine McIntyre was the owner in the possession, and entitled to the possession, of the lands in plaintiff's complaint herein described; and on or about the said date she did, for the price or consideration of $10 per acre, by a verbal agreement then and there made between her and cross-complainants grant, sell, and transfer the west 25 acres of the southwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 27, township 17 north, range 5 east M. D. M., situate and being in the county of Yuba, state of California, to wit, the west 25 acres of the lands in said complaint described.

"The said consideration of $10 per acre was and is an adequate consideration for the contract and as to said Katherine McIntyre, and to all persons interested the said contract is just and reasonable; and whatever rights plaintiff claims to have acquired were so acquired with full knowledge of the rights of these cross-complainants as in this cross-complaint set forth.

"At the said time of the said verbal agreement in paragraph 2 of this cross-complaint mentioned said 25 acres aforesaid were entirely unimproved, with no buildings or improvements thereon, and were grown up to chaparral, brush, and in a generally wild and uncultivated condition.

"'That thereupon upon the making of said verbal agreement of purchase and sale aforesaid and in good faith and relying thereon, these cross-complainants moved upon and took possession of said 25 acres, and have since cleared the brush therefrom, constructed, and now have thereon a dwelling house, barn, chicken house and other outbuildings and improvements; have reduced said lands to a high state of cultivation; and during a period of approximately 20 years they have occupied and used said 25 acres as their home; brought thereon water from Browns Valley irrigation district; have irrigation thereon; have paid for all said water; paid all taxes and assessments of every kind levied or assessed thereon and have paid the full purchase price of said lands in said sum of $10 per acre; all in full reliance upon the said verbal agreement and with full knowledge not only of said Katherine McIntyre, but of all her successors in interest, including the plaintiff in this action and his predecessors in interest and their grantors."

No question was or is raised as to the sufficiency of the pleadings. The trial was had before the judge of the court without a jury, and the findings and judgment were in favor of the defendants. In the judgment the court decreed "that defendants and cross-complainants now are and at the date of the commencement of this action were the owners, in the possession, and entitled to the possession" of the land in controversy (describing it) "and during none of said times did plaintiff have, nor has he now any right, title, or interest in or to the same or any part or portion thereof." The court further directed the plaintiff, within five days from notice, to execute a good and sufficient deed granting and transferring to defendants the said land, and an elisor was appointed to execute such deed should plaintiff fail to do so.

[1] That one who enters into possession of real property under a verbal agreement of sale and who makes valuable improvements thereon, and particularly if he pays the purchase price, is entitled to have the contract enforced, and that the statute of frauds does not apply to such case is settled beyond controversy, and it is hardly necessary to cite authorities in support of this legal proposition. However, among the long list of cases in which the question is discussed, we may refer to Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 150; Churchill v. Russell, 148 Cal. 1, 82 Pac. 440; Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 124 Pac. 220; and Howard v. Stephens, 38 Cal. App. 296, 176 Pac. 65. All the decisions are in accord with the following statement made in the Kinsell Case, supra:

> "The doctrine that verbal contracts for the sale of land, if part performed by the party seeking the remedy, may be specifically enforced, is an elementary principle in equity jurisprudence and of universal application throughout the American states."

[2] It is equally as clear from the record that the evidence brings the case within the application of the foregoing principle. Indeed, the case is stronger for the reason that the entire consideration was paid by defendants. Mrs. Mary McDonald testified, in response to questions by her counsel, as follows:

> "Q. Did you have an agreement with Mrs. McIntyre about buying that land? A. Yes, sir. Q. Tell the judge what that was. A. Well, the agreement was I bought that 25 acres from Mrs. McIntyre, the agreement was I was to pay so much every year. Mr. Carlin: How much? A. I paid $20 every year and sometimes $25 and sometimes $40 when I could get it. I kept up the taxes right along; that was to go in as payment on the place—the taxes—whatever was left over went on the installment plan, paid in installments? Q. Was your agreement with her that you were to pay $20 a year each year? A. Yes, sir. Q. Some years you paid— A. Paid more, $25; yes, sir. Q. In your agreement with her when you settled up the whole thing were you to get your deed? A. No, sir; she died before she made the deed. Q. Was she to give you a deed? A. She was to give me a deed; yes. Q. Tell the court about that. A. She was to give me a deed. Q. When? When you got it all paid up? A. When I got it all paid up she was to make out the deed; I was to get the deed. Q. Was she a widow woman? A. Yes, sir; she was a widow woman. Q. How far did Mrs. McIntyre live or was her house from this land? A. About a mile, I should say about a mile. Q. What was the condition of the land when you bought it this way; was it cleared or uncleared? A. No, sir; it was all brush. Mr. Carlin: Was there any house or any building on it? A. No, sir; I put up the buildings. Q. How soon after making this agreement did you and your husband go to live on the place? A. Well, as soon as we got the house up. Q. How soon did you commence to put up the house? A. In a short time, it didn't take long. Q. As soon as you made the bargain did you go at once to build? A. Yes, sir. Q. You built your house, did you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Is that the same house that is there now? A. Yes, sir. Q. A frame house, I suppose? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you build any outbuildings? A. Yes; a little chicken house and shed. Q. How about the chaparral and the brush, did you clear it? A. Cleared off some of it, some of it. Q. How many acres about did you clear? A. I couldn't exactly say, just cleared off as we went, maybe 10 or 15."

It was also shown that the price paid was an adequate consideration for the land, and it is not disputed that Mrs. McIntyre referred to in said testimony was the original owner of the property.

We may add that much corroborative evidence is disclosed by the record including the testimony of several witnesses that Mrs. McIntyre admitted that she had sold the land to defendants. It is true that some receipts were introduced in evidence of money paid by defendants, reciting that it was for rent of the premises, but neither of defendants was able to read or write, and they both testified that they had no knowledge or information that it was recited in said receipts that the money was for rent. There is some evidence also that the defendant William McDonald admitted that he was not the owner of the land, but he explained by saying that he meant he had not received a deed for it. It appears also that at the time when it is claimed he made such admission he was a man of feeble intellect and scarcely capable of performing or understanding a business transaction. At any rate, the most that appellant can claim is that there is a conflict in the evidence as to this vital point, but it is apparent from the record that the finding is abundantly supported by the evidence, which was offered and received on behalf of defendants.

[3, 4] As to the only other point discussed by appellant, that he is an innocent purchaser without notice, it is also clear that the court was justified in finding against his contention. The evidence shows that before purchasing he went out and saw the property; saw respondents in possession. This, of course, would put him upon inquiry, but the evidence goes further, as shown by the testimony of Mrs. McDonald that she told appellant that defendants had purchased the property from Mrs. McIntyre and were the owners thereof. Under such circumstances he would, of course, purchase the property at his peril, and he could not successfully maintain that he was an innocent purchaser for value without notice. It is unnecessary to cite authorities in support of the proposition so well established. If it may be said that the record shows some evidence in support of appellant's claim, it cannot be doubted that the evidence to the contrary is sufficient to support the judgment.

We find no merit whatever in the appeal, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

HELLNER v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 4271.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1923.)

1. Appeal and error ⚷381—Sureties on bond must be excepted to within time.

Where, after an appeal has been perfected and notice of an undertaking on appeal given, an appellee has failed to take exception to the sureties on the undertaking within five days as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, held, that no ground for dismissing the appeal existed because the sureties on the undertaking were not acceptable.

2. Mandamus ⚷57(1)—After an improper dismissal by the superior court of an appeal from the justice court, writ of mandate furnishes appropriate remedy to appellant.

Where the superior court has improperly dismissed an appeal from the justice court, a writ of mandate by the Court of Appeal directed to the superior court is an appropriate remedy.

Application by Chas. J. Hellner for a writ of mandate directed to the Superior Court of the state of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and others. Writ allowed.

Ingle Carpenter and Chas. W. Fourl, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

H. G. Bittleston, of San Francisco, and Edward Judson Brown, of Oakland, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On petition for writ of mandate. The return to the alternative writ does not raise any issues of fact of any importance.

In an action in the justice's court wherein the petitioner Hellner was defendant, judgment was rendered against the defendant on the 19th day of January, 1923. On January 30th the defendant filed a notice of appeal, and also filed an undertaking on appeal. On Monday, the 5th day of February, before noon, he served on the attorneys for the plaintiff notice of the appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking on appeal; said notice setting forth the date of the filing of said undertaking on appeal. On February 9th the plaintiff filed in the justice's court and served on the defendant a notice of exception to the sufficiency of the sureties on said undertaking and requiring that they justify as required by law. On February 6th the certified copy of the justice's docket and the other documents required to be filed in the superior court on appeal from a judgment of a justice's court were filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county. Thereafter the plaintiff moved the court to dismiss said appeal on the ground that the defendant's sureties, or other sureties in their place, had failed to justify, notwithstanding that they had been duly served with notice of exception to the sureties on said undertaking. The court granted said motion and dismissed the appeal. By reason of the facts stated, petitioner asks for a writ of mandate commanding the respondent court to vacate said order of dismissal and to reinstate the appeal and proceed with the trial of the cause.

The law which governs this case is found in section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The time allowed to the respondent on an appeal from a justice's court within which he may except to the sufficiency of the sureties on an undertaking on appeal is defined by the phrase "within five days after the filing of the undertaking." In this case that time (allowing an extra day because the fifth day was Sunday) expired on the 5th day of February. Notwithstanding that said section of the Code provides that "notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to respondent," no action by respondent is made to depend upon or follow the giving of this notice. "The exception to the sureties seems to have no direct relation to or connection with this notice. It may be taken before or after any formal notice of the filing of the undertaking, provided it is taken within five days after such filing." Rigby v. Superior Court, 162 Cal. 334, 339, 122 Pac. 958, 960; Blake v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 51, 118 Pac. 448.

[1, 2] Since the appeal was perfected and the notice of undertaking given, in full compliance with the method prescribed by law, and since the respondent on appeal did not except to the sureties within the time required by law, there exists no legal ground for dismissal of the appeal on the record here presented. And as petitioner has no remedy by appeal, the writ of mandate furnishes an appropriate remedy. Golden Gate Tile Co. v. Superior Court, 159 Cal. 474, 114 Pac. 978; Widrin v. Superior Court, 17 Cal. App. 93, 118 Pac. 550.

Let the peremptory writ issue.

In re PRICE et al.

PRICE v. MURRAY.

(Civ. 2560.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 9, 1923.)

1. Infants ⚷84—Evidence held insufficient to warrant finding that guardian ad litem authorized employment of attorney.

In proceedings on an application for an award to attorneys for legal services performed for the estate of minors prior to the appointment of a general guardian, where such attorneys were employed by the mother of said minors, evidence held insufficient to warrant a finding that the guardian ad litem, himself a capable attorney, authorized the employment of other attorneys.

2. Infants ⚷84—No implied promise by guardian ad litem to pay for services of attorneys not employed by him.

The rule that services rendered to another with his consent and acquiescence without an understanding that they are gratuitous imply a promise to pay does not apply to the employment of attorneys by the mother of minors to represent them in a suit in which a guardian ad litem has been appointed, and the evidence without conflict shows that, so far as the estate of the minors was concerned, the understanding was that the services were to be rendered gratuitously.

3. Guardian and ward ⚷49—Guardian ad litem in sole charge of litigation and contracts by mother for legal services not binding on estate.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 372, providing that an infant must appear either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court in which the action is pending, the mother of the minors is without authority to make their estate liable for the payment of the fees of attorneys employed by her; the sole power to represent the minors being committed into the hands of the guardian ad litem.

4. Guardian and ward ⚷49—Estate not chargeable for additional counsel employed by mother not shown to be necessary.

Where the guardian ad litem appointed for minors was an eminent attorney, he could not render the estate liable for the fees of other attorneys, and hence the estate was not liable for the services of such attorneys employed by the mother of the minors in the absence of a showing that such expenditure was reasonable and necessary; the equitable rule as to the allowance of all reasonable and proper expenditures where the minors' father is dead and the mother has their custody having no application in view of the appointment of a guardian ad litem, and there having been no order of court permitting such expense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; C. E. Beaumont, Judge.

Application by Stanley Murray against John L. Price, as guardian of the person and estate of Louis E. Price and another, minors, for an allowance of attorney fees. From an order granting such allowance, the guardian appeals. Reversed.

Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for appellant.

Mason A. Bailey, of Madera, and W. C. Ring, of Madera, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. John L. Price having been appointed general guardian of the person and estate of said minors, respondent made an application to the court in said guardianship matter for an allowance of three thousand dollars for services performed for said minors before the appointment of said general guardian in an action brought in the superior court to quiet title to certain real estate in the county of Madera. The application was opposed by said general guardian, and, after a full hearing, the court made an order that "Stanley Murray, Esq., and W. C. Ring, Esq., do have and recover of and from J. L. Price, general guardian of Louis E. Price and Harold C. Price, minors, the sum of seven hundred and fifty (750) dollars," from which order the appeal has been taken by the general guardian. From the findings of the court we glean the following:

"III. That on or about the 7th day of September, 1919, Bessie Price, the mother of said defendants, and the person having the sole custody of them, employed said firm of Murray & Ring to appear in behalf of said defendants in said action as their attorneys; that the amount of compensation for their services was not agreed upon or determined at that time, but it was then and there understood and agreed between said attorneys and said Bessie Price that said attorneys would be compensated for their services from the estate of said minors.

"IV. That thereafter, and on or about the 13th day of September, 1919, said M. B. Harris, guardian ad litem of said defendants, authorized said Murray & Ring to appear in his behalf as such guardian ad litem in said action and in behalf of said defendants, and it was then and there understood and agreed by and between said guardian ad litem and said attorneys that they would be compensated for their service from the estate of said minors."

Said attorneys performed practically all the work in behalf of said minors that said action entailed and were successful in their efforts.

"Said minor defendants were financially unable to and did not meet any of the necessary expenditures and disbursements in said action, and said attorneys made all of such expenditures and disbursements necessary therefor. * * * That at the time said Bessie Price requested said Stanley Murray and W. C. Ring, Jr., to represent said defendants in said action, Stanley Murray knew that a guardian ad litem, to wit, M. B. Harris, had been appointed by order of the said superior court to represent said minors, and that said M. B. Harris was an attorney of the court appointing him, and was well qualified in point of learning to fully represent said minors in the said action."

We have sought in vain in the record to find any substantial evidence to support the finding that said attorneys were employed by the guardian ad litem to represent the minors in the litigation. M. B. Harris testified directly to the contrary, and his testimony was not contradicted in any respect.

As to what occurred when Mr. Ring consulted with him, in answer to questions by Mr. Ring he testified as follows:

"Mr. Harris, do you recall when I came down to Fresno with the answer and cross-complaint that were first filed in the case and showed them to you, and I don't know whether you remember that particularly or not, but I will refresh your memory with it. A. Well, I wouldn't want to be positive, Mr. Ring. I remember your coming there with an answer, pleading in the matter. Q. Do you recall that I came down there one afternoon about the 15th or 16th day of September, 1919, and told you that I was W. C. Ring, Jr.? I don't think we had ever met before, and Mr. Murray and I had been retained by Mrs. Bessie Price to represent the children in the case, and we had prepared an answer and cross-complaint to be filed and asked you if you would verify it as guardian ad litem? A. I remember something of that kind, yes. Q. Do you remember saying at that time, 'Well, I am very busy and it is growing late in the afternoon'—I think it was perhaps 4 or 4:30 then—'and I won't have time to look it over to-day, but, if you will leave it I will look it over, and if it is all right I will verify it and send it to the court or send it back to you.' Do you remember some such conversation as that? A. I think that probably happened, if you remember it. I don't recollect it exactly that way, but I know you brought papers for me to verify. Q. Well, I said, 'Mr. Harris, the time will be up to-morrow, or very shortly, and it will be necessary for this to be filed, if it is going to be filed in time, right away, and if you haven't time to give it attention now, we can verify it, either Mr. Murray or I, since you are out of the county where the action is pending anyhow'? A. I recall the fact that you were willing to have the verification made here. I recall that. Q. And do you remember of making any objection to that at that time? A. No, I didn't object to it. Q. In fact, Mr. Harris, the only point that you wanted clear between Mr. Murray and myself during the whole course of the proceedings was that you, personally, were not going to be liable for any attorney's fees for the work? A. Mr. Ring, I wouldn't put it that way, and in fact, I didn't put it that way in my correspondence. I felt I had no right to incumber the estate with an obligation that I had been appointed to perform and I undertook to make that clear. Mr. Ring: Q. In any way that it would be an assistance to us as attorneys in the case, you were willing for us to sign our names as guardian ad litem too? A. I think I stated it to you and in a letter, so as to be absolutely certain that while I was glad that you should act, yet it must be with your knowledge it wasn't by my employment, and further, where assistance was offered to the minors, I had no right to refuse it, but it wasn't by my employment as guardian of the estate or otherwise."

There was also some correspondence between Mr. Ring and Senator Harris, of which we may refer to the concluding part of a letter written by the former to the latter on October 21st, as follows:

"However, we do not care to stand on the fence between your failure to actually and irrevocably either consent or refuse to consent to our further participation in the case.

"We would therefore thank you to come out and say one way or the other your desires in the matter, although, of course, we understand that you consented to our going ahead. We do not expect to look to you for any compensation for our services, but do feel that we should know exactly where we are in the matter in your regard."

Two days later Mr. Harris replied as follows:

"The letter to which you refer as not having been answered by me was received. There did not seem to be any occasion for a reply. I had already stated to you fully my position in the matter. I had not employed you and feel fully competent personally to take care of the interests of my wards. You had been employed by the mother of my wards and under that employment had obtained my consent to appear for me. A controversy having arisen between you and your employer, you desired me to give you authority to continue in this case. I did not feel that I could be a party to the controversy and told you that you had my permission to continue to act as attorneys of record for me, but that I had not employed you, and would not be responsible to you in any way for your fees. That if you chose to continue in the case with that understanding, it was satisfactory to me that you should do so.

"I do not know how I could have made my position any plainer, and I do not know how I could consistently take any other position. It is my duty to protect my wards, and I have no right to refuse any assistance that may be offered."

Mr. Harris testified further:

"The letters state pretty thoroughly the transactions between Murray & Ring and myself as guardian ad litem. In addition to the letters there were one or two conversations with Mr. Ring. I don't recollect ever having any conversation with Judge Murray, but with Mr. Ring I made it quite clear as far as I was personally concerned I was ready to take care of the case for the minors as their guardian, but in view of the fact that the firm had been employed by the mother who wished a defense made by them also for the minors, that I would only consent and willingly consent that they should take part in the proceedings as they saw fit for the protection of the minors, but they must understand it was not at my employment or the employment of the estate, but at the employment of the mother. That conversation, I am quite clear, took place once and possibly oftener, and I made the same statement in open court at one time before the court."

It is not claimed that the witness was not entitled to full credit. Assuredly, there is nothing inherently improbable in his testimony, nor is there a single circumstance revealed that would discredit it in the least. Moreover, the witness is a man of superior attainments, and he expressed himself so clearly that there can hardly be any room for misunderstanding as to his meaning. We may remark that a significant and corroborative circumstance is found in the fact that Mr. Ring did not take the stand to contradict the statements of the witness. If his recollection of the interview had been different, he would, of course, have felt constrained to so inform the court.

[1] As we read and construe the record, we can reach only the conclusion that said finding is entirely unsupported. If we concede, therefore, that the guardian ad litem had authority to employ other attorneys to represent the minors in the litigation and thereby to bind their estate for the value of such services, we can find in the evidence no sufficient basis for this theory.

[2] We do not overlook the contention of respondent:

> "That the mother of the minors employed him to defend her children's interests, and the guardian ad litem authorized the appearance and the performance of the services under circumstances from which law and equity imply a promise and obligation to pay. Because, when services are rendered to another with his consent and acquiescence without an understanding that they were to be rendered gratuitously, a promise to pay therefor is implied. Lacy Mfg. Co. v. L. A. Gas Co., 12 Cal. App. 37, 106 Pac. 413; Batcheller v. Whittier, 12 Cal. App. 262, 107 Pac. 141; 40 Cyc. pp. 2808, 2809."

But the doctrine has no application for the reason, already stated, that the evidence shows without conflict that there was an understanding that, as far as the estate of the minors is concerned, the services were to be rendered gratuitously.

The question remains whether the other finding as to the employment by the mother is a sufficient support for the judgment.

As to the fact of employment Judge Murray testified:

> "Bessie Price came to me and said, 'Suit has been brought by the Prices against—filed in this court,' and she was rather indignant on the ground that she had not been, they had not asked her to become the guardian, and seemed to be a family feeling there, and she said 'that inasmuch as we had been school mates and she had known me all my life that she wanted to intrust her case to my care,' and I thereupon took the papers up to my office, and she at that time cautioned me. She said she was in fear of Mr. Price and didn't want him to know what she was doing, so I took the papers up to the office and consulted my associate at that time, Mr. Will C. Ring, and after going into the matter we proceeded to defend the action."

The witness further testified that thereafter she told him that—

> "Mr. Price had been after her so strenuously to drop the suit and making threats she decided it might be better to drop it and send the bill, and I sent her a bill, and upon receipt of it she came back to the office, and she said in view of his actions she wanted us to continue with the case and under no circumstances to drop it; that she wished me to continue with the case and protect the interests of her two children."

[3] From the foregoing it may be doubted whether the court could rationally conclude that the parties agreed or understood that the estate of the minors was to be charged with the value of said services, but be that as it may, the mother had no authority by such contract to make said estate liable. She was not the agent of the minors in reference to said litigation. The sole power to represent the minors was committed into the hands of the guardian ad litem. Section 372 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the infant "must appear either by his general guardian or by a guardian ad litem appointed by the court in which the action is pending."

Even if there be a general guardian, the court may, if deemed advisable, appoint a guardian ad litem "to represent the infant in the action or proceeding." Herein there was no general guardian, and there is no possible basis for the claim that the one appointed by the court for that very purpose under the sections of the Code was not clothed with exclusive power to direct, manage, and control the suit in behalf of said minors. He would be subject to the supervisory authority of the court, but subject to that limitation he is the sole representative of the minors, and no one can divide or diminish his prerogative. In 22 Cyc. 661, it is said:

> "His powers are strictly limited to matters connected with the suit in which he is appointed, and his acts with respect to the infant's rights concerning any other matters are unauthorized; but he is a full representative of the rights and interests of the infant for the particular case in which he is appointed, and is clothed with as full and perfect authority for that suit as the general guardian is for all the duties incident to his office."

On the following page the statement is:

> "The duty of a guardian ad litem or next friend is to look after the infant's interest and to act for him in all matters relating to the suit as he might act for himself if he were of capacity to do so."

In other words, the authority of the guardian ad litem in relation to the suit is equal to what would be the authority of the ward if he were an adult. Manifestly this would be inconsistant with the authority of any other person to employ counsel for the minor in such litigation.

In Cole v. Superior Court, 63 Cal. 86, 49 Am. Rep. 78, it is declared:

> "The court is, in effect, the guardian—the person named as guardian ad litem being but the agent to whom the court, in appointing him (thus exercising the power of the sovereign state as parens patriæ) has delegated the execution of the trust, and through such agent the court performs its duty of protecting the rights of the infant or incompetent person."

In Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. on page 593, 2 Pac. on page 459, we find this:

> "There is no change of parties by the appointment of the guardian ad litem. The guardian does not become a party. The infant is the party, and he only appears by the guardian. The latter is appointed to appear for the infant, and to manage and take care of the suit for such infant when he is plaintiff and to appear, manage and take care of the defense for the infant when he is defendant. In case of an infant defendant, the answer is put in by the guardian for the infant. The guardian has authority to appoint an attorney to put in such answer, but the attorney so appointed is the attorney of the guardian and not of the infant."

[4] But herein the guardian ad litem was and is an eminent attorney, capable of attending to the litigation, and the evidence shows that there was no need for assistance. Under such circumstances, even if the employment had been made by the guardian, the court would not have been justified in charging the estate of the minors with the additional cost. The guardian could not thus shift to other persons the responsibility imposed upon him personally by his appointment. At any rate, if he employed an attorney he would be primarily liable, and if he paid for the services, it could be allowed against the estate of his ward only in case the evidence showed the expenditure to be reasonable and necessary. Hunt v. Maldonado, 89 Cal. 636, 27 Pac. 56; McKee v. Hunt, 142 Cal. 526, 77 Pac. 1103. Indeed, the rule in this state seems to be that before employing an attorney, if he expects to charge the estate with the cost, he must obtain an order of the court permitting such expense. In Morse v. Hinckley, 124 Cal. 154, 56 Pac. 896, it is said:

> "If a guardian cannot enter into a valid contract, without first obtaining an order of the probate court, for repairs and improvements of buildings on property belonging to the ward, surely a guardian without such authority cannot enter into a contract for the employment of legal services so as to bind the ward, or in any way affect his property."

In support of the allowance of the claim by reason of the employment by the mother, respondent asserts:

> "Courts of chancery from the beginning have been clothed with jurisdiction over infants and their estates to enforce and secure their protection, maintenance and education. For this purpose and to this end all reasonable and proper expenditures may be made from the minor's estate. This is always true when the minor's father is dead and it is in the custody of its mother 'without reference to her own ability to support and educate them, and such allowance may be made not only to provide for the future, but also to reimburse her for past expenditures.'"

Many authorities are cited to vindicate the foregoing statement, among them In re Beisel, 110 Cal. 267, 40 Pac. 961, 42 Pac. 819, and no fault can be found with this general view of the relation of the parents to their children; but it has no application to this particular case, which is controlled by the express provisions of the statute.

The equitable principle thus invoked by respondent is indeed aptly illustrated in the Beisel Case wherein, according to the syllabus, it was held:

> "Where the mother of minor children has acted in good faith for their benefit without letters of guardianship, she is chargeable in equity as a quasi guardian, or trustee of their estates, and an accounting and settlement of such trust after the issuance of letters of guardianship, is in the nature of an accounting in equity to be determined upon equitable principles; and the court has jurisdiction in such accounting to allow reasonable and proper credits to her for maintenance of the minor children, and for expenditures incurred on their account prior to the letters of guardianship."

But, as stated before, herein the situation called for a special service for the minors, and the law required the court to impose that duty upon a special agent, and the court acted in accordance wtih such mandate of the law, leaving no room for the exercise of such equitable principle. If the guardian ad litem had declined or omitted to represent the minors and the mother in order to protect their interests had employed an attorney a different situation might be presented. In such case it would be at least just to allow the attorney employed by the mother the compensation that would otherwise go to the guardian.

We are reluctant to reverse the order since the estate had the benefit of the services, but we see no other alternative. Indeed, nearly all the work required to suitably represent the minors was performed by respondent and his associate. They relieved the guardian ad litem to a great extent, but it would be subversive, we think, of the principles that prevail in guardianship matters, to allow this charge against the estate of the minors.

Some other questions are discussed, but we deem it unnecessary to consider them.

The order is reversed.

KANSABURO OHSAKI et al. v. AHERN. (Civ. 4516.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1923.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⟹180(1)—Complaint in action for lessor's breach of lease held to state cause of action.

In an action by tenants against lessor for damages, a complaint, which alleged that after advance payment of rent and expenditures they were notified by both the landlord and another that such other had acquired title and that the tenancy could only continue with his consent, which consent he withheld, and that plaintiffs had performed of all covenants, stated a cause of action.

2. Landlord and tenant ⟹174—One holding property under contract from one who has no title may yield it to true owner without legal proceedings and without losing his right to damages.

One who has gone into possession of property under a lease contract from person who has no title thereto, or who has subsequently lost the same, may yield it to the true owner without waiting for the latter to take it forcibly or by legal proceedings, and by such yielding he is not precluded from recovering damages of his original lessor.

3. Landlord and tenant ⟹63(2)—Tenant's complaint alleging breach of leased contract and seeking damages held not to deny landlord's title.

The complaints in an action by tenants for the breach of a lease contract, which alleged that after they went into possession they were dispossessed by a failure or alienation of their landlord's title, held not to amount to a denial of such landlord's title; the action being not a possessory action, but one for damages.

4. Pleading ⟹67, 192(2)—Complaint need not anticipate defense; ambiguity or uncertainty in allegations anticipating defense not ground of demurrer.

Plaintiffs were not required to make allegations to meet or cut off a defense, and if, in so doing, they were ambiguous and uncertain in their recitals, objection thereto could not be raised by general demurrer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Kansaburo Ohsaki and others against W. J. Ahern. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Algernon Crofton, of San Francisco, and Chas. A. Wetmore, Jr., of Marysville, for appellants.

Hoefler, Cook & Snyder and E. E. Hull, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. Action for damages for breach of contract in relation to real property.

A demurrer to the amended complaint was sustained, and upon refusal of plaintiffs to further amend the action was dismissed. This is an appeal from such judgment.

[1] It appears from the amended complaint that on November 16, 1920, the defendant leased to plaintiffs a certain tract of land in Sutter county containing some 136 acres, more or less, for the cropping seasons of 1921, 1922, and 1923. Plaintiffs, in accordance with the terms of the lease and at the time of the execution thereof, paid to the defendant the sum of $6,000 in advance as rental. Previous to this transaction the lessor, Ahern, had borrowed from one Huston the sum of $2,800, and as security for the payment thereof had conveyed to Huston by deed of trust the tract of land in question. This loan matured on January 1, 1921, and not having been paid the land was sold to Huston on May 1, 1921, under the trust deed, and title vested in him. Shortly thereafter on May 7, 1921, the defendant Ahern notified plaintiffs that Huston was the lawful owner of the land and that the continuance of the lease depended upon his consent. On May 14, 1921, plaintiffs were notified by Huston that he was such owner, and that he would not recognize or continue the lease given to them by defendant, and demanded of them that they surrender to him possession of the land forthwith. Plaintiffs complied with this demand. The complaint contains further allegations to the effect that by reason of these facts plaintiffs were denied possession and quiet enjoyment under the lease, notwithstanding that they had performed all the terms and covenants thereof required by them to be performed; and in support of their claim for damages it is alleged that between the time the lease was entered into and the 1st day of May, 1921, plaintiffs, in accordance with and relying upon the terms of the lease, expended in the tilling and cultivation of the land the sum of $2,850. Judgment was accordingly prayed for the sum of $8,850, which sum consists of the advance rental of $6,000, together with the amount expended in the cultivation of the land.

The demurrer to this complaint was sustained upon the ground that it failed to state a cause of action.

Respondent assigns several reasons in support of the order sustaining the demurrer.

It is first claimed that it was the duty of plaintiffs to require proof of the claimant of his paramount title before voluntarily surrendering possession to him; and that as the complaint fails to show such facts or that Huston held or possessed such title it is defective for this reason. It is further claimed that the pleading is likewise defective in failing to allege consent on the part of the defendant to plaintiffs' surrender, and in the omission of any allegation to the effect that plaintiffs had notified defendant of Huston's claim of paramount title, which, it is claimed, was necessary in order that defendant might have had an opportunity to defend his own title.

[2] These contentions are wholly without merit. The complaint as above indicated recites in what manner Huston acquired title, and it further recites that plaintiffs were notified both by Huston and defendant himself that Huston was the lawful owner. Other allegations upon the subject charge that defendant informed plaintiffs that the continuance of the lease depended upon Huston's consent, and that further recognition of plaintiffs' tenancy was refused by Huston. No question of lack of notice to defendant in order to enable him to resist Huston's claim of paramount title can therefore in any manner be involved, as notice would have been a useless and idle act. Under such circumstances, one who has received possession of property under a contract from a person who has no title, or who has subsequently lost the same, may yield it to the true owner without waiting for the latter to take it forcibly or by legal proceedings. Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 113 Cal. 345, 354, 45 Pac. 680.

[3] Respondent's further contention that the facts pleaded amount to a denial by plaintiffs of their landlord's title is equally without merit. This is not a possessory action, but one for damages for breach of the terms of a lease. Defendant, according to the recitals in the complaint, denied further title in himself and admitted it to be in Huston. Yielding title to a claimant under such circumstances does not amount to a denial of title. Jeffers v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., supra.

[4] Something is said of the complaint being ambiguous. Plaintiffs were not required in stating their cause of action to incorporate allegations in their complaint for the purpose of meeting or cutting off a defense. If in so doing they were ambiguous or uncertain in the recital of their allegations, this objection could not be raised by a general demurrer. Munson v. Bowen, 80 Cal. 572, 22 Pac. 253.

We do not deem further discussion of the case necessary. To recapitulate, the complaint alleges a right of possession in plaintiffs which carries with it a covenant of quiet enjoyment. Civ. Code, § 1927. It further alleges full performance on the part of plaintiffs of all the covenants required of them to be performed under the lease, the breach of defendant, and the damage caused thereby. These allegations we deem sufficient.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

CARROLL v. LATHAM et al. (Civ. 4030.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 20, 1923.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⚷86(1) — Evidence held to support finding lessees had not exercised option to extend term of lease.

A finding that lessees had not exercised their option to extend the term of their lease before they were evicted held supported by evidence notwithstanding its complication with evidence relating to request by lessees for leave to assign lease.

2. Appeal and error ⚷1071(5)—That finding was not supported by evidence held immaterial where finding was not responsive to issues.

Whether a finding is supported by evidence is immaterial where the finding is not responsive to any issue framed by the pleadings.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; R. D. McPherrin, Judge pro tem.

Action by C. N. Carroll against Arch Latham and others, in which action one of the defendants interposed a cross-complaint against plaintiff. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants and cross-complainant appeal. Affirmed.

E. R. Simon, of El Centro (H. A. Wolford, of Hillsboro, N. M., of counsel), for appellants.

Kimpton Ellis, of Los Angeles, Dorsey Whitelaw, of El Centro, and Walter J. Desmond, and Charles La V. Larzelere, both of Long Beach, for respondent.

WORKS, J. Plaintiff, as lessor, entered into an agreement of lease with certain of defendants, whereby the latter acquired a leasehold term in certain lands. The lease granted to the lessees an option to extend the term for an added period of two years. The original term having expired plaintiff evicted the lessees from the demised premises, and commenced this action for damages because of the alleged breach of certain covenants of the lease. One of the defendants interposed a cross-complaint against plaintiff upon a certain alleged claim. Plaintiff had judgment upon the issues framed under both the complaint and the cross-complaint, and the defendants and the cross-complainant appeal.

[1] It is contended by appellants that the lessees had exercised their option to extend the term of the lease, before they were evicted from the demised property, and they insist that the findings to a contrary effect which were made by the trial court were not supported by the evidence. There is no question under the evidence that the lessees, some months before the expiration of the original term, requested leave to assign the lease for both the remainder of the term and for a period beyond that term, as to which period they indicated a desire for an extension on behalf of their proposed assignees. Further, there is no doubt that the request for leave to assign was refused by respondent. The evidence on the question whether the lessees exercised their option to extend the term on their own behalf, as contemplated by the covenants of the lease, is complicated by its intermixture with the evidence relating to the request for leave to assign. The confusion resulting from this complication is plainly evident in the testimony of respondent, but we think that his testimony, as set forth in the brief of appellants, alone was sufficient to support a finding that the option was not exercised, and this notwithstanding the confusion mentioned. Before we quote from respondent's testimony it is to be noted that the Johnson and Coberly mentioned by him were the agents of the lessees, who acted for them in conveying the alleged notice that they were exercising the option to extend. Parts of the testimony of respondent, with our italics, follow:

> "Q. Did Mr. Johnson ask you to extend the lease? A. Yes, sir. Q. To extend it? A. No, sir; not to extend it. He didn't. He asked me to transfer the lease. Q. Did any one at any time ask you to extend this lease for a period of two years after its expiration? A. I don't think they did. Q. After September, 1919 [when the original term ended]? A. No, sir; I don't think so. * * * In that conversation something came up about an extension, but I always told them I wouldn't extend the lease, that I wouldn't transfer it. * * * Q. You say Mr. Johnson asked you to consent to the assignment of this lease to N. R. Vail? A. He asked me to do it; well, yes; he did. Q. Didn't he at that time tell you that [the lessees] had elected to extend the lease for the two years' period? A. No, sir. * * * He might have asked me about it, but I refused anything in regard to transferring the lease or in regard to the two years' extension. * * * Q. If you refused to extend the lease, isn't it a fact that Johnson and Coberly did talk to you about extending the lease? A. Of course, they talked to me about it. Yes, sir; but I didn't consent to it. Q. Didn't Mr. Johnson tell you [the lessees] had elected to extend the lease for two years and were claiming that they had a lease for two years additional? A. Oh, yes; they claimed that they had got the lease and they would hold it for two years longer. Q. What they asked you to do was to assign not only the lease for the balance of the first year, but for the balance of the first year and two more years? A. Yes, sir; and I refused. Q. And Mr. Coberly also told you, did he not, he talked to you about [the lessees] wanting to extend this lease for two years, didn't he? A. Yes, sir; but my contract said that they could not sublease it and I refused. Q. Mr. Coberly requested you to consent to the assignment for the balance of the first two years and to assign this lease for two years additional? A. Yes, sir; he asked me to, but I refused to do it."

The disputed findings were supported by the evidence.

[2] Appellants make several other points, but, with the exception of one, they are all met by the conclusion which we have reached upon the question of which we have just made disposition. That excepted one requires a special treatment. The complaint was principally based upon a provision of the lease to the effect that the lessees agree "to return the farm at the expiration of this lease * * * in first-class condition, particularly as to a full stand of alfalfa being seeded and growing in order that no lapsed time will ensue at the expiration of this lease." We say that the complaint was principally so based because there are in it allegations upon a claim for damages for lost farm machinery. The allegations of the complaint upon what may be termed its main feature, then, were as follows, making due ellipsis:

> "That under and by the terms of the said lease [the lessees] agreed to return the said farm premises at the expiration of said lease * * * in first-class condition, particularly as to a full stand of alfalfa being seeded and growing in order that no lapse of time would ensue at the expiration of said lease; that said [lessees] failed and neglected, on or at the expiration of said lease, or at all, to return the said farm * * * in first-class condition, and failed to have a full, or any stand of alfalfa seeded or growing thereon, but on the contrary left the said property in a badly damaged condition, to wit."

The complaint then sets forth specifically the particulars in which the "badly damaged condition" consisted. All these allegations are put in issue directly by specific denials contained in each of the two answers by which the various defendants responded to the allegations of the complaint. No exception is taken by appellants to any finding which the trial court may have made upon the issues thus presented, but they do complain that the evidence does not support a finding to the effect that it is not true that at the time of the expiration of the original term under the lease "the said defendants, or any of them had kept the letter and spirit of said lease." This finding, so far as we can discover, is not responsive to any issue framed by the pleadings. It certainly does not meet the issue which we have just outlined, that being the only issue as to which the finding could apply even remotely. It is therefore immaterial whether the finding is supported by any evidence.

Judgment affirmed.

HAY v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 4272.)

Constitutional law 🔑205(3)—Jury 🔑39—Statute exempting honorary members of company, troop, or division of designated state militia organization held invalid.

Pol. Code, § 2102, seeking to extend to "not to exceed twenty honorary members" of a company, troop, or battery, the privilege of exemption from jury duty as provided in section 2098, and even exemption from service on any posse comitatus, on the mere payment of $50 into the civil fund of such company, troop, or battery of certain designated state military organization, is invalid as violating Const. art. 1, §§ 11, 21, by granting an immunity which is denied to other citizens who, upon the same terms, might be willing to purchase exemption from the same inconveniences.

Original petition for writ of mandate by W. H. Hay against the Superior Court in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Hon. Russ Avery, as Judge. Writ denied.

Farrand & Slosson and Henry C. Huntington, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., Wm. J. Clark, Deputy Dist. Atty., and James P. Costello, Deputy Dist. Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Application for writ of mandate to require respondents to excuse petitioner from service as a grand juror.

Petitioner claims exemption as an honorary member of an infantry company of the state militia, in accordance with the provisions of sections 2102 and 2098 of the Political Code.

In the state of Michigan it has been held that an exemption of this character is not unconstitutional and is not class legislation. Hall v. Burlingame, 88 Mich. 438, 50 N. W. 289. For note referring to other cases on the subject see 5 A. & E. Ann. Cas. 783. The case which seems nearest to denial of the right to create this privilege is Neely v. State, 4 Lea (Tenn.) 316.

A clear statement of the distinction between an exemption based upon some kind of service and an exemption purchased with money is found in the brief for appellant in Albert v. White, 33 Md. 300.

In Stewart v. State, 23 Ga. 181, it is said that "the actual service rendered, and skill acquired by the regular members, is the foundation of the exemption from road, patrol, and jury duties." This referred to members of a voluntary military company.

In McGunnegle v. State, 6 Mo. 367, the exemption was based upon actual membership in a fire company, and was sustained as based upon a reasonable distribution of the duties of citizenship.

In Hamann v. Heekin, 88 Ohio St. 207, 102 N. E. 730, reported in Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1058, the Supreme Court of Ohio declared void a statute exempting contributing members of National Guard companies from jury duty. But the decision was based upon the terms of the statute, which did not provide for such immunity upon equal conditions, either as to military service or as to amount of money to be contributed. It is not made entirely certain whether the court would have followed Hall v. Burlingame, the Michigan Case, supra, if the conditions had been the same; although that case is referred to in the opinion.

Sections 11 and 21 of article 1 of the Constitution of California provide as follows:

> "Sec. 11. All laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation."
> "Sec. 21. No special privileges or immunities shall ever be granted which may not be altered, revoked, or repealed by the Legislature, nor shall any citizen, or class of citizens, be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens."

In Ex parte Jackson, 143 Cal. 564, 573, 77 Pac. 457, 461, the Supreme Court was considering the validity of a license ordinance which, among other things, forbade the carrying on of a livery or feed stable in the city of Whittier without first having procured a license so to do. Having first stated that the ordinance failed to suggest any exercise of police power, and that its sole object in that regard was to impose a license tax for revenue only, the court stated that the section of the Constitution which provides that no citizen, or class of citizens, shall be granted privileges or immunities which, upon the same terms, shall not be granted to all citizens, was not applicable to the case. The court said:

> "It is enough to satisfy the provisions of section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution that any citizen of the state or the United States may engage in the specified business in the city of Whittier upon the same terms as any other citizen may engage in such business therein."

It is left open to inference that if the ordinance had attempted to require the payment of a license fee by some citizens engaged in that business in the city, and had exempted others, the ordinance would have been obnoxious to the provisions of said section.

In the case of In re Sumida, 177 Cal. 388, 170 Pac. 823, the court had under consideration an ordinance to which objection was made that it was in conflict with certain provisions of the Constitution, including section 21 of article 1. The court said:

> "From necessity it has been held that the Legislature may classify in order that it may adapt its legislation to the needs of the people. If this cannot be done, laws will not always bear equally upon the people. This classification, however, must be founded upon differences which are either defined by the Constitution or natural, and which will suggest a reason which might rationally be held to justify the diversity in the legislation. It must not be arbitrary, for the mere purpose of classification that legislation really local or special may seem to be general, but for the purpose of meeting different conditions naturally requiring different legislation."
> "A law is general and uniform in its operation when it applies equally to all persons embraced within the class to which it is addressed, provided such class is made upon some natural, intrinsic or constitutional distinction between the persons composing it and others not embraced in it. * * * The difference on which the classification is based must be such as, in some reasonable degree, will account for or justify the peculiar legislation."

In the case of In re Blois, 179 Cal. 291, 295, 176 Pac. 449, 450, referring to said section 21 of article 1, the court said:

> "This latter section of the Constitution has been given direct application to statutes and ordinances which have been enacted and sought to be enforced either by the state or by political subdivisions thereof, and in which attempts have been made to discriminate in favor of or against particular persons or classes of persons as to whom no reasonable basis of discrimination can be seen to exist; and in all such cases the courts of this state have uniformly held such attempted legislation to be void"—citing cases.

Applying the principle thus stated, the court in that case held void an ordinance of the city of Palo Alto providing for the inspection of laundries which solicited laundry work in the city, and requiring a larger inspection fee for laundries located outside the city limits than for laundries located within the city limits. It was held that the ordinance was discriminatory and therefore invalid under the Constitution.

In Mordecai v. Board of Supervisors, 183 Cal. 434, 192 Pac. 40, was pointed out that the provision of the Constitution for uniformity of operation of legislation (section 11, art. 1) is closely connected with the further provision expressly prohibiting the granting of special privileges or immunities, and the court again reiterated the statement of the decisions that—

> "While the requirement that a general law must have a uniform application does not mean that it must have a universal operation, and it is valid if it applies alike to all persons or objects within a class—or, what is the same thing, there is excepted from its operation a class—founded upon some 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' yet if the statute operates only upon a class, or there is excepted from its operation a class, not founded upon a 'natural, intrinsic, or constitutional distinction,' its operation is not uniform, and it is discriminatory legislation of the sort which the Constitution purposed to prohibit and is invalid."

It is plain that the provisions of section 2102 of the Political Code endeavor to extend to "not to exceed twenty honorary members" the privilege of exemption from jury duty, and even exemption from service on any posse comitatus (a service peculiarly appropriate to citizens on occasions of public disorder and danger), on the mere payment of $50 into the civil fund of a company, troop, or division of certain designated military organizations of the state. We are of the opinion that such a statute, if held valid, will create a privileged class whose exemption is purchased solely with money and is not earned by any other kind of service to the state or to the public. For be it noted that said section 2102 specifically provides that such "honorary" members "shall not be required to drill or perform any military duty by reason of such membership." They would thus be given, contrary to the provisions of said section 21 of article 1 of the Constitution, an immunity which is denied to other citizens who upon the same terms might be willing to purchase exemption from the same inconveniences.

The alternative writ of mandate heretofore issued is discharged, and the application for a peremptory writ is denied.

PEOPLE v. MOROTTI. (Cr. 1097.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 17, 1923.)

1. Infants 🔑20—Evidence of contributing to delinquency held sufficient.

Evidence on prosecution for contributing to the delinquency of a female child by acts tending to cause her to lead an idle, dissolute, and immoral life, held sufficient to support a conviction notwithstanding inherent improbabilities in testimony which might affect its weight.

2. Criminal law 🔑415(1)—Complaint of victim of lust to be admissible to be made voluntarily and soon.

That a complaint by the victim of the lust of another may be admissible on prosecution of the other, it should have been made voluntarily and soon after commission of the outrage.

3. Witnesses 🔑390—Writing signed by others held inadmissible to impeach witness.

A writing signed by O. and B., stating what F., a female child, told them that M. did to her, held inadmissible on prosecution of M. for contributing to the delinquency of F., to impeach F., who had surprised the prosecution by denials of the commission by M. of the acts charged; the testimony of O. showing that F. made no such statement to him or in his presence, and the writing being doubly hearsay, so far as O. undertook to state therein what F. said to B. out of O.'s presence.

4. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Erroneous admission of testimony held prejudicial.

Erroneous admission, on prosecution for contributing to delinquency of a female child, of what she had told others, contradictory of her testimony denying the commission by defendant of the charged acts, held clearly prejudicial, and so ground for reversal, notwithstanding Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edward I. Butler, Judge.

Giuseppe Morotti was convicted of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, and appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Martinelli and Jordan L. Martinelli, both of San Rafael, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

RICHARDS, J. The defendant was charged with and convicted of the offense of contributing to the delinquency of a minor, the charging part of the information consisting in the averment that the said defendant did, on or about the 20th day of January, 1922, at and in the county of Marin, state of California, willfully, unlawfully, and lewdly commit certain specified lascivious acts of fondling and personal contact upon the person of one Florinda Berri, a female child of the age of nine years, which would tend to cause said child to lead an idle, dissolute, and immoral life. This appeal is from the judgment of conviction of this offense.

[1] The first contention of the appellant is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict or support the judgment. We find no merit in this contention. The prosecution produced the witness Agostini, who testified directly to the commission of the acts complained of by the defendant within the presence and observation of the said witness. It is true that the testimony of this witness is attended with certain inherent improbabilities which might be held to affect its weight, but which are not, in our opinion, sufficient to so far destroy its value as to render it insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jurymen if believed by them. The argument of the appellant as to the insufficiency or doubtful character of this testimony is more particularly directed to the appellant's second contention, which is that the trial court committed prejudicial error in the admission of certain other evidence offered by the prosecution in support of its case. The occasion for the offer of this evidence arose in this wise: The prosecution placed upon the witness stand the minor child, a girl of the age of nine years, upon whose person the lascivious acts charged against the defendant were alleged to have been committed. The child, when examined in chief as such witness, denied that the defendant had committed any of said acts upon her person and denied that she had ever been at the place with the defendant where the acts were alleged and testified to by the witness Agostini to have been committed. The prosecution, being surprised by her denials, undertook to cross-examine the witness and also undertook to lay the foundation for impeaching her testimony by questions having for their purpose the showing that she had made statements to certain other persons which were in contradiction of her testimony as given upon her examination in chief. The child was asked whether she had not had conversations with her aunt, Mrs. Bolla, and with a Mr. O'Connor, at the home of her said aunt in Gonzales, with relation to the conduct of the defendant toward her in her father's barn in Marin county a few weeks before. She admitted that she had had conversations with these two persons at the place indicated, and also admitted that in response to certain very general questions asked by them she had responded at first with denials, but had finally answered affirmatively to some of these questions; but she insisted that in so doing she was excited and hysterical and so pressed that she did not understand what she was saying, and that her affirmative responses given under these circumstances were untrue. After this vain attempt to procure from the child testimony which would sustain the charge against the defendant, the prosecution placed upon the witness stand Mr. O'Connor, who testified that he was the probation officer of the county of Marin, wherein the offense was charged to have been committed; that having learned of the statements which the witness Agostini had made, he sought to interview the child at the home of her parents in that county, but found that she had been sent to the home of her aunt, Mrs. Bolla, at Gonzales, in Monterey county. He accordingly went to Gonzales, and learning from the child's aunt that she was in school, drove over to the school and got the child. On the way back to the house of the aunt he undertook to interview the child as to the conduct of the defendant toward her, asking her some very general questions touching the acts of the latter, to which the child replied with denials or made no reply, but became nervous and hysterical. Upon reaching the house of the aunt he undertook to further question the child in her presence, but with no result except to render the child hysterical. He then suggested that the aunt should take the child into a room apart and question her at length and in detail as to the acts and conduct of the defendant toward her. The aunt and the child went into another room, away from the presence of the witness. In a few moments the aunt returned, saying, "The girl admits everything." The witness O'Connor then went into the room, where the child was lying on the bed, and testified that he said to the child, "Is this true that you told your aunt?" and the child said, "Yes." He then said:

> " 'Is it a fact that Morotti did those things to you in the barn?' she said, 'Yes.' 'Did he do it very often?' She said, 'He was after me all the time.' "

He then testified he went out of the presence of the child and into the adjoining room, where the aunt was, and there put in writing the following statement, which when written, was signed by the child's aunt and by himself. It reads as follows:

> "On April 5th at the home of Mrs. Elvezia Bolla, Gonzales, Florinda Berri stated that Joe Morotti, an employee on her father's ranch at Point Reyes, took her into the barn on many occasions and fooled with her private parts, and at one time in January, 1922, took off her pants, exposed his private parts, and placed his private parts between her legs; that she wants to stay with her aunt at Gonzales, being afraid to return to her father's home at Point Reyes because Morotti bothered her every time she went in the barn. Agostini saw them twice in the barn in January.
> "This statement was made to the probation officer of Marin county in the presence of her aunt Mrs. Bolla.
> "[Signed] Mrs. Elvezia Bolla.
> "Thos. O'Connor."

Prior to offering the foregoing evidence of O'Connor and before offering in evidence the above-quoted document, the prosecution had placed upon the witness stand Mrs. Elvezia Bolla, the child's aunt, and who had proved almost as reluctant and recalcitrant a witness as had the child herself. Mrs Bolla admitted that she had signed the writing above quoted, but she denied that the statements attributed therein to the child had been made to her by the child in anything like the detail in which they appeared in said writing or that the child had made or understood that she was making any such specific admissions as the writing contained. She asserted that she did not read over the writing before signing it and did not understand its contents and that in the main its specific statements as to what the child had said then were untrue. The prosecution, having examined these two witnesses in the manner and with the result above indicated, offered in evidence the foregoing written statement. It was objected to upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, immaterial, and hearsay, and that no proper foundation for its introduction had been laid. These objections were overruled by the trial court and the writing was admitted in evidence and read to the jury. The conviction of the defendant followed, and that his conviction was in a large measure due to the testimony of the witness O'Connor and to the specific statements contained in this writing we entertain little, if any, doubt. If the ruling of the trial court in admitting in evidence this writing was erroneous, the error was prejudicial in a high degree.

[2, 3] That this ruling of the trial court was erroneous seems to us to be manifest. Its admission was first sought to be justified upon the ground that it embodied a complaint which the alleged victim of the defendant's lascivious acts and conduct had made soon after the commission of said acts, but the difficulty with the respondent's contention in the case is that the undisputed evidence shows that the child made no such complaint; that whatever statement she made was not voluntary; and that whatever admission she may have made was forced by persistent questioning from her reluctant lips and was attended with almost immediate denials. As to the rule that a complaint on the part of the victim of the lust of another, when made voluntarily and soon after the commission of the outrage upon her feelings or person, is admissible in evidence in cases of this character, there can be no doubt. The admission of this writing cannot, however, be justified upon that ground, nor does the prosecution as the respondent herein seriously attempt so to do. The real and only defensible ground upon which the respondent stands in seeking to justify the admission in evidence of this document is that it was offered in contradiction and impeachment of the testimony of the child, who had surprised the prosecution by its denials of the commission by the defendant of the acts complained of. As to this ground it is to be noted that the record discloses that the writing was offered and admitted solely upon the ground that it impeached the testimony of the child. As such impeaching evidence there are two insuperable objections to its admission. The first is that in so far as it purported to be the statement of the witness O'Connor as to what the child had said to him, his own evidence shows conclusively that the child made no such statement to him or in his hearing; and the second is that in so far as the witness O'Connor undertook to state in said writing what the child had said to her aunt out of his presence it was doubly hearsay and hence inadmissible upon that ground. People v. Lambert, 120 Cal. 170, 52 Pac. 307. But it would also be inadmissible upon the further ground that there is not the slightest scintilla of evidence that the child ever made to her said aunt the statements which said writing details. The utmost that the record discloses is that in response to some very general questions which the aunt put to the child when alone with her the child responded chiefly with denials, with here and there a reluctant affirmation or admission which was almost immediately withdrawn. This writing, therefore, in so far as it purported to embody what the witness O'Connor himself heard the child say or admit, was itself contradictory of his own sworn testimony upon the subject and hence inadmissible either as embracing contradictory admissions of the child or as a memorandum made by him at the time and used to refresh his memory while a witness upon the stand.

[4] The claim of the respondent that this writing was admissible as evidence in contradiction of the testimony of Mrs. Bolla has a threefold answer, the first of which is that the writing was not offered or admitted for that purpose; the second is that Mrs. Bolla, when on the witness stand, admitted that she had signed the writing but denied that she knew its contents when she did so, and as to this there is no evidence in the record that the writing was ever read over to or by her; and the third reason is that the writing does not purport to contain any statement which the child ever made to her aunt while out of the presence of O'Connor, but only purports to embody statements made by the child to the probation officer O'Connor in the presence of the aunt; while the undisputed evidence shows that no such statement was ever made. This removes every ground upon which the admission in evidence of this writing is attempted to be justified. It was clearly inadmissible, and it is clearly prejudicial in the highest degree under the peculiar circumstances of this particular case. To a case of this character and to an erroneous ruling of this prejudicial nature the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the state Constitution can have no possible application.

The judgment is reversed.

6. Attorney and client ⇨49—Disbarment held not precluded because procedure to be followed not prescribed at time of declaring offenses constituting grounds for disbarment.

Though the court is not authorized to disbar or suspend an attorney, for the commission of acts not included in the statutes governing such proceedings, a disbarment for the violation of Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, is not precluded, because at the time of such misconduct the procedure in cases of violation of that act had not been provided for, since under section 187 suitable process or mode of proceeding might be adopted, and particularly where the acts committed were also a violation of section 287, subd. 2, which imposes no limitation on the power of the court to entertain a motion for removal or suspension.

7. Attorney and client ⇨52 — Constitutional law ⇨205(1)—Statutes ⇨79(2)—Statute authorizing verification of accusation by bar association on information and belief in disbarment proceeding held not invalid.

Code Civ. Proc. § 291, as amended by St. 1921, p. 100, § 3, authorizing the accusation in disbarment proceedings to be verified on information and belief when made by an organized bar association, is not special legislation in violation of Const. art. 1, § 21, or article 4, § 25, subd. 19.

8. Constitutional law ⇨70(3) — Legislature judge of necessity of creating particular classes and legislation with reference thereto.

The creation of a particular class and legislation with reference thereto is peculiarly within the province of the Legislature and it is only where there is not sufficient reason for making distinction in class that the court is warranted in adjudging such an act void as special legislation.

9. Attorney and client ⇨52 — Permitting of amendment of accusation in disbarment proceedings coincident with entry of judgment held not error.

Permitting an amendment to the accusation in disbarment proceedings after the case had been tried and coincident with entry of judgment held not error.

10. Depositions ⇨5—Disbarment proceeding held special in nature, and not criminal as relating to taking of depositions.

Disbarment proceedings held not criminal, but special in nature, and within Code Civ. Proc. § 2021, relating to taking of depositions.

11. Attorney and client ⇨57—Where judgment of disbarment sustained by evidence, appellate court will not interfere.

Where the evidence in disbarment proceedings, though conflicting, is sufficient to sustain the judgment, the appellate court will not interfere.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Disbarment proceedings by the Lawyers' Institute of San Diego against A. J. Morganstern. From an order directing disbarment, respondent appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Schoonover and Sweet, Stearns & Forward, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Harrison G. Sloane, Fred E. Lindley, and Albert J. Lee, all of San Diego, for Bar Ass'n of San Diego.

HOUSER, J. On the first count, the third count, and the fourth count of an accusation against him, A. J. Morganstern was found guilty of violation of his duty as an attorney and counselor at law and of moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption, following which, by a judgment of the court, his permanent disbarment was ordered.

In the first count of the accusation it appears that appellant, acting as an attorney, was representing one Lewis H. Gilman, who was charged with murder; that under an agreement with Agnes Gilman, the wife of said defendant, appellant received from her seven railroad bonds, which were to be hypothecated as security for a loan of $5,000 to be used by appellant for the purpose of paying all legal and other expenses in connection with the case against Lewis H. Gilman; that appellant procured the loan, but later sold the said railroad bonds for $5,690, with the understanding, as between him and Mrs. Gilman, that the difference between the loan and the amount received on the sale of the bonds, to wit, the sum of $690, was to be deposited in a bank to the credit of Agnes Gilman; that appellant neither deposited the $690 to Mrs. Gilman's credit, nor paid to her any part thereof; that thereafter, and at a time when Mrs. Gilman was under stress of great sorrow, weak in health and mind, and in a constant state of agitation and worry over the situation of her husband, appellant, taking advantage of her necessities, represented to her "that Lewis H. Gilman's neck was in danger," and that in order to secure his acquittal it would be necessary that $2,000 additional be furnished for the purpose of getting control of the jury which would try Lewis H. Gilman, and thereby appellant induced Mrs. Gilman to mortgage her home, which she did, and thereafter delivered $1,800 to appellant; that the $1,800 was not received by appellant for any proper expenditure in connection with the defense of Lewis H. Gilman, but that at all times appellant intended to and he did use the said sum of $1,800 for his own benefit; that the aggregate of said sums so received by appellant from Mrs. Gilman was grossly excessive, and was wholly disproportionate to any service to be rendered or any needs or exigencies of the case, and to the ability of either the defendant or Mrs. Gilman to pay, all of which was well known by said appellant at the time.

The third count of the accusation, in substance, charges appellant with having collected $100 from a client for the purpose of making a deposit on an order for a court reporter's transcript of testimony to be used on an appeal for said client; that appellant converted the $100 to his own use, and for a period of over two months appellant fraudulently failed to deliver the $100 to the court reporter, and by reason thereof the client lost his right of appeal.

By the fourth accusation appellant is charged with having filed with the court his own false affidavit, which was intended to be and was used by him for the purpose of deceiving and misleading the judge of the court in connection with his motion that his client be relieved from "excusable neglect" in permitting his right of appeal to lapse in the same action in which, under count 3 of the accusation, appellant was charged with having misappropriated the sum of $100.

[1, 2] Mr. Morganstern appeals from the judgment, and attacks the sufficiency of the accusation, first, because, instead of the accusation being presented by "a regularly organized bar association," as provided by section 291, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by St. 1921, p. 100, § 3, the Lawyers' Institute of San Diego, a corporation, appears as the accusing party. The statute referred to merely provides that the accusation may be presented by an organized bar association, without specifying whether it shall be incorporated or unincorporated; and the fact that the accuser was a corporation instead of an unincorporated association did not place it outside the terms of the statute. Counsel for appellant also contend that the corporation was acting in excess of its powers in the premises. Its articles of incorporation disclose that the purposes for which it was formed include the following:

> "To co-operate with and supplement the present Bar Association, and to supply an agency whereby their ideals may be made effective in daily practice.
> "To maintain a standard, through the careful selection and supervision of its members, which will enable the public to employ such members professionally with full faith in their diligence and integrity."

While the statement of such purposes contains no express provision with reference to instigating or instituting actions in the nature of disbarment proceedings, the expressions "whereby their ideals may be made effective in daily practice," and the declared object of maintaining a certain standard among the members of the bar, are certainly broad enough to include within the implied powers of the corporation the course adopted by the corporation in this proceeding.

[3] Further complaint is made that the accusation is neither signed nor verified by the corporation itself, but is signed by E. E. Hubbell as president, and by Harrison G. Sloane as assistant secretary, in behalf of the accuser, and that it is verified by E. E. Hubbell, not in his individual capacity, but also in behalf of said accuser. There is nothing in the statute which requires that the accusation be signed by either the corporation, or by any association, or, indeed, by any person. Section 290, Code of Civil Procedure, requires only that the accusation be in writing, and section 291, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the verification, when presented by an organized bar association, may be made on information and belief.

[4, 5] The form of the verification annexed to the accusation, so far as is here material, is that affiant "has been informed of all the matters therein alleged, and he believes them to be true, and, upon such information and belief, states that each and all of the charges therein contained are true." The verification in itself is a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the statute, and the further objection by appellant that nothing in the accusation is stated on information and belief is beside the point that the verification is prejudically defective. The sufficiency of the oath to the accusation must be determined solely from an inspection of the verification. In re Collins, 147 Cal. 11, 81 Pac. 220.

[6] Appellant claims immunity because of the asserted fact that he was accused under subdivision 5 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure—his reason being that, although said subdivision was enacted in 1911, it was not until after June 29, 1921, that any direct method of procedure was provided by statute for enforcing that particular subdivision, and that the acts of which he is accused were committed before the enforcing statute took effect. In a matter of this nature the court is not authorized to disbar or suspend an attorney for the commission of acts not included within the terms of the statutes governing such proceedings. In re Collins, 147 Cal. 13, 81 Pac. 220. The statute (section 287, Code of Civ. Proc.), containing both subdivisions 2 and 5 thereof, under which the accusation here is based, was passed long before the time when it is alleged appellant committed the various acts set forth in the accusation herein. While the question of the force of statutes subsequently passed for the purpose of providing the necessary procedure when acting under the provisions of subdivision 5 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, is presented by counsel for appellant under the contention that such a law would be ex post facto, and consequently of no validity as to appellant's case here, it has been held in a disbarment proceeding that, where, under the provisions of section 187, Code of Civil Procedure, no procedure is expressly prescribed in the statute for the removal of an attorney, any suitable process or mode of proceeding may be adopted which may appear most conformable with the spirit of the Code. Barnes v. District Court of Appeal, 178 Cal. 504, 173 Pac. 1100. In the instant case the procedure adopted was that indicated by the provisions of section 289, Code of Civil Procedure, as applicable to all the different subdivisions of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure (with the exception of subdivision 1 thereof), as section 289, Code of Civil Procedure, read prior to the amendment thereof in 1921 (St. 1921, p. 99, § 2). Certainly the adoption of such procedure was "most conformable with the spirit of the Code." Moreover, it appears that it is alleged in each of the five counts of the accusation against appellant that the acts with which he was charged were in violation of subdivision 2 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure—such allegation in each count being "that A. J. Morganstern has been, and now is, guilty of violation of his duty as such attorney and counselor at law in the following particulars, to wit." As heretofore set out, the court found in identical language with the charging clause of the accusation, and, in addition thereto, that he was "guilty of moral turpitude, dishonesty, and corruption." Also, that all of the allegations of the first, third, and fourth counts of the accusation were true. That the alleged acts also constituted moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption, in the language of subdivision 5 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, does not necessarily place the accusation as falling solely under that particular subdivision. Where, as here, the alleged acts are such that they show moral turpitude, dishonesty, or corruption in violation of his duties as an attorney and counselor, and committed in the course of the practice of his profession, he may be proceeded against under either subdivision 2 or under subdivision 5 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure. Under subdivision 2 of section 287, Code of Civil Procedure, there is no limitation upon the power of the court to entertain a motion for the removal or suspension of an attorney. Ex parte Tyler, 107 Cal. 83, 40 Pac. 33. And see Disbarment of Danford, 157 Cal. 425, 108 Pac. 322; In re Treadwell, 67 Cal. 353, 7 Pac. 724; Disbarment of Wharton, 114 Cal. 367, 46 Pac. 172, 55 Am. St. Rep. 72.

[7] It is contended that the amendment to section 291, Code of Civil Procedure, which permits the verification to the accusation to be made on information and belief when the accusation is presented by an organized bar association, is special legislation, and consequently void under the provisions of subdivision 19 of section 25 of article 4, as well as by the provisions of section 21 of article 1 of the California Constitution. The statute very clearly provides that, when an accusation is presented by a particular class, to wit, an organized bar association, the procedure for the verification of the accusation shall be different from that required when an accusation is presented by any other class or by an individual. There is no attempt in the statute to divide the bar associations into incorporated or unincorporated associations, or to make any other distinction among them. They are all grouped together into one great class, and the rule is that a law will be held to be general and not special which applies uniformly to all persons included within a class which is founded upon some reasonable and natural or intrinsic distinction. City of Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 251, 27 Pac. 604; Darcy v. Mayor of San Jose, 104 Cal. 642, 38 Pac. 500; Rode v. Siebe, 119 Cal. 521, 51 Pac. 869, 39 L. R. A. 342; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 481, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73; Ex parte King, 157 Cal. 164, 106 Pac. 578. There is good reason for the distinction made in the statute, and a most natural one. Bar associations exist wherever groups of lawyers are to be found. It is the case with most bar associations, as with the one involved in this proceeding, that one of the purposes of their organization is "to supply an agency whereby their ideals may be made effective in daily practice." One of the ideals of lawyers is to maintain a standard which will insure to the public honesty and fair dealing in its transactions with members of the bar, and in order to do so it is necessary that a wholesome supervision should be exercised. Complaints of professional misconduct of any lawyer in a given community are usually referred to the bar association of that particular place, and, if, upon investigation, the facts appear to warrant action in the courts, proceedings for disbarment are instituted. Far from having a personal knowledge of all the facts in a given case, no member of the bar association may have personal knowledge of any relevant fact going to make up the charge against the accused. The bar association as an entire body, as well as each individual member thereof, ordinarily has no direct knowledge other than such as it or he may have acquired through hearsay communication.

[8] It is therefore eminently proper that, depending upon what appears to be reliable information, any member of the association, or, indeed, any other person should be permitted to verify the accusation on "information and belief." Such may have been some of the reasons existing in minds of the legislators of this state when the statute in question was passed. As is stated in Ex parte King, supra, the question is one primarily for the Legislature to determine, and it is reasonable to assume that the Legislature, in creating the class, had reasons therefor which were good and sufficient in themselves. It is only when it clearly appears that there was no sufficient reason for making a distinction that a court will be warranted in adjudging the act void. Grumbach v. Lelande, 154 Cal. 684, 98 Pac. 1059. It follows that, no substantial reason being shown why the Legislature should not have created bar associations as a class, nor why an accusation presented by a bar association should not be verified on information and belief, the statute of which complaint is made is not special legislation within the meaning of the sections of the state Constitution to which reference has been made.

[9] The next reason assigned by appellant for a reversal of the judgment relates to an amendment to the first accusation in the pleadings. It appears that after the case had been tried and coincident with the entry of judgment it was ordered by the court that the amendment to which objection is now taken be filed. Counsel complain that the amendment presented an entirely different cause of action from that originally filed against appellant, and that before the filing of the amendment appellant had no notice that he was charged with the commission of any of the acts or offenses set forth in the amendment. The record is silent as to any objection ever having been taken to the filing of the amendment; but the record does disclose the fact that the issues presented by the amendment were fully met by appellant by evidence adduced at the trial. The case, so far as that feature was concerned, was fairly tried, and consequently appellant was in no wise injured by reason of an amendment which conformed to the proof.

[10] An objection by counsel for appellant to the "general manner of proceedings" herein, and especially directing attention to the fact that a motion was granted by the court permitting the taking of the deposition of appellant and other witnesses preceding the trial, on the ground that a disbarment proceeding is quasi criminal in its nature, and consequently that appellant was entitled to be confronted by the witnesses and to cross-examine them, is next to be considered. The record shows that there was no restriction placed upon counsel with reference to the cross-examination of the witnesses whose depositions were taken, and that appellant was accorded and that he availed himself of every right in that regard which he would have possessed had the examination been in open court. There is nothing in the statutes to which attention has been directed which would indicate that a matter in disbarment is other than a special proceeding, and, assuming it to be such, the rule for taking depositions therein is directly covered by section 2021, Code of Civil Procedure. In cases in which the nature of a disbarment proceeding is involved, or where the right to take depositions on the part of the relator in such a proceeding have been brought in question, the opinion of the court has been against appellant's contention. In a matter entitled In re Wellcome, 23 Mont. 259, 58 Pac. 711, it is held that a proceeding in disbarment is not a criminal action; that under the statute (nearly identical with ours) which provides that the testimony of a witness out of the state may be taken by deposition in an action at any time after service of summons or the appearance of the defendant, and in a special proceeding at any time after a question of fact has arisen therein, the deposition of a witness may be taken in a disbarment proceeding, and that a disbarment proceeding must be classified as a special proceeding. And, see, also, the following cases: Matter of Mathot, 222 N. Y. 948, 117 N. E. 948; In re Spencer, 137 App. Div. 330, 122 N. Y. Supp. 190; State v. Mosher, 128 Iowa, 82, 103 N. W. 106, 5 Ann. Cas. 984; In re Burnette, 73 Kan. 609, 85 Pac. 575; In re Morrison, 43 S. D. 185, 178 N. W. 732. Relying upon the foregoing authorities, this court is of the opinion that a disbarment proceeding is a special proceeding within the provisions of our statute, and that the depositions of witnesses may be taken therein on the part of the prosecution.

[11] It is insisted that the judgment is not in accordance with the evidence; but it is the rule that, where the evidence is sufficient, even though there be a conflict therein, the appellate court will not interfere with the judgment. That is a matter which is exclusively within the province of the trial court. Disbarment of Cruickshank, 47 Cal. App. 496, 190 Pac. 1038; Matter of Danford, 157 Cal. 429, 108 Pac. 322; In re Morton, 179 Cal. 513, 177 Pac. 453. From an examination of the record herein, this court is convinced that the evidence adduced, though conflicting, was sufficient to support the judgment.

No prejudicial error appearing, the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; CURTIS, J.

61 Cal. App. 660

PLEASANT GROVE UNION SCHOOL DIST. v. ALGEO et al. (Civ. 2608.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 14, 1923.)

1. Statutes 🔑227—When "shall" and "must" are mandatory or otherwise stated.

The words "shall" and "must" are generally mandatory when used in statutes, although such construction is not imperative and may be construed to mean "may" when no right or benefit depends upon the imperative use, or when no public or private right is lost, or when such construction is necessary to prevent the infliction of wrong or the interference with a vested right, etc.; but if it appears that public policy is in favor of the imperative meaning the words will be held mandatory.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Must; Shall (in Statutes as Permissive or Mandatory).]

2. Elections 🔑186(4)—Statute making void ballots not marked by elector as provided by law held mandatory.

Pol. Code, § 1211, subd. 1, providing that in canvassing the votes any ballot which is not marked by the elector as provided by law shall be void, is mandatory.

3. Schools and school districts 🔑97(4)—Ballot in bond election not marked with cross held invalid.

Pol. Code, § 1883, providing that persons voting at a school bond election shall put a cross on their ballots after the words "Bonds—Yes" or "Bonds—No" to indicate whether they had voted for or against the issuance of bonds, and section 1599, requiring electors to stamp or write a cross in voting, are mandatory in view of section 1205, relating to the manner of voting generally, and wherein the same words are used and have been held to be mandatory, so that ballots in a school bond election, wherein the voters instead of making a cross wrote the word "Yes" after the words "Bonds—Yes", were invalid and should not be counted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

Petition by Pleasant Grove Union School District for a writ of mandate against George Algeo and others. Writ denied, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Arthur Coats, of Yuba City, for appellant.

W. P. Rich, of Marysville, and Lawrence Schillig, of Yuba City, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Judge pro tem. In this action the petitioner applied to the superior court, in and for the county of Sutter, for a writ of mandate to compel the election officers of Cottonwood Election precinct to count two certain ballots cast at an election held in said school district in favor of the issuance of bonds by said district. The Superior court denied the writ on the ground that the two ballots were marked contrary to the manner provided for the expression of the choice of voters in school bond elections, as contained in section 1883 of the Political Code, wherein it is provided that persons voting at such elections shall put a cross upon their ballot, with pencil or ink, after the words "Bonds—Yes" or "Bonds—No" (as the case may be) to indicate whether they have voted for or against the issuance of bonds. The two ballots in question, not counted, did not contain any cross, but instead contained the word "Yes" after the words "Bonds—Yes."

Section 1883 of the Political Code, after providing that elections such as the one under consideration in this action shall be conducted in accordance with different sections of the Political Code, uses the following language:

> "And except further that persons voting at such bond elections shall put a cross (X) upon their ballots, with pencil or ink, after the words 'Bonds—Yes' or 'Bonds—No' (as the case may be) to indicate whether they have voted for or against the issuance of bonds." (The italics are ours.)

Section 1599 of the same code (as amended by St. 1917, p. 15), to which reference is made in section 1883, just quoted, contains the following provision relative to the manner of voting:

> "In casting his vote the elector must stamp or write a cross in the square space immediately following the name of the candidate for whom he desires to vote," etc.

Section 1205 of the Political Code, relating to general elections, contains the following:

> "In voting he shall stamp a cross (X) in the voting square after the name of every candidate for whom he intends to vote. * * * Where two or more candidates for the same office are to be elected and the voter desires to vote for candidates for that office, he must stamp a cross (X) after the names of all candidates * * * for whom the voter desires to vote." (The italics are ours.)

[1] It will thus be seen that the provisions of sections 1883 and 1599 of the Political Code are identical in the use of the words "shall" and "must" found in section 1205 of the Political Code, fixing the manner in which a voter is permitted to express his choice when voting at a general election. In ordinary parlance the words "shall" and "must" are compulsory in meaning, and as used in statutes are generally mandatory, although such construction is not imperative, and may be construed to mean "may" when no right or benefit depends upon the imperative use, or when no public or private right is lost, or when such construction is necessary to prevent the infliction of wrong or the interference with a vested right, etc. On the other hand, it appears that if public policy is in favor of the imperative meaning, the words referred to will be held mandatory.

The general trend of authorities since the adoption of the Australian ballot system of voting has been toward holding the various specifications in the code as to the manner in which a voter shall express his choice as mandatory, save and except as liberalized by subdivision 4 of section 1211 of the Political Code, relating to marks upon the ballot other than those indicating the manner in which the voter has voted, and which might possibly have been placed there for the purpose of identifying the ballot. The reason for this is apparent, as, whether the cross is made by a stamp or with a pen, the likelihood of blots and other marks being made by the folding of the ballot is so great that unless this liberal provision and interpretation were given, the likelihood of well-intentioned voters to have their ballots invalidated would be exceedingly great. No such tendency of interpretation, however, appears when it comes to the cases having to do with the manner in which the voter must indicate his choice.

The case of Sweetser v. Pacheco, 172 Cal. 137, 155 Pac. 639, thus states the law:

> "Under the law as it now is and has been ever since the year 1903, the only way in which a voter can indicate his intent to vote for a particular candidate is by stamping a cross in, or at least partly in, * * * the voting square, the provisions of section 1205 of the Political Code being mandatory in this regard. Any other method is legally ineffectual to express an intent to vote for a particular candidate, by reason of the express language of this section providing how, and how only, the intent shall be indicated. This is made manifest by what is said by this court as to the mandatory character of section 1205 of the Political Code, in regard to the method of indicating a vote. [Here a number of cases are cited.] As that section now is, the voter who has omitted to stamp his cross in, or at least partly in, the voting square, opposite the printed name of a particular candidate, has not voted for that candidate. The case is simply one of no vote. As to ballot 'Novato 2–8,' all the crosses, including that in the voting square opposite Sweetser's name, were made with a lead pencil. What we have already said applies also to this ballot. In view of the provisions of section 1205 of the Political Code, the intent of the voter to vote for a particular candidate whose name is printed on the ballot can be expressed only by stamping a cross in, or at least partly in, the voting square. Lacking such stamped cross, the ballot cannot be counted for such candidate, even though the courts may feel that the voter in fact intended so to vote. The express language of the law forbids it."

A large number of cases are cited in the opinion just referred to, upholding the mandatory character of section 1205 of the Political Code.

It will be observed that the Sweetser Case is not based upon the provisions of section 1211 of the same Code, but is expressly founded upon section 1205, the language of which is identical with sections 1883 and 1599 of the same Code, governing bond elections in school districts.

[2] Subdivision 1 of section 1211 of the Political Code is unquestionably imperative in its language. It reads:

> "In canvassing the votes any ballot which is not marked by the elector as provided by law shall be void," etc.

But this section is not one upon which the Sweetser Case is decided, and therefore need not be further considered in determining the validity of the two ballots in question now before this court.

The Supreme Court of Colorado, having before it the question of the mandatory character of a similar provision of the Colorado Code, states the law in Wiley v. McDowell, 55 Colo. 236, 133 Pac. 757, in probably as clear and decisive language as is contained in the reports, to wit:

> "'The intention of the voter, as expressed upon the face of his ballot, has always been regarded as the cardinal principal controlling the count. Under a system providing for balloting like the Australian, it is necessary that certain rules be prescribed to prevent confusion and secure uniformity. By this means the intention of the voter is to be ascertained.' These principles have repeatedly been recognized and followed in this jurisdiction. Young v. Simpson, 21 Colo. 460, 42 Pac. 666, 52 Am. St. Rep. 254; Heiskell v. Landrum, 23 Colo. 65, 46 Pac. 120; Rhode v. Steinmetz, 25 Colo. 308, 55 Pac. 814. It appears to be the universal rule in all states which have adopted the so-called Australian system, as said by the Supreme Court of Iowa in Whittam v. Zahorik, 91 Iowa, 23, 59 N. W. 57, 51 Am. St. Rep. 317, whether a ballot should be counted does not depend solely upon the power to ascertain and declare the choice of the voter, but also upon the expression of that choice in the manner provided by the statute. To put it in another way, as was said in Vallier v. Brakke, 7 S. D. at page 354, 64 N. W. at page 184: 'The statute having prescribed the manner in which the elector may designate by marks upon his ballot the candidate for whom he intends to vote, and declared the effect of such marks, neither the judges of election nor the courts are authorized to go beyond those marks in order to ascertain the voter's intention.'"

The same court, in the case of Riley v. Trainor, 57 Colo. 155, 140 Pac., at page 470, quotes with approval the following:

> "There can be no mistaking this language. It requires that in order to designate his choice the voter must use a cross-mark as the law requires."

In that case crosses were not used, and the ballots were held invalid.

The attention of this court is called to the case of Turner v. Wilson, 171 Cal. 600, 154 Pac. 2. The court, however, in that case did not hold that the manner of voting provided for by section 1205 might be dispensed with or that the manner of voting therein indicated was not mandatory. It simply held that writing the words "Yes" and "No" after a certain proposition appearing upon the ballot then under consideration did not invalidate the ballot for other purposes, there being no other evidence of a mark for identification. Nor is the case of Sweetser v. Pacheco, supra, modified or limited in any particular by the decision of the Supreme Court in Castagnetti v. Superior Court, 209 Pac. 549. The use of a pencil instead of a stamp, in making the cross, is upheld in the Castagnetti Case for the reason that section 18 of the Primary Law of the Statutes of 1913, page 1379, providing for indicating an elector's choice by stamping the cross with a stamp, is modified by the further provision that no ballot shall be rejected for a technical error not rendering it impossible to determine the voter's choice, and very carefully distinguishing that case from the holding in Sweetser v. Pacheco; there being a difference between the provisions of section 18, supra, of the Primary Law, and the provisions of the Code governing elections.

In the case of People v. Town of Ontario, 148 Cal. 625, 84 Pac. 205, the form of the ballot, and not the manner of voting, was the question passed upon by the court. It was there held that where the statute provided that the notice of election should contain the form of the ballot as being "For annexation" or "Against annexation," the submitting of a ballot reading "For annexation—Yes," and, second, "For annexation—No," leaving a square opposite the word "Yes" and also opposite the word "No" for the voter to stamp a cross, did not invalidate the ballot, or by reason of the fact that the second call in the ballot, instead of reading "Against annexation," read "For annexation—No," as the statute allowed a form equivalent to that expressed in the statute. The same is true of the questions involved in the case of People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 Pac. 749. There the ballot read first, "For annexation"; second, "Against annexation"—leaving a square opposite each call upon the ballot for the voter to indicate his choice, together with a direction as follows: "To vote, stamp a cross (X) in the square opposite the proposition indicating your choice," which was a sufficient compliance with the statute as to the form of the ballot.

In the case of Murphy v. City of San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444, a similar question of the manner of voting was before the court, and it was there held that the direction of an ordinance as to how an elector's choice should be indicated was mandatory.

If the holding in the Murphy Case, supra, by the Supreme Court, is correct, it would appear that the trial court was right in denying the writ of mandate herein.

[3] For the reasons hereinbefore stated, and following the authorities cited, we conclude that the provisions of sections 1883 and 1599 of the Political Code, wherein the same words are used as are found in section 1205 of the same Code, and which have been held to be mandatory, must also be held mandatory on account of similarity of use, and the judgment of the trial court should be, and the same is, hereby affirmed.

BARBER v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES.
(L. A. 7426.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 28, 1923.)

1. Municipal corporations ⚷460—City held to have right to levy assessment to pay damages caused to private property by reason of improvement, though charter did not so provide.

Where proceedings by the city of Los Angeles for constructing a tunnel were as of right under Const. art. 11, § 6, carried out under the Improvement Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1217, and St. 1917, p. 970), which authorizes a city to assess property benefited to compensate owners for damages resulting to their property by reason of an improvement, held, that the city could levy such assessment to pay the damages notwithstanding Charter of City of Los Angeles, art. 1, § 2, subd. 19, did not specifically provide for such assessment but merely for the levy of an assessment to pay cost of improvement.

2. Municipal corporations ⚷58—Amendment to city charter conferring powers and privileges granted by general laws held not proof that city did not have those rights prior to amendment.

The fact that Charter of City of Los Angeles, art. 1, § 2, subd. 19, was amended (St. 1919, pp. 1430, 1432), and the city expressly authorized to exercise any rights and powers granted by general laws did not indicate that the city previous to the amendment was limited to the express terms of its charter and so deprived of the powers and privileges accorded to cities by the Improvement Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1217, and St. 1917, p. 970).

3. Municipal corporations ⚷58—Failure to mention in charter some power granted to city by general statute held not to constitute a denial of that power.

Where a city has a right to avail itself of the powers expressly granted by the Improvement Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1217, and St. 1917, p. 970), failure to mention in the charter some power granted by the act cannot be held to constitute a denial of that power to the city or limitation upon its right to do any of the things authorized by the statute, and the fact that the charter was subsequently amended to confer on the city power to exercise authority previously conferred only by the state law does not prove that the city was limited to the express terms of its charter.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by D. C. Barber against the City of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Delmas & Brown and Delphin M. Delmas, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jess E. Stephens, City Atty., L. P. Green, Asst. City Atty., and Charles McCoy, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff, as a property owner of the city of Los Angeles, whose property was included in the district declared to be benefited by the Second street tunnel, brought this action to recover $19.26 paid for the redemption of his land after it had been sold for taxes upon the nonpayment of the amount assessed against it for the construction of the tunnel. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained and judgment was entered in favor of defendant, whereupon plaintiff took this appeal.

[1-3] To authorize the construction of a tunnel under Second street, in the city of Los Angeles, an ordinance of the mayor and council of that city was passed declaring their intention to do the work, reciting that in their opinion damage would result to private property from such improvement and specifying the exterior boundaries of the district to be benefited and specially assessed to pay the cost of the work and the damages caused thereby. Notice of the intention having been mailed to the property owners affected, an ordinance providing for carrying out the work was passed. Following the award of the contract an assessment was levied amounting to $995,773.21, of which $103,702 was to recover the damage done to private property. Appellant in this suit seeks to have the assessment declared invalid. In the complaint a number of grounds were specified, but upon this appeal the only point urged is that the city was without authority to levy an assessment to pay for damage caused to private property by reason of the improvement, inasmuch as no such power is conferred upon it by the city charter. The ordinances purported to be passed and the proceedings for the improvement taken in accordance with the Improvement Act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 954; amended Stats. 1915, p. 1217; amended Stats. 1917, p. 970).

The Improvement Act of 1913 authorizes the legislative body of any city to improve its streets and to assess the property benefited thereby for the costs thereof, and it expressly provides for the compensation of property owners for damage resulting to their property by reason of the improvement. Therefore the only question presented here is whether the city could order the work done and levy the assessment under a legislative enactment other than the city charter, it being contended by appellant that the charter prohibited the levying of an assessment by the city for the purpose stated.

It was held in Hayes v. Handley, 182 Cal. 273, 187 Pac. 952, a case arising out of the same improvement as the one at bar, that the city might go outside the city charter and levy a special assessment for the improvement under the authority of the Improvement Act of 1913, supra. The court there held that (182 Cal. 281, 187 Pac. 955):

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

> "It is nevertheless true that the legislative body of the city has power to adopt any state law applicable to its municipal affairs and that in the matter of providing for defraying the expense of the proposed work of construction that was effectively done by the ordinance of intention and the ordinance ordering the work to be done."

Appellant argues, however, that that case is not pertinent here, in that the charter of Los Angeles positively forbids the levying of an assessment for the particular purpose under consideration. The Constitution provides that—

> "Cities * * * heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution, may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become * * * empowered hereunder, to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." Article 11, § 6.

In the charter of the city of Los Angeles it is provided that—

> "This city * * * shall have the right and power: * * * To provide for * * * the improvement * * * of streets * * * and to * * * levy * * * assessments * * * to pay the cost of any such improvement." Article 1, § 2, subd. 19, Stats. 1917, p. 1691.

It is appellant's contention that the express grant of authority to levy assessments "to pay the cost of any such improvement" excludes the power to levy the assessment for any other purpose. Harward v. St. Clair Drainage Co. 51 Ill. 130, is cited in support of this contention In that case it was held that a provision of the state Constitution that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns and villages may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes" was a limitation which prohibited the Legislature from granting the power of local taxation to private individuals or others than the local or corporate authorities. It is claimed the provision of the charter quoted is likewise a limitation on the power of the city. Appellant in addition asserts the city is shown not to have had the authority claimed for it by the fact that in 1919 the charter was amended and the city expressly authorized to exercise any rights, powers, and privileges granted by general laws (Stats. 1919, pp. 1430, 1432), and to levy assessments to pay for damage caused to private property by improvement work.

A complete answer to this argument is that all the proceedings for the work of constructing the tunnel were carried out under the authority of the Improvement Act of 1913, supra, which act authorized the levying of an assessment for the purpose in question. It was clearly decided in Hayes v. Handley, supra, that the city had the right to proceed under that act. The right to proceed under the act included authority to take all the steps therein provided and to levy assessments for all the purposes therein designated. The city thus having the right to avail itself of the powers expressly granted by the Improvement Act of 1913, supra, the failure to mention in the charter some power granted by the act cannot be held to constitute a denial of that power to the city or a limitation upon its right to do any of the things authorized by the statute. In this situation the fact that the charter was subsequently amended to confer on the city power to exercise authority theretofore conferred only by state law does not prove that the city was limited to the express terms of its charter.

The judgment is affirmed.

COAST TRUCK LINE v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.

(S. F. 10258.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 1, 1923. Rehearing Denied June 28, 1923.)

1. Public service commissions ⟹14—May decide on facts alleged in complaint where admitted by defendant.

Where a public hearing is had before the Railroad Commission on a complaint containing sufficient allegations, and defendant admits the allegations, the Commission may rule without further inquiry.

2. Carriers ⟹10—Commission held authorized to hear and determine complaints against truck company.

Under the Auto Stage and Transportation Act of 1917, the Railroad Commission has jurisdiction to hear and determine complaints for violation of the provisions relative to procuring a certificate of public convenience and necessity, and, in the proper exercise of such jurisdiction, the Commission may order a transportation company to refrain from unlawful acts; such order not being unauthorized exercise of injunctive powers.

Coast Truck Line. The Commission entered an order adverse to the Coast Truck Line, and the latter applies for writ of review. Order affirmed.

H. J. Bischoff, of San Diego, for petitioner.

Hugh Gordon and William W. Clary, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. This proceeding was instituted by the petitioner herein seeking to have this court review and annul a certain order of the Railroad Commission made and entered on April 21, 1922, determining that no further transportation of freight shipments shall be made by this petitioner between Los Angeles and points south of Oceanside, to and including San Diego, or the territory from San Diego to Oceanside, when shipments originate at or are destined to the territory between Oceanside and Escondido, and that all rates as now appearing in the tariff of the petitioner for the movement of such shipments between the prohibited territory above mentioned should be canceled, and requiring the said petitioner, Coast Truck Line, to make application for a certificate of public convenience and necessity and to establish the same at a public hearing before accepting or transporting any further shipments between said prohibited points.

The undisputed facts which form the basis of said application and are essential to a consideration of its merits are the following: Prior to March 8, 1921, one Roy Jakeway was engaged in operating motor trucks between San Diego and Oceanside under certain operating rights and franchises. Prior to the same date one Roy Whetstone was engaged in operating motor trucks between Los Angeles, Escondido, and Oceanside under similar operating rights and franchises. On said March 8, 1921, the Coast Truck Line, a corporation, the petitioner herein, acquired by purchase from said Roy Jakeway and Roy Whetstone, the operating rights and franchises held by each, and on said March 8, 1921, these respective transfers of said operating rights and franchises were approved by the Railroad Commission. Immediately thereafter the petitioner herein began the transportation of freight between Los Angeles and Escondido and points intermediate Oceanside and Escondido, and between Los Angeles and San Diego and points intermediate Oceanside and San Diego. On July 11, 1921, one Harry N. Baker filed with the Railroad Commission a complaint against said Coast Truck Line, Incorporated, setting forth, in substance, that the latter was engaged in certain operations as an acceptor and carrier of freight in expansion and excess of the rights and franchises acquired by it from the foregoing transfers, without having applied for or obtained from the Railroad Commission the requisite certificate of public convenience and necessity authorizing it so to do, and that its action in so doing was in violation of the decision and order of the Commission made upon the approval of said transfers. A hearing was had upon said complaint before the Commission, after due notice to the respondent therein, at which hearing the matter was submitted upon the facts set forth in said complaint, whereupon the Commission, on April 21, 1922, made and entered the order, the substance of which is above set forth and which is complained of in the instant proceeding.

The petitioner herein urges three contentions in favor of the issuance of the writ: First, that the Commission had no jurisdiction over the subject-matter of said complaint; second, that the Commission exceeded its authority in the issuance of an injunction herein; and, third, that the decision of the Commission is unsupported by evidence and is contrary to law.

[1] Dealing first with the petitioner's contention that the decision of the Commission is unsupported by evidence, we find no semblance of merit in it. When the matter was called for hearing before the Commission it was expressly and formally admitted by respondent in that proceeding that all of the allegations of fact in the complaint were true. This admission dispensed with the necessity of taking evidence as to those issues of fact, leaving to the consideration of the Commission only such questions of law as arose out of these admitted facts of the case.

[2] As to the other two contentions of the petitioner herein, they both received exhaustive consideration by this court in the case of Motor Transit Co. et al. v. Railroad Commission (Cal. Sup.) 209 Pac. 586, a case in no material aspect distinguishable from the case at bar, and in which case it was held that the Railroad Commission was acting within the scope of its supervisory and regulatory jurisdiction in requiring a certificate of public convenience and necessity as a condition precedent to the carrying on of a transportation and truckage business over certain designated routes or territory, under the provisions of the Auto Stage and Truck Transportation Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 333), and hence had jurisdiction to hear and determine complaints for the violation of the provisions of said act in that regard. It was also held that in the proper exercise of its jurisdiction over the subject-matter in controversy, accorded it by that decision, the order of the Commission directing the transportation company to refrain from doing the act found by the Commission to have been done in violation of the provisions of the statute requiring a certificate of public convenience and necessity before doing such act, was not an unauthorized exercise by the Commission of injunctive powers. In so deciding this court reviewed practically every case cited by the petitioner herein in support of its several contentions. We are satisfied with the conclusions arrived at in that case and that they have exact application to the facts of the instant case. We are also satisfied that the Commission, upon the admitted facts of the case, correctly determined that the petitioner herein, in engaging in the operations as an acceptor and carrier of freight between Los Angeles and San Diego, as described in the complaint before it, was acting in expansion and excess of the rights and franchises acquired by it through the transfers above referred to, and in express violation of the terms and limitations contained in the orders of the Commission approving such transfers, and hence that said Commission had jurisdiction and power to make and enter the orders of which the petitioner herein complains.

The order is affirmed.

McKENNA v. STATE INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10705.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 31, 1923.)

Master and servant ⊂⇒417(8)—Order denying compensation held harmless.

Where one was denied compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Law on the ground that the injury complained of was the result of a previous accident, he was not entitled to a writ of certiorari on the ground that the Industrial Accident Board was without jurisdiction because the accident was within the admiralty jurisdiction, since, if such fact were true, he was not injured by the findings against him.

In Bank.

Petition by Matthew McKenna against the Industrial Accident Commission and others, for certiorari to review an order of the Commission refusing compensation. Writ denied.

Lincoln E. Savage, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, Matthew McKenna, was denied relief by the respondents under the Workmen's Compensation Law (St. 1917, p. 831) because they found that petitioner had suffered no injury as a result of the alleged accident, and that the injury he complained of resulted from a previous accident.

The petitioner claims that the respondent Board was without jurisdiction because the accident complained of comes within the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. If this is true, the petitioner is not injured by the fact that the respondent Board found against him. If they have jurisdiction he is concluded by their findings. Not having shown any injury by the order complained of, petitioner is not entitled to a writ.

The petition for a writ of certiorari is denied.

Under Civ. Code, § 47, defining "privileged communications," the only publications absolutely privileged are those made in the proper discharge of an official duty and those in a legislative, judicial, or official proceeding authorized by law.

2. Libel and slander ⊂⇒39—Letter of director of state laboratory charging dealing in unfit food products not privileged.

A letter by the director of the state laboratory to the department of agriculture of a sister state, charging that plaintiff was dealing in adulterated, rancid food products, particularly walnut meats unfit for human consumption, held not absolutely privileged under Civ. Code, § 47, as a statement made in the proper discharge of an official duty; such communication being no part of defendant's duty under Pure Food and Drug Act March 11, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 208).

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the Hale Company against E. J. Lea. From judgment for defendant on demurrer to complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The adequacy of the allegations of the complaint in this action for libel is the question presented upon this appeal, a judgment for defendant having been entered after an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint without leave to amend. The complaint under attack contains averments to the following effect: Plaintiff is engaged in the business of importing and dealing in food products and, in particular, walnut meats; defendant is director of the state laboratory of the state of California. For the purpose of sale, plaintiff had imported 280 cases of shelled walnut meats which were placed in cold storage in the city and county of San Francisco. Charging that these nuts were adulterated, rancid, and unfit for human consumption, the defendant, on November 20, 1919, caused the arrest of the manager of the plaintiff corporation and the quarantine of the walnut meats. On December 10, 1919, the manager was tried before a jury which brought in a verdict of "not guilty," with the added recommendation that the nuts which had been introduced in evidence be divided among the jurors. Defendant thereupon caused the quarantine to be lifted, but threatened further arrests if plaintiff attempted to sell the nuts in California. For the purpose of avoiding further annoyance, plaintiff shipped the walnuts in question into the state of Washington, whereupon, on or about December 18, 1919, defendant, it is alleged, "maliciously and with the intent to injure the plaintiff," wrote to the department of agriculture in the city of Seattle, state of Washington, a letter which he mailed and which was received and read by those in charge of this department. In this letter defendant stated that "plaintiff was dealing in adulterated, rancid food products, to wit, walnut meats, which were unfit for human consumption," and further stated that the 280 cases of walnut meats previously referred to were being shipped into the state of Washington, identifying the shipment by particular description, and that they were adulterated, rancid, and unfit for human consumption. It is further alleged that these statements were "false, and were made maliciously to injure the plaintiff," and that "plaintiff has suffered damages by reason of the malicious and false statement of defendant as aforesaid in the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars."

It is defendant's contention that the complaint fails to state a cause of action for libel for the reason that it affirmatively appears that the publication complained of was a privileged communication. The statements contained in the letter alleged to have been written by the defendant are claimed to fall within one or more of the three following subdivisions of section 47 of the Civil Code:

> "A privileged publication is one made—
> "(1) In the proper discharge of an official duty.
> "(2) In any legislative or judicial proceeding, or in any other official proceeding authorized by law.
> "(3) In a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information."

[1] The allegations of malice and "intent to injure," necessarily admitted by the demurrer, effectively dispose of the third subdivision above quoted, for the reason that absence of malice is an express limitation upon the privilege therein sanctioned; whereas, in this regard, the exemptions specified in the first and second subdivisions of section 47 are absolute and unqualified. Snively v. Record Publishing Co., 185 Cal. 565, 577, 198 Pac. 1; Stevens v. Snow (Cal. Sup.) 214 Pac. 968.

Whether or not the alleged statement was published in the proper discharge of an official duty or in an official proceeding authorized by law is therefore the only question to be considered.

The office of director of the state laboratory, by virtue of which defendant claims to have been clothed with immunity, is created by an act approved March 11, 1907, commonly known as the Pure Food and Drug Act (Stats. 1907, p. 208), subsequently amended in unimportant particulars. That act reads, in part, as follows:

> "Sec. 9. For the purpose of this act there is hereby established a state laboratory for the analysis and examination of food and drugs, which shall be under the supervision of the state board of health, which laboratory shall be located at such place as the state board of health may select.
> "The state board of health shall appoint a director of said laboratory and an assistant to such director, both of whom shall be skilled pharmaceutical chemists and analysts of food and drugs. Said director shall perform all duties required by this act and which shall be required by the state board of health. * * *
> "Sec. 10. The state board of health or its secretary, shall cause to be made by said director of the state laboratory, examinations and analyses of food and liquor on sale in California, suspected of being adulterated, mislabeled or misbranded. * * *"
> "Sec. 13. Whenever said director shall find from his examination and analysis that adulterated, mislabeled or misbranded food has been on sale in this state, he shall forthwith report to the secretary of the state board of health."
> "Sec. 15. The said director of the state laboratory shall make an annual report to the state board of health, on or before August first of each year, upon adulterated or misbranded foods or liquors in which report shall be included the list of cases examined by him in which adulterants were found and the list of articles found mislabeled or misbranded, and the names of the manufacturers, producers, jobbers and sellers. Said report, or any part thereof, may in the discretion of the state board of health, be included in the report which the state board of health is already authorized by law to make to the Governor. The state board of health may, in its discretion, publish any part of said report in any issue of its monthly bulletin."

[1] The duties of the director of the state laboratory are, therefore, those "required by this act and which shall be required by the state board of health." The duties set forth in the act are: First, the examination and analyses of foodstuffs; and, second, the issuance of reports thereon to the state board of health. In other words, his duties are confined to scientific analyses and deductions. The director has no power to compel the procurement and submission of foods for examination. He examines the samples submitted to him and reports to the board, and here terminates his official activity; he has no part whatever in applying the results of his investigations. The act does not impose any duty upon the director to communicate the facts ascertained by him to any one other than the state board of health. In so far as the ascertained facts are concerned, the discretion to publish or not to publish them is by the act expressly vested in the state board of health, and the act does not confer any authority upon the director to make a publication of the ascertained facts either as an official act or in the performance by him of an official duty.

Whether the director might have sent the letter with immunity if authorized by the state board of health, or whether the letter would have been privileged if sent by the board itself, are questions not within the scope of the present discussion, for neither of these facts is alleged in the complaint. Immaterial, also, is the argument urged by defendant that communications to authorities in sister states concerning the condition of food may be necessary in the proper administration of the pure food and drug acts. However that may be, the act in question manifestly does not invest the director of the state laboratory with authority to communicate the facts ascertained by him to any board or person other than the state board of health; the Legislature having proceeded, obviously, upon the theory that the scientific investigation required by the act should be performed by a person unincumbered with the responsibility of enforcing the law and deciding questions of public policy.

[2] We conclude, therefore, that it does not appear from the complaint that the sending to the department of agriculture in Seattle, Wash., of a letter concerning the condition of foods examined by him, was an official duty of the director of the state laboratory or part of an official proceeding authorized by law, and that the complaint does not allege a privileged publication.

The order striking out portions of the complaint was erroneous except as to the allegations concerning the arrest and trial of the manager of the plaintiff corporation, which are evidentiary and unnecessary to the statement of the cause of action.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to vacate the order striking out portions of the complaint and sustaining the demurrer and to enter an order in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

Mandamus ⚿76—Not issued to compel appointment to position occupied by one performing duties under claim of right.

A writ of mandamus to compel a county board of supervisors to appoint a member of the board of an irrigation district will not be granted, where the position is being occupied by one performing the duties thereof with the acquiescence of his associates and under a claim of right, as to grant the writ would require the court to try the title to the office, the existence of a vacancy in which must first be established by judicial process.

In Bank.

Application by P. C. Drescher and others for writ of mandate requiring the Board of Supervisors of Butte County to appoint a member of the Board of the Honcut-Yuba Irrigation District. Petition denied.

Elmer W. Armfield and Arthur B. Eddy, both of Woodland, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandamus to compel the respondent board of supervisors to appoint a member of the Honcut-Yuba irrigation district, upon the ground that there is a vacancy in the board of that district representing division 1.

The application shows that the position is now being occupied by one C. F. Cox, who is performing the duties of the office with the acquiescence of his associates and under claim of right.

Under these circumstances, a writ of mandamus should not be issued because, in effect, it would require us to try the title to the office. The writ should not be granted until it has been established by judicial process that there is a vacancy to be filled. Kelly v. Edwards, 69 Cal. 460, 11 Pac. 1.

BIRCH et al. v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF ORANGE COUNTY et al. (L. A. 7168.)

1. Taxation 🔑480—Statutory powers given board of supervisors to increase assessment must be exercised according to statute, otherwise acts are void.

The power of the board of supervisors under Pol. Code, § 3673, providing in what manner, after notice given to the property holder, the assessment may be increased, is purely statutory, the proceeding being in invitum, and the board must act in the manner prescribed by the statute, otherwise their action is void.

2. Taxation 🔑482(1)—Order increasing assessment made without notice to owner after submission of petition for reduction held void.

An order of the board of supervisors increasing an assessment made two days after the submission of an owner's petition for a reduction and without notice or suggestion of their intention was void as violating Pol. Code, § 3673, prohibiting an increase without notice to the owner.

3. Taxation 🔑496(2)—Statutory suit to recover increased tax from illegal increase in assessment held not to afford adequate remedy because interest not recoverable.

A taxpayer whose assessment was increased without notice, in violation of Pol. Code, § 3673, does not have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by paying the tax and suing to recover under section 3819, obviating the necessity of his resort to certiorari to review the action of the board of supervisors; such suit not being adequate because he is not entitled to recover interest on the increased tax.

WILBUR, C. J. [1] This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in a proceeding to review the action of the board of supervisors of Orange county raising the assessment upon plaintiffs' property on the assessment roll of the county for the fiscal year 1920–21 $150,000, after a hearing upon plaintiffs' application for an $800,000 reduction of the assessment upon their property. The question presented for consideration is whether the board of supervisors, after hearing evidence upon the plaintiffs' application for a reduction, had power to increase the assessment above the amount fixed by the assessor without any notice whatever to the petitioners of their intention so to do. The superior court rendered a judgment quashing the order of the board of supervisors increasing the assessment upon the plaintiffs' property. Section 3673 of the Political Code provides that the board of supervisors can increase any assessment shown upon the assessment rolls delivered to them by the assessor within the period fixed for equalization, after notice given to the property holder in the manner provided by the rules of the board of supervisors. It has been held that, in the absence of such notice, trustees of a city, when sitting as a board of equalization under a similar statute, have no jurisdiction to increase an assessment for city taxes. Huntley v. Board of Trustees, 165 Cal. 298, 131 Pac. 859. See, also, Allison R. M. Co. v. Nevada County, 104 Cal. 161, 37 Pac. 875; Farmers', etc., Bank v. Board, 97 Cal. 318, 325, 32 Pac. 312. It has also been held that such proceedings before a board of equalization are judicial in nature (Los Angeles, etc., Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164, 121 Pac. 384, 9 A. L. R. 1277) and that they can be reviewed by the court (Huntley v. Board of Trustees, supra).

[2] These propositions are conceded by the appellants, but appellants contend that, upon the application of the plaintiffs for reduction of their assessment it was the duty of the board to hear evidence with reference to values of the plaintiffs' property, and, having done so and having ascertained the values to be greater instead of less than the amount of the assessment, they had jurisdiction to make the order in question upon the theory that the plaintiffs were present upon and participated in the hearing upon the question of valuation, and that they are thus bound by the conclusion and order made upon the hearing. The difficulty with this argument is that the power of the board of supervisors is purely statutory, and that the proceedings are in invitum, and that the board must act in the manner prescribed by statute, otherwise their action is void. Patten v. Green, 13 Cal. 325; Williams v. Bergin, 108 Cal. 166, 41 Pac. 287. In this case it is stipulated that no notice whatever, verbal or written, formal or informal, was given to the plaintiffs of the intention of the board of equalization to consider the question of raising the assessment. The order increasing the amount of the assessment was made two days after the submission of the plaintiffs' petition for a reduction for the consideration of the board and without any notice or suggestion of an intention to increase the assessment, and violates the plain provision of the statute (section 3673, Pol. Code) prohibiting an increase of an assessment without notice to the owner of the proposal to increase his assessment.

[3, 4] The appellants contend that the plaintiffs have a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by paying the tax and suing to recover the same under the provisions of section 3819 of the Political Code. It is true that the District Court of Appeal, in Rickard v. Council of Santa Barbara, 49 Cal. App. 58, 192 Pac. 726, declined to set aside an assessment on the ground that the property owners had a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy by paying the tax and bringing suit to recover the same, but the plaintiffs in this case point out that under our decision in Miller v. County of Kern, 150 Cal. 797, 90 Pac. 119, the petitioner is not entitled to recover interest upon the increased tax, which increase is about $4,500, and for this reason that the remedy by suit to recover the tax is not adequate. The writ of certiorari is a discretionary writ. Keys v. Marin County, 42 Cal. 252. The superior court exercised its discretion in favor of the issuance of the writ, and there was no abuse of its discretion in so doing.

Judgment affirmed.

SAUNBY et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION et al. (S. F. 10267.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1923.)

Electricity ⟹11—Certiorari does not lie to review orders of Railroad Commission in purely procedural matters.

Certiorari will not lie to inquire into the propriety of an order of the Railroad Commission in limiting an investigation as to the reasonableness of the rates of an electric company, and in leaving the final adjustment of the rates to a proceeding to be later instituted by the Commission on its own motion, in view of the broad powers conferred by Const. art. 12, §§ 22, 23, upon the Railroad Commission; the courts being empowered to interfere with the orders of the board only when they violate some constitutional provision, such as denial of due process of law, etc.

In Bank.

Certiorari by Sidney E. Saunby and others against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and another, to review a determination of such Commission in a proceeding to fix the rates of the Southern Calfornia Edison Company. Application denied.

F. S. Brittain, of San Francisco, and William J. Carr, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

Hugh Gordon, William W. Clary, and Carl I. Wheat, all of San Francisco, and Roy V. Reppy and B. F. Woodard, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

RICHARDS, Justice pro tem. The petitioners herein applied for a writ of review wherein they sought to have reviewed and annulled a certain decision and order of the Railroad Commission in a proceeding before said Commission for the readjustment and fixation of the rates to be charged its customers by the Southern California Edison Company a corporation engaged in the distribution and sale of electric energy for lighting and power throughout a number of the counties in southern California. The facts preceding and attending said application, so far as the same are deemed necessary for the purposes of this decision are undisputed and are as follows:

Prior to and in the early part of the year 1921 the Railroad Commission undertook and conducted a comprehensive investigation into the properties and operations of the Southern California Edison Company upon the latter's application at the close of which the Commission made its findings with relation to the properties, income, and operating expenses of said corporation, among the latter of which items it included certain estimated expenditures for state taxes, and also an amount of federal income taxes which the corporation had paid, and which latter item the Commission found should be deducted from the gross earnings of the corporation in determining what its rates should be in order to allow a reasonable return upon its investment. Based upon these findings the Commission, on the 31st day of March, 1921, made its order fixing the rates to be charged the consumers of its product by the corporation. This order became final and effective on or about April 21, 1921, and was put into operation by the corporation, no assault having been made thereon by any of the parties affected thereby. In the early part of January, 1922, it was brought to the attention of the Commission that, due to certain changes in economic conditions, the rates as fixed by its aforesaid order would result in a greater return than that found to be reasonable at the time said rates were fixed, and would thus prove a burden upon certain classes of consumers, and that said rates should be modified and reduced. The Commission accordingly made an order on January 22, 1922, reciting the above facts, and stating that it appeared "advisable that the Commission determine at this time to what extent and in what manner the rates of the Southern California Edison Company should be reduced or modified." The Commission therefore ordered that a proceeding be instituted "to determine the just, reasonable, and sufficient rates, charges, rules, regulations, practices, or contracts to be hereafter observed and enforced, and to fix the same by proper order," after a public hearing, to which all interested persons were to be made parties. Such public hearing was set for and was commenced before the Commission upon the 27th day of February, and was thereafter conducted on February 28th and on the 21st, 22d, 23d, and 24th days of March. Upon the opening day of said hearing the presiding commissioner stated for the information and guidance of the parties who had appeared therein that "the Commission felt that it was necessary we have a public hearing at which we would inquire first into the actual rates received by the company during 1921, or that portion of the year which followed the effective date of these new rates; also the operating costs of the company during that period, and if possible, estimates of future revenues and expenses, particularly for the year 1922." On March 22, 1922, upon the opening of the hearing of that day, the presiding commissioner made the following statement on behalf of the Commission as to the scope of the inquiry then in course of conduct and the limitations of the proceedings thereunder, as follows:

> "This hearing will be confined, as originally intended, to the points already brought out in the original order of the Commission calling for this investigation. The fundamentals, such as the rate base, rate of return, taxation, depreciation, severance damages, and those items, will not be considered at this hearing; but we will close this case as quickly as we can, submit it, and give our decision, and then this Commission will announce right now that it will institute a proceeding opening the whole matter wide enough to take in everything you please."

Certain of the parties interested in said proceeding as rate payers of said corporation, through their counsel, objected to this limitation of the said proceedings, and a colloquy ensued between such counsel and the presiding commissioner, in which the former insisted that the investigation conducted in the pending proceeding be sufficiently broad enough to include an inquiry into alleged errors of the Commission in its decision and order of 1921 in regard to the question of the state and federal taxes by the amount and method of the allowances for which the corporation was alleged to have been unjustly enriched at the expense of its consumers. The presiding commissioner stated that the present proceeding was to be regarded as in the nature of an emergency investigation, having for its purpose the immediate relief of the consumers from the higher rates allowed under the previous order, and that therefore such fundamentals as rate base, rate of return, taxation, depreciation, severance damages, and such items would not be considered at this hearing; but he assured counsel for said consumers making said insistence that the matter of taxation, as well as all other matters relative to a full consideration and final fixation of the rates of said corporation, not received for consideration at this hearing, would be given full consideration in another proceeding presently to be instituted by the Commission, wherein the entire subject of rates would be opened for investigation and in which all parties would be given an opportunity to be heard. The Commission thereupon, over the objection and exception of counsel for said consumers, restricted the inquiry to such matters as it deemed germane to its declared purpose of affording the consumers present relief from the former rates, and particularly refused, in the then pending investigation, to go into the question of taxation. After a hearing lasting over the period above indicated, and limited as above set forth, the Commission made its decision and order on April 24, 1922, the effect of which order was to so reduce the rates theretofore effective as to work a saving to the customers of the corporation of a large sum of money, estimated by the respondents herein at $1,600,000 per annum. The decision and order made and filed by the Commission on that day embraced the following statement as to the limitations placed by the Commission upon the scope of the particular proceeding before it, and upon the effect of its said order with respect to its finality regarding the so-called fundamental matters to be postponed to a later and broader investigation, viz.:

> "During the course of the hearings the Commission limited the proceeding to the consideration of what general modifications should be made in existing schedules of rates to eliminate unnecessary or unreasonable burdens where the same might exist, and what reduction should be made at this time to the benefit of the public in general based on the findings in decision No. 8815. C. R. C. vol. 19, p. 595. Consideration of the fundamental issues, such as rate base, rate of return, depreciation allowance, and allowance for taxes, were excluded in this proceeding. The Commission announced that it would institute on its own motion another proceeding in the nature of a regular rate hearing in which all of these fundamental issues would be fully considered."

A petition for rehearing was thereafter presented by those of the customers of said corporation appearing as petitioners herein. In said petition for rehearing the petitioners urged that the said order of the Commission was unlawful in so far as it operated to continue in effect the former order of the Commission as to the amount of taxes to be estimated and allowed the corporation as operating expenses, and also as to the allowance of any portion of the sum paid by the corporation as United States income taxes, as operating expenses. The Commission, in its order denying the petition for rehearing, filed on May 3, 1922, set forth the following as its reasons for denying the same:

> "Case No. 1710 was made in the nature of an emergency proceeding, and limited in its scope in order that certain reductions in rates might be made effective immediately. This course was agreed to in general by attorneys in the proceeding, and was made with the specific understanding that the Commission would, on its own motion, institute a further proceeding to investigate fully the rates, rules, and practices of the Southern California Edison Company. Pursuant thereto the Commission has instituted a proceeding into the entire question of the reasonableness of the rates, rules, and practices of the Southern California Edison Company (Case 1759), and, in view of this fact, and the limitations of the scope of Case No. 1710, it does not appear that there is any justification for granting a rehearing on the grounds set forth in the petition herein."

Thereafter, and on May 3, 1922, the petitioners herein presented their application for a writ of review, wherein the substance of the foregoing facts were set forth, and upon which they prayed for the annulment of the order of the Commission made and entered on April 24, 1922.

The first question presented for our consideration upon this application relates to the regularity of the proceedings and order of the Commission limiting the scope of the investigation pending before it so as to exclude therefrom an inquiry into the lawfulness and propriety of its former order relative to the amount of the taxes, state and federal, which the corporation had been allowed by said former order to charge to the account of operating expenses. It is to be observed that in making said order, having the effect of limiting the scope of the investigation then pending before it, and of preventing a present consideration of the subject of taxation as germane to rate fixation, the Commission was dealing strictly with the matter of its own procedure. It must be held equally clear that, under the enlarged powers with which the Railroad Commission is invested under the provisions of sections 22 and 23 of article 12 of the state Constitution, the said Commission has been intrusted with a very large, if not an almost unlimited, discretion, with relation to the inception, order, and conduct of proceedings before it. Practically the only limitation imposed upon the Commission in matters pending before it of the nature of those under review in the instant proceeding is that imposed by the terms of the federal and state Constitutions, requiring that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

In the case of San Joaquin Light & Power Co. v. Railroad Commission, 175 Cal. 74, 165 Pac. 16, this court quoted with approval the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the matter of Knoxville v. Knoxville Water Co., 212 U. S. 1, 29 Sup. Ct. 148, 53 L. Ed. 371, holding that the function of rate making is purely legislative in its character, and this is true whether it is conferred directly by the Legislature itself or by some subordinate or administrative body to whom the power of fixing rates in detail has been delegated; so that the only ground upon which the courts may interfere with the exercise of this function is that the action in question impairs constitutional rights. It may be conceded that if the record in the instant proceeding disclosed that by the limitations which the Commission placed upon the immediate inquiry before it these petitioners had been finally denied a hearing upon any question vital to a just and proper fixation of rates which this corporation should be allowed to charge the consumers of its product, and that such denial had resulted, or would result, in depriving them of property through the imposition of unjust and irregular rates, they might have recourse to the courts for relief against such unlawful exercise of the granted powers on the part of the Railroad Commission. But the record in the proceeding before us presents no such condition, since it affirmatively appears that the order of the Commission, in limiting the scope of the investigation before it, was but temporary in its operation and effect, and that in making said order the asserted rights of the parties before it were expressly preserved for later consideration in a proceeding which the Commission intended presently to institute, and in which every question involved in a general and final rate-making order affecting said corporation and all its consumers would be accorded full opportunity for consideration. The record further discloses that, as shown by the order of the Commission denying the petition for rehearing, such inclusive proceeding had in fact been instituted by the Commission prior to the making of the said last-named order, and was pending at the time of the inception of the proceedings herein for a writ of review.

Under the conditions as thus disclosed by this record, we are constrained to hold that the order which was made by the Railroad Commission limiting the scope of its inquiry in the proceeding pending before it, so as to exclude for the time being questions of taxes, upon which the petitioners herein were then insistent for a hearing, was fully within the discretionary power of the Commission as to matters of procedure, and that no constitutional rights of the petitioners herein were invaded by the action of the Commission in that regard. This conclusion necessarily puts an end to any further consideration of the other questions attempted to be presented to this court in this proceeding, since, if those questions were properly eliminated by the Commission from the proceeding before it, and if the order which it finally did make after their elimination by its express terms reserved for a more inclusive investigation and for final determination of the very matters which the petitioners herein are insisting should have been considered in the proceeding which they now seek to have reviewed, it follows necessarily that the petitioners have sustained no injury from any lack of jurisdiction in the Commission to make the orders complained of, nor any such injury from their effect as would justify recourse to the limited special proceeding of certiorari to review orders from which the petitioners have suffered no final or irremediable injury, but with regard to which their rights, if any, to ultimate relief, have been expressly reserved to them by the terms of the very orders of which they here complain.

The application is denied.

PEOPLE v. ZUVELA. (Cr. 2530.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 29, 1923.)

1. Criminal law 🔑1186(4)—Failure to impose sentence within time prescribed by statute held not error within Constitution requiring new trial.

Failure to impose sentence within the time prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1191, held an error of procedure merely, not resulting in a miscarriage of justice within Const. art. 6, § 4½, so as to warrant reversal for purpose of having new trial under Pen. Code, § 1202.

2. Seduction 🔑45—Reply of prosecutrix that she liked defendant held not to negative theory that promise of marriage induced intercourse.

Reply by prosecuting witness, "I liked him," in response to question whether accused's promise of marriage was the only inducing cause of her consent held not necessarily irreconcilable with the theory that the marriage promise was the only inducement.

Jerry Zuvela was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Harry A. Chamberlin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Erwin W. Widney, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LENNON, J. [1] The defendant was convicted in the court below of the crime of seduction under promise of marriage. He seeks to have the judgment there rendered reversed upon the ground that the sentence was not pronounced within the time prescribed by section 1191 of the Penal Code, and that he was therefore entitled to a new trial as a matter of right under the provisions of section 1202 of the Penal Code.

We are satisfied that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution operates to prevent the granting of a new trial for the error, if any, specified. This section of the Constitution provides that—

> "No judgment shall be set aside, or new trial granted, in any case, * * * for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

The failure to impose the sentence within the time specified by section 1191 of the Penal Code is clearly an "error" of "procedure." In Rankin v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 189, 106 Pac. 718, wherein it was sought to prohibit the trial court from imposing sentence after the lapse of time provided by section 1191 of the Penal Code, it was said:

> "If the court should refuse a new trial and render judgment against the defendant after the authorized time has passed, its action would be erroneous and the judgment would be reversed on appeal, if an appeal should be taken. But as it would be a judgment rendered by a court having jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the person, it would not be void, nor subject to collateral attack upon the ground of its untimely rendition. As the court, even if it does give judgment, as the petitioner alleges it to be about to do, will not be acting without, or in excess of its jurisdiction, prohibition is not maintainable."

We see no good reason for excepting this particular error from the general provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. After an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, we are satisfied that the error complained of in the instant case did not result in a miscarriage of justice. It will not, therefore, suffice to warrant a reversal of the judgment for the purpose of having a new trial.

tercourse was the defendant's promise of marriage is without merit. This contention is predicated upon the fact that the complaining witness, when questioned as to whether or not the defendant's promise of marriage was the only inducing cause of her consent, replied, "I liked him." This answer is not, however, necessarily irreconcilable with the theory that the act of sexual intercourse would not have been accomplished without, or in the absence of, such promise, and that the promise was the only inducement. There is in the record before us ample evidence to support the finding that the defendant had on numerous occasions promised to marry the complaining witness, and had discussed the question of marriage with her in the presence of her sisters and her brother-in-laws, and with them. There is also the direct testimony of the complaining witness that on the occasion of the first act of sexual intercourse the defendant took her to a rooming house in Los Angeles, and that at that time "he asked me to give up, that he was going to marry me in a few days."

It was held in People v. Wallace, 109 Cal. 611, 42 Pac. 159, that the evidence was sufficient, in a charge of this character, to support the verdict if the circumstances disclosed be such as to warrant the jury in the deduction that the act would not have been accomplished without, or in the absence of, such promise. Such an inference is, in our opinion, amply justified by the circumstances disclosed by the record before us.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte LEVIN. (Cr. 2560.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1923.)

1. Habeas corpus 🔑92(3)—Finding that petitioner was able to pay alimony ordered is conclusive in habeas corpus proceeding to secure release from imprisonment for contempt in failure to pay.

In habeas corpus proceedings to secure the release from imprisonment for contempt for failure to pay alimony, the court's finding of fact in its order of commitment that petitioner was able to comply with the order for payment is conclusive.

2. Habeas corpus 🔑3—Grounds for release from imprisonment for failure to pay alimony should be presented first to superior court.

Where release from imprisonment for contempt in failure to pay alimony is sought on the ground of petitioner's inability to pay under Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 2, the question should be presented first in the superior court.

3. Habeas corpus 🔑92(3)—Recitation in order of commitment not reviewable on petition for habeas corpus to secure release.

The court's recital in its order of commitment for contempt in failure to pay alimony that evidence of petitioner's ability was received is conclusive, and precludes consideration of that question on application for a writ of habeas corpus; such a writ being incapable of use as a basis for review as upon appeal.

Petition by Myer Levin for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

R. M. J. Armstrong and A. M. Marks, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, C. J. [1] The petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt for failure to pay alimony and counsel fees in a divorce proceeding brought against him by his wife. He seeks relief from said imprisonment upon the ground that he was unable to pay said amount at the time of the adjudication of contempt, and that he was deprived of the opportunity of proving his inability to pay said amount upon the hearing of the contempt proceedings. The court found as a fact in its order of commitment that the petitioner was able to comply with the order, and this adjudication is conclusive on habeas corpus. Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266, Ex parte Clark, 110 Cal. 405, 42 Pac. 905; Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 417, 420; Matter of Maginnis, 162 Cal. 200, 206, 121 Pac. 723.

[2] The petitioner also alleges that he is now unable to comply with the order, and for that reason his imprisonment should terminate. Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 2. This question should have been presented to the superior court in the first instance. Ex parte Wilson, 73 Cal. 97, 14 Pac. 393; In re Wilson, 75 Cal. 580, 17 Pac. 698; Code Civ. Proc. § 1143 et seq.; Spencer v. Lawler, 79 Cal. 215, 21 Pac. 742.

[3] The petitioner claims that he was denied the right to present his evidence as to his inability to comply with the order of the court. It is sufficient on this point to say that the order of commitment recites that evidence was received in support of the charge of contempt, and, in view of this recital, we cannot consider that question. The writ of habeas corpus cannot be used as a basis for review as upon appeal. Ex parte Cottrell, supra, 59 Cal. 422.

The petition is denied, and the prisoner remanded.

WRENN v. DORMODY.

(Civ. 2563.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 9, 1923.)

Homestead ⚿142(1) — Homestead covered by declaration held not to continue to exist after death of wife and remarriage and removal of husband.

Where, after the filing of a declaration of homestead by a husband on property then occupied by himself and wife, the wife died, and the husband remarried and removed to another residence, held, that, under Code Civ. Proc. 1909, § 1474, or as amended by St. 1911, p. 254, for practical purposes, there was no longer any community homestead in existence upon the property covered by the declaration, and that, after the death of both the husband and wife, the court did not err in setting aside, under authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, the premises last resided in as a homestead for the use of the minor children of the second marriage.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Quincy Wrenn, deceased. From a judgment selecting and setting apart a homestead for minor children, William B. D. Wrenn and Martha Agnes Wrenn, upon the petition of their guardian, Nellie E. Dormody, Joseph T. Wrenn, executor, appeals. Affirmed.

E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, for appellant.

Abe Darlington, of Placerville, and Charles A. Swisler, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by the executor of the estate of John Quincy Wrenn, deceased, from a judgment selecting, designating, and setting apart a probate homestead for two certain minor children of the decedent.

The proceeding is founded on section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which, among other things, provides for the setting apart, under certain indicated circumstances, of a homestead for the use of the minor children, out of the common property, or, if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to the deceased.

The facts are: The deceased, who was a retired physician, was a resident of Placerville, Cal., for many years prior to his death on January 14, 1921. He was twice married. By his first wife, Elizabeth K. Wrenn, he had two children, Florence and Joseph T. Wrenn, of whom the latter alone was living at the time of the filing of the petition herein on the 13th day of August, 1921; the daughter, Florence, having died prior to said time.

On the 17th day of February, 1892, and during the life of his first wife and while they were living together as husband and wife, the deceased filed in the recorder's office of the county of El Dorado a declaration of homestead on lot No. 4, in block No. 43 of the city of Placerville. The deceased and his family were, at that time, residing on said premises. Subsequently to the filing of said homestead, the wife of the deceased, Elizabeth K. Wrenn, died, and thereafter the deceased again married; his second wife being Sarah E. Wrenn. The deceased and his second wife continued to live on the property upon which the declaration of homestead was filed by the former in February, 1892, and occupied said premises until the month of October, 1920, when they removed to a house which deceased purchased in said month situated at 61 Coloma street, in said city of Placerville, several doors above the old family home, and there he and his family took up their residence and continued to reside until January 14, 1921, when, as above stated, he passed out of this life. The issue of the second marriage consisted of two children, to wit, William B. D. Wrenn and Martha Agnes Wrenn, and these children, with their mother, after the death of Dr. Wrenn, continued to reside on the premises at 61 Coloma street until the death of Sarah E. Wrenn on May 18, 1921, which was approximately four months after the death of Dr. Wrenn.

Dr. Wrenn left a will, dated March 4, 1920, in which, after making several bequests to relatives and friends, he devised the old family residence at 49 Coloma street in said city to Sarah E. Wrenn, his wife. The balance of his estate was divided equally between his heirs at law, Sarah E. Wrenn, Joseph T. Wrenn, a son of the deceased by his first wife, and the two children of the last marriage, William B. D. and Martha Agnes Wrenn. As stated, Sarah E. Wrenn died on the 18th day of May, 1921. She left a will leaving all her estate, both real and personal, to her two children, William B. D. and Martha Agnes Wrenn, and naming Nellie E. Dormody as the guardian of their persons and estates and also as the executrix of her will.

On the 13th day of August, 1921, the said Nellie E. Dormody, as the guardian of the persons and estates of the said William B. D. and Martha Agnes Wrenn, filed a petition with the clerk of the superior court of El Dorado county, praying that the family residence at 61 Coloma street be set aside as a homestead for said two children. These children were minors at the time of the filing of said petition.

The petition of the said Nellie E. Dormody alleged, among other things, that no homestead had ever been selected, designated, and set aside by John Quincy Wrenn during his lifetime, and further alleged that said John Quincy Wrenn and his family had resided at 61 Coloma street continuously until his death. It also alleged, although this allegation is not material to the determination of the ques-

Wrenn in her will "requested that the said family home be kept intact and that said minors be kept and maintained therein." The petition was in due time answered by Joseph T. Wrenn, as executor of the will of John Quincy Wrenn, deceased, after a demurrer to said petition had been overruled by the court. By said answer the allegation of the petition that the deceased, John Quincy Wrenn, did not in his lifetime select, designate, and set aside and cause to be recorded a homestead was denied, and in this connection the answer set up the declaration of homestead filed by said John Quincy Wrenn with the county recorder of El Dorado county, and alleged that the said "declaration of homestead has never been canceled, abandoned, or disposed of as the homestead of John Quincy Wrenn." The answer further denied the allegation of the petition that the premises at 61 Coloma street had been used continuously by the deceased and his family up to the time of his death, and alleges that he and "his family had merely moved into the house at 61 Coloma street temporarily or until certain repairs could be made upon the homestead at 49 Coloma street."

Testimony was received in support of and in opposition to the allegations of the petition, and the court made its findings of fact in accordance with the facts as set forth in the said petition. Among other things, the court found that the property described as lot No. 6 in block 43 (known as 61 Coloma street) of said city of Placerville was the community property of said John Quincy Wrenn and his wife, Sarah E. Wrenn; that said lot contains the dwelling house in which said John Quincy Wrenn and his family resided up to the time of his death and in which his famly continued to reside thereafter; that the same is suitable for a homestead for said minors; that the said real property does not exceed in value the sum of $5,000, but is of the value of $3,500.

The single question presented here for decision is whether, as counsel for the appellant contends is true, the trial court transcended its lawful power in setting aside the property at No. 61 Coloma street as a probate homestead for the use and benefit of the two above-named minor children of the deceased by his second wife. The contention of the appellant is that two homesteads cannot be declared and acquired by a party, and that therefore a party having already acquired a homestead, any attempt by him or her to acquire a second homestead while the former is still in force or has not been destroyed by abandonment, as provided by section 1243 of the Civil Code, is absolutely void. The proposition thus stated is sound, if the premise from which it proceeds supports it. See Waggle v. Worthy, 74 Cal. 268, 15 Pac. 831, 5 Am. St. Rep. 445; Estate of Clavo, 6 Cal. App. 774, 776, 93 Pac. 295. There is, however, no question of abandonment in this case; the proposition simply being whether the homestead declared and recorded by the deceased, Dr. Wrenn, in the year 1892, inured as a homestead to the use and benefit of his second wife or the second community. Section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure itself seems to determine the proposition adversely to the contention of the appellant. Said section provides:

> "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both are living, was selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor. If the homestead was selected from the separate property of either the husband or wife, without his or her consent, it vests, on the death of the person from whose property it was selected, in his or her heirs, or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent. * * *"

It will be observed that under the foregoing section, where the homestead is selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests on the death of the husband or wife absolutely in the survivor. If, however, it was selected from the separate property of either the husband or wife without his or her consent, it vests on the death of the person from whose property it was selected in his or her heirs or devisees, subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent. In this case it does not appear whether the homestead declared by Dr. Wrenn was from his or his first wife's separate property or from the community. The homestead declaration makes no reference to the character of the property from which the homestead was selected, nor did the first wife of the deceased join in the selection of the homestead. But whether it was selected from the community property of the spouses or from the separate property of the one or the other without the consent or the joining in of such selection by the spouse whose separate property it was, the result, so far as this case is concerned, would be the same. If it was community property or the separate property of Dr. Wrenn, then, upon the death of his first wife, the property vested absolutely in him, with power to dispose of it as he might see fit, the property, however, retaining the characteristic of a homestead to the extent that it was exempt from forced sale for the debts of the survivor. Tyrell v. Baldwin, 78 Cal. 470, 21 Pac. 116; Dicky v. Gibson, 113 Cal. 30, 45 Pac. 15, 54 Am. St. Rep. 321. The record does not disclose the date of the death of the first wife, but if it was her separate property, she not having joined in the declaration or the selection of the homestead, the property, if she died prior to the amendment of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the year 1911 would go to her heirs (see Deering's Code Civ. Proc. 1909, § 1474), but if she died after the amendment of 1911 went into effect then it would go either to her heirs or devisees (Stats. 1911, p. 254). Thus readily will it be seen that at the time of the marriage of Dr. Wrenn to Sarah E. Wrenn, his second wife, there was, to all practical intents and purposes, no homestead in existence upon the property referred to.

This question, however, has been squarely passed upon by the higher courts. In Estate of Clavo, 6 Cal. App. 774, 93 Pac. 295, supra, one Charles Clavo filed a declaration of homestead during the life of his first wife upon a certain piece of property which belonged to his separate estate. His wife joined him in the execution of the declaration of homestead. Thereafter the said wife died and Clavo again married, and subsequently to his second marriage he alone executed and filed a declaration of homestead upon the same property. The point urged on appeal was that "a party cannot have two homesteads, and if he attempts to acquire a second while the first is in force the second is void." This court held that the force of the homestead first declared had expired by reason of the fact that upon the death of the first wife of Clavo the property upon which the homestead was declared vested under the terms of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure absolutely in the surviving husband, Clavo. It was therein said:

> "Upon the death of the first wife the title to the property became vested absolutely in the husband, and he was clothed with complete dominion over it, but by virtue of the statute it still retained some characteristics of a homestead, among them being exemption from execution. While that exemption continued he could not select another and different homestead. But the title having vested completely in the husband upon the death of his wife, the property could not, in the very nature of the case, continue as a homestead for the benefit of the second community. The unqualified title of one of the spouses to the property is inconsistent with the existence of a homestead for the benefit of both. After his second marriage, in order to clothe the property with all the attributes of a community homestead, it was necessary for the husband to file another declaration. This he did as he had a right to do, and the effect of it was that upon his death the property vested absolutely in his widow as it would have vested in the former wife under the first declaration if she had survived him."

In Zanone v. Sprague, 16 Cal. App. 333, 116 Pac. 989, one Alfred Coad duly declared and filed a homestead upon his separate property. Thereafter said Coad was divorced from his wife and subsequently thereto he again married and resided with his second wife upon the premises upon which the said homestead was filed, until the time of his death in 1906. After the death of Coad an action was brought by the first wife for the purpose of determining her claim that she was the owner of the fee in the premises by reason of the said homestead thereon, the same never having been abandoned. Her claim was not sustained. It was, however, said in the opinion in that case, upon the authority of Estate of Clavo, supra:

> "Of course, it will not be contended that the homestead in question here could inure to the benefit of the second wife."

There are many cases reviewed in Estate of Clavo, supra, and we refer also to those for further light upon the question herein involved. It is very clear that the court below did not go beyond the authority conferred upon it by section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure in setting aside the premises in question as a homestead for the use of the minor children of the deceased by his second wife.

HYMAN v. STERN. (Civ. 4170.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. April 14, 1923.)

Execution ⚷251(1)—Purchase of stock worth $2,000 for $15 at sheriff's sale held void where purchaser knew of its true value.

A purchase by defendant manager and president of corporation, the judgment creditor, of plaintiff's stock therein at a sheriff's sale for $15, the stock being worth $2,000, held void where defendant knew the true value of the stock, and plaintiff, through no fault of hers, had no knowledge of the sale, and defendant knew of her address, but failed to notify her, and he and his attorney were the only persons present at the sale.

CURTIS, J. The appellant and respondent were two of the organizers, stockholders, and directors of the Karl Stern Company, a corporation. The defendant was at all times the president, general manager, and a director of said company, and the owner of 1,438 shares of the capital stock thereof out of 1,600 shares of said company outstanding, and was at all times in active management and control of the business and affairs of said company; plaintiff at all times, up to the execution sale herein involved, was the owner of 100 shares of the capital stock of said company, which had a value of approximately $2,000. Plaintiff was the secretary and treasurer of said company from its organization up to April 1, 1919. She was also in the employ of said company from the date of its formation up to the 10th day of August, 1918, at which date she left the employ of the company. About February 11, 1919, she commenced an action in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles against the said Karl Stern Company for moneys alleged to be due her for services rendered. And about June 11, 1919, she recovered judgment against said company for the sum of $838.75 and costs. The company appealed from said judgment and the same was reversed on May 20, 1920. 47 Cal. App. 605, 191 Pac. 47. As a reading ot the opinion will reveal, the judgment was reversed for the reason that the appellate court held the same to be excessive in an amount of approximately between $40 and $50. On the reversal of said judgment, the Karl Stern Company was awarded its costs on appeal, amounting to $97.30, and the cost bill showing said costs was served on plaintiff's attorney in that action on or about July 21, 1920, but said attorney failed to notify plaintiff of that fact, and plaintiff had no actual knowledge thereof until about February 21, 1921. On August 3, 1920, the defendant, Karl Stern, acting as president of the Karl Stern Company, caused an execution to be issued on said judgment for costs on appeal, against said plaintiff, and caused the same to levied on plaintiff's stock in said Karl Stern Company, and said levy was made by the sheriff, leaving a copy of said execution with the defendant, said Karl Stern, as president of said Karl Stern Company, and said defendant as such president signed an answer to said garnishment and delivered the same to the sheriff; thereafter, and on August 11, 1920, said stock was sold on execution sale, and the defendant Karl Stern was the only bidder at said sale, and became the purchaser of said stock for himself, personally, for the sum of $15. Plaintiff did not discover the fact of said judgment for costs or said execution sale until about February 1, 1921, and on February 25, 1921, she tendered to defendant, and offered to pay him, the total amount of said judgment with interest and costs, amounting to $102.40. The evidence shows that the defendant and his attorney were the only persons present at the time of the execution sale, and the defendant made no effort whatever to inform the plaintiff of the judgment against her, and never demanded its payment, either of plaintiff or plaintiff's attorney. Plaintiff, therefore, instituted this action and recovered a judgment against the defendant, Karl Stern, wherein it was decreed that upon payment by said plaintiff to said defendant, or to the clerk of said superior court for said defendant, within 30 days from the docketing of said judgment, of the sum of $15.57 and the balance due on the judgment against said plaintiff and in favor of Karl Stern Company, a corporation, for costs on appeal, then and in that event that the sheriff's sale under execution of said stock be vacated, annulled, and set aside. The defendant appeals from this judgment.

Appellant contends that the most that can be said of plaintiff's case from the foregoing statement of facts is that it is an action to set aside a sheriff's sale, lawfully made, because the price and the value of the property sold is greatly disproportionate, and that under the decisions of our state, mere inadequacy of price is not alone sufficient to set aside such a sale. In support of his contentions he relies upon the cases of Rauer v. Hertweck, 175 Cal. 278, 165 Pac. 946, and Bock v. Losekamp, 179 Cal. 674, 179 Pac. 516. These cases undoubtedly support appellant in his contention as to the law of this state.

There is more, however, in the present case than mere inadequacy of consideration. From a casual reading of the statement of facts it must be apparent that not only did the defendant purchase plaintiff's stock at a price which was grossly inadequate, but he did it knowing full well its true value, and in the absence of plaintiff, who had no actual knowledge of the sale, and whose ignorance in that regard was not due to any fault or negligence on her part. These facts bring the case clearly within the rule laid down in the case of Odell v. Cox, 151 Cal. 70, 90 Pac. 194, where a sale of stock under execution, under facts very similar to those in the present case, was set aside by the court. Mr. Justice Angellotti, rendering the opinion of the court, uses the following language:

> "Under the circumstances appearing, it devolved on Cox, if he proposed to purchase the stock at this practically secret sale, in the exercise of that degree of fairness which both law and common honesty required, to offer a price bearing some semblance to what he knew to be its value, or at least to refrain from taking it for what he knew to be practically nothing."

This language applies with equal force to the case before us. The defendant, who was the president and manager of the judgment creditor, the Karl Stern Company, and who owned 90 per cent. of its capital stock, was, besides his attorney, the only person present at the sale. As we have already seen, he knew the true value of the stock; he was well acquainted with the plaintiff and knew her address; she had no actual knowledge of the sale, and he not only failed to notify her, but in her absence he purchased for $15 the 100 shares of stock, worth approximately $2,000, and from which sale there is no redemption.

Regarding such a transaction we feel that the following words of the Supreme Court of the United States are peculiarly applicable:

> "It would be a reproach to a court of equity if it could not lay hold of such a transaction as this is shown to be, and set aside a sale of property acquired under the forms of law and in defiance of natural justice." Schroeder v. Young, 161 U. S. 334, 16 Sup. Ct. 512, 40 L. Ed. 721.

Appellant further contends that there is no evidence to support certain findings set forth in his brief. We have examined the record before us and find ample evidence therein to support all such findings.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

CRAIG, J. This is an action by the plaintiff and respondent against the defendant and appellant to recover a balance of salary claimed to be due her from the defendant. Plaintiff was one of the organizers, a stockholder, and a director of the corporation. She worked for it from April 1, 1917, to August 10, 1918, and was paid $15 per week for the first year and $17.50 per week from April 1, 1918, until August 10, 1918, upon which last date she left the employ of the defendant.

[1] This is an appeal after the second trial of the issues in this litigation. Subsequent to the first trial an appeal was taken, which was passed upon by the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 1, and an opinion filed May 20, 1920 (47 Cal. App. 605, 191 Pac. 47), therein. In that decision the issues of law tendered by appellant on this appeal were determined. It was there said:

> "The first contention of the by-laws declaring that the directors should fix the salaries of officers and employees was not complied with, and that any arrangement entered into between Stern and the plaintiff as to salaries to be paid was invalid. We think there is no merit in this contention. If the two persons who owned and controlled the corporation to all substantial effect agreed upon the salaries to be paid, where the corporate form was adopted only as a convenient agency for the handling of the business, such an agreement we think was valid and binding."

This statement of the law must be accepted as controlling the same issue argued in the appellant's brief in the instant appeal, in which it is contended that the defendant corporation is not responsible for the statements of Karl Stern to the plaintiff prior to the organization of the corporation, and that a resolution of the board of directors is essential.

[2] It is unnecessary to set forth in hæc verba the findings to which exception is taken. The appellant's ground of appeal that the evidence does not support the findings concerns the conversations between the plaintiff and Karl Stern. The matters involved in the claim that the findings are not supported are: 1. Did the conversations take place? 2. If so, did the statements made constitute agreements? 3. If agreements were made, do they bind the corporation? 4. Were the services rendered? There is no dispute as to the fact of the rendition of the services. What we have said previously disposes of the third proposition. As to the first and second, the most that can be claimed on behalf of the appellant is that there was a conflict of evidence. The plaintiff testified to certain conversations between herself and Karl Stern. Granting that the defendant offered evidence to the contrary, it was the peculiar province of the trial court to weigh the testimony, and that of the plaintiff was apparently accepted, and the decision of the trial court in that regard is final.

[3] The court found that the defendant agreed and promised to pay the plaintiff $25 per week the first day of April, 1917, to the first day of April, 1918, and $27.50 per week from the first day of April, 1918, to and including the 9th day of August, 1918. Appellant excepts especially to this finding and claims that the transcript contains no testimony that any contract was ever entered into between the plaintiff and any officer of the defendant corporation in which it was stipulated that she was to receive $25 per week or any other sum for her services. It is true that in the conversation as related by the plaintiff, which she testified took place between Karl Stern and herself just prior to the first meeting of the board of directors, it is not stated that $25 per week or any other sum was specified as the future salary of the plaintiff. However, the trial court found that such an agreement was made, and the inquiry in this court must be directed to a determination of whether or not there is evidence from which an inference of the fact as found might have been fairly drawn. It is apparent that the latter part of the conversation as detailed would have no application if the amount of Mrs. Hyman's salary had not been previously mentioned. She testified that Stern said it would be to the advantage of the corporation to get along on as little money as possible and "leave as much money in the company as we could leave in"; also, that she said she could "get along on $15 per week," and he said he would draw about the same amount himself, and "we would leave the rest in the corporation." Clearly, there had been some discussion as to what salary both parties were to receive.

The plaintiff testified to another conversation, which she said took place at the annual meeting of the corporation in April, 1918. We quote from her evidence as follows:

> "Yes, sir. I asked for an advance in salary, which would make my salary $27.50, and that advance was granted to each one of us, the other salesman, as well as myself; each one received $2.50 per week advance. Then that made me draw out $17.50; that was the advance paid to me on the amount I was drawing out of the corporation. Q. Well, from that time on what did you draw down? A. $17.50 per week."

Here is direct testimony that her salary had been $25 per week. To be sure, it was given as a conclusion of the witness, but no objection or motion to strike was made, and it remains in the record as evidence which the trial court unquestionably considered in making the finding that an agreement had been entered into to pay Mrs. Hyman $25 per week. Although the testimony supporting the finding in question is not as clear or as complete as might be desired, we consider that the transcript contains sufficient evidence in that behalf to sustain it.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRAY v. YARBROUGH et al.
(Civ. 2543.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 21, 1923.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇨3(3)—Agreement for sale of property and retention by seller of proceeds above certain amount held to create relation of principal and agent.

A contract between the owner of property and another authorizing such other, referred to as agent, to "undertake the sale" of the property, and to "so continue his efforts to sell * * * until same has been disposed of * * * and * * * said agent shall be entitled to retain all over and above the net price herein named as his fee for negotiating said sale," held to create the relation of principal and agent, and not that of vendor and purchaser under an option.

2. Contracts ⇨177—Although relation of parties under contract determinable from terms of contract, some weight must be given to their designation of the relation.

Though the relation of parties is to be determined from the terms of the contract rather than the name they have given the relation, some weight must be given to their designation of it.

3. Principal and agent ⇨71—Fraud of selling agent in inducing owner to accept less than initial payment previously contemplated held actionable.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 2322, 2228, 2229, 2234, 2237, as to duties of agents and trustees, where an agent to sell land was obligated to use his best efforts to obtain for his principal an initial payment of "not less than $1,000 cash net to the owner," but by false and fraudulent representations induced the owner to make the sale on cash payment of only $200, such fraud was actionable, notwithstanding the fact that the agent was entitled to any excess above the fixed price as his commission, the agent's nonliability as to such excess not exempting him from his obligation to secure sale upon the terms named by the owner.

4. Limitation of actions ⇨195(5)—Burden to show discovery of fraud within limitation period held on plaintiff.

In action by principal against agent for fraud in the sale of land, the burden was upon plaintiff to show that he first discovered the fraud within three years prior to the commencement of the action, under Code Civ. Proc. § 338.

5. Limitation of actions ⇨179(2)—Complaint must show facts with relation to the discovery of fraud.

Where an action for relief on the ground of fraud is brought after the expiration of the three-year period of Code Civ. Proc. § 338, the complaint must show when the fraud was discovered, which must be within the three-year period, and why it was not sooner discovered, and the circumstances under which it was discovered.

6. Pleading ⚿433(1)—A defect in complaint not cured by findings unsupported by evidence.

A defect in complaint cannot be cured by findings which are unsupported by evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by Harry J. Gray against P. L. Yarbrough and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

See, also, 212 Pac. 226.

John R. Connelly and Evan J. Hughes, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Charles A. Bliss, of Sacramento, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The controversy between the parties arose out of the following contract, executed on the day it bears date:

"Sacramento, Cal. Aug. 27, 1917.

"It is hereby agreed this day by and between Harry J. Gray, owner of two quarter sections of land near Lincoln, California, and P. L. Yarbrough, agent, that in consideration of the sum of $300.00 cash in hand aid by said Yarbrough to said Gray, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, that said Gray will have assigned and deliver to said Yarbrough one certain promissory note given by said Yarbrough to Harry T. Fuller.

"And furthermore it is agreed by and between the parties hereto that said agent shall undertake the sale of the westerly quarter section of said land at a net price to owner of $3,200, and of the easterly quarter section of land referred to at a net price to owner of $5,000, and shall so continue his efforts to sell either or both of said quarter sections until same has been disposed of to the satisfaction of both parties hereto and that on the sale of either or both quarter sections said agent shall be entitled to retain all over and above the said net prices herein named as his fee for negotiating said sale.

"It is further agreed by said agent that on the sale of either or both quarter sections aforenamed that the said agent will deduct from his fee thus earned, in excess of abovementioned net price to owner, the amount or sum of three hundred eighteen and 20/100 dollars ($318.20), being the amount of said note, principal and interest discounted to said agent, and that said discount shall be paid to said owner at the time of said sale of land.

"Terms of sale on said land to be not less than $1,000.00 cash net to owner on the westerly quarter section and not less than $1,500.00, cash net to owner on the easterly quarter section and no wood to be removed from land without the written consent of present owner; balance to be paid on or before 5 years with equal annual installments of principal, and six per cent. interest on deferred payments. Harry J. Gray, Owner.

"P. L. Yarbrough, Agent."

The terms of the contract were carried out in a manner satisfactory to the parties thereto, excepting the sale of the parcel of land listed at the price of $3,200. Yarbrough was a real estate agent in Sacramento. One Lamy was the owner of 320 acres of land in North Dakota and an equity in certain property in Alhambra, but it appears that such equity proved to be of no value. F. W. Herbert and C. D. Ackerman resided in Los Angeles. After the execution of the contract the defendant, through Herbert and Ackerman, entered into an agreement with Lamy to exchange plaintiff's quarter section of land to be subject to a mortgage for $3,000, for Lamy's North Dakota and Alhambra properties. In order to carry the deal through, defendant, Herbert, and Ackerman agreed among themselves that Herbert would take title to plaintiff's land and give the latter a promissory note for $3,000, secured by a mortgage on the land, they three to have an interest in the note to the extent of $800. Herbert was then to convey the land to Lamy, subject to the mortgage, and take title to the North Dakota and Alhambra properties and hold the same for the benefit of the three in equal shares. They three further agreed either to advance the $1,000 necessary to make the cash payment to plaintiff, as provided in the contract, or to secure the same by a mortgage to be executed by Herbert on the North Dakota land. The court found, on conflicting evidence, that, after the foregoing understanding had been reached, the defendant informed plaintiff that a sale could be made to Herbert for $4,000, $1,000 cash and the said note and mortgage for $3,000, in which defendant was to have an interest of $800. Plaintiff agreed to the proposition, and defendant so informed Herbert. Herbert then wrote defendant to have plaintiff execute a deed and forward the same to a bank in Hollywood, with instructions to deliver it to Herbert on receipt of $1,000 and his promissory note and mortgage, as agreed upon. Instead of doing this the defendant falsely and fraudulently represented to plaintiff that only $200 could be obtained as a cash payment and proposed that plaintiff accept that sum and Herbert's note and mortgage for $3,000 in full payment for the land, the defendant to have no interest in the note. Believing defendant's representations and relying thereon, plaintiff agreed to the proposition and conveyed the land as proposed. Upon receipt of plaintiff's deed. Herbert conveyed the land, subject to the mortgage, to Lamy and received in exchange therefor Lamy's deed to the North Dakota and Alhambra properties. Defendant denied having made such false representations and testified that the change from a cash payment of $1,000 to one of $200 was made to satisfy plaintiff's wishes, with full knowledge on his part of all the facts, because the plaintiff preferred to have the entire interest in the mortgage. Defendant's testimony in this connection is somewhat discredited by a statement appearing in his letter to Herbert, as follows:

> "I have been so fortunate as to persuade the owner to accept the $3,000 mortgage and $200 in cash in full payment for the land, which obviates the necessity of taking an interest in the mortgage, and of putting 800 in the deal."

In any event, the court's finding on the conflicting evidence is conclusive.

No part of the mortgage debt, either principal or interest, was ever paid, and plaintiff foreclosed the same. No other bidder appearing at the foreclosure sale, the plaintiff bid in the land for the amount of the note, interest, costs, and taxes.

Plaintiff's deed was delivered to Herbert October 20, 1917. Herbert sold the North Dakota land on or about the 1st of May, 1918, for the net sum of $4,720.11. In a suit brought by defendant against Herbert, the former was given judgment on May 2, 1921, for $1,573.37 on account of his one-third interest in the net proceeds of such sale. This action was commenced September 1, 1921. The plaintiff was given judgment for $1,573.37, with interest thereon from October 20, 1917. From this judgment the defendant Yarbrough has appealed.

Appellant contends that the contract of August 27, 1917, "created the relationship of vendor and purchaser with an option and not that of principal and agent between Gray and Yarbrough." In support of this contention he cites Robinson v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 93 Cal. 80, 28 Pac. 796, 27 Am. St. Rep. 167; Synnott v. Shaughnessy, 2 Idaho, 122, 7 Pac. 82, and Hutton v. Sherrard, 183 Mich. 356, 150 N. W. 135, L. R. A. 1915E, 976. The contracts involved in those cases, while materially different from that here under consideration, authorized sales at fixed prices, the persons effecting the sales to retain as commissions all that was received above such prices. In the first case it is said:

> "The relation of the defendant to the plaintiffs was not that of a mere agent. * * * The relation thus created between them was rather that of a vendor and purchaser under a contract of sale than one of principal and agent, and a sale by the defendant thereunder was in the capacity of a vendor upon its own account, and not for the account of the plaintiffs."

As indicated in the opinion, however, this holding was not necessary to the decision, and it may fairly be said that the decision was based upon the other grounds stated by the court. In a note following the report of the case in 27 Am. St. Rep. 171, the author expresses disapproval of the statement quoted, and the same is expressly disapproved in Burnett v. Potts, 236 Ill. 501, 86 N. E. 259. In Tate v. Aiken, 5 Cal. App. 505, 90 Pac. 836, involving a somewhat similar contract, appellants cited Robinson v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., in support of their contention that such contract was one of option rather than agency. The appellate court held that the contract created the relation of principal and agent, and the Supreme Court denied appellant's petition for a hearing. The Robinson Case is cited in Smith v. Blodget, 187 Cal. 235, 240, 201 Pac. 584, 586, where it is said:

> "Whether an agreement permitting a person 'to sell' land on certain terms creates the relation of principal and agent or that of vendor and purchaser under a contract of sale depends upon the intention of the parties."

Language of similar import to that used in the Robinson Case is found in Synnott v. Shaughnessy, supra; but there, also, such holding was not necessary to the conclusion reached. Hutton v. Sherrard, supra, does not hold that the relation created by the contract involved therein was not that of principal and agent, but that there was no such conflict between the interests of the principal and agent as would prevent the latter from selling the property to himself at the price and on the terms fixed by the contract. The great weight of authority in other jurisdictions is to the effect that an owner's agreement authorizing another to make a sale and retain all of the proceeds above a fixed price creates the relation of principal and agent. Burnett v. Potts, supra; Mulvane v. O'Brien, 58 Kan. 463, 49 Pac. 607; Chesbrough v. Vizard Inv. Co., 156 Ky. 149, 160 S. W. 725; Brittson v. Smith, 165 Mich. 222, 130 N. W. 599; Chezum v. Kreighbaum, 4 Wash. 680, 30 Pac. 1098, 32 Pac. 109; Shepard v. Pabst, 149 Wis. 35, 135 N. W. 158.

[1, 2] The contract in this case was drafted by the defendant. Its terms were essentially different from those in the Robinson contract. The defendant agreed, as agent, to "undertake the sale" of the land and to "so continue his efforts to sell * * * until same has been disposed of to the satisfaction of both parties hereto, and * * * said agent shall be entitled to retain all over and above the said net prices herein named as his fee for negotiating said sale." In the opening paragraph he described himself as "agent" and five times thereafter refers to himself as "agent" and the word "agent" follows his signature to the contract. The instrument is not an option, but a binding contract by which the defendant obligated himself, not to purchase, but to use his best efforts to sell or negotiate a sale of the land. While the relation between the parties is to be determined from the terms of the contract rather than the name they have given that relation, some weight must be given to their designation thereof. Title Insurance & Trust Co. v. Grider, 152 Cal. 746, 94 Pac. 601. To hold, under all the circumstances of this case, that the defendant was not the agent of the plaintiff would be to trifle with the rights of the parties in disregard of their manifest intention as expressed in the contract between them.

[3] If the sale had been made in accordance with the terms of the contract of agency, any false representations as to what defendant was to receive by reason of the sale would have been immaterial, and not actionable fraud, because plaintiff had no interest in any excess received above the fixed price, and defendant was not plaintiff's agent for the purpose of obtaining such excess, but was acting for himself in that regard and in his own interest, the only restriction being that he must not violate his duty to plaintiff in his efforts to obtain or increase his own compensation. The defendant would have had the right, under the express terms of the contract, to such excess, without the consent and against the objection of plaintiff. The plaintiff knew that the defendant and his associates were to receive property of some character in exchange for the former's land, and the nature, location, or value of such property was not material, nor did the want of knowledge thereof in any manner influence plaintiff's conduct. But defendant was obligated to use his best efforts to obtain for his principal an initial payment of "not less than $1,000 cash net to owner." If he willfully failed to discharge this obligation, and induced the plaintiff, by false and fraudulent representations, to make the sale on a cash payment of only $200, such fraud is actionable. An agent may not "do any act which a trustee is forbidden to do." Civ. Code, § 2322; Calmon v. Sarraille, 142 Cal. 638, 76 Pac. 486; Smith v. Elderton, 16 Cal. App. 424, 117 Pac. 563. "In all matters connected with his trust, a trustee is bound to act in the highest good faith toward his beneficiary, and may not obtain any advantage therein over the latter by the slightest misrepresentation, concealment, threat, or adverse pressure of any kind." Civ. Code, § 2228. "A trustee may not use or deal with the trust property for his own profit, or for any other purpose unconnected with the trust in any manner." Civ. Code, § 2229. "Every violation of the provisions of the preceding sections of this article is a fraud against the beneficiary of a trust." Civ. Code, § 2234. "A trustee who uses or disposes of the trust property, contrary to section twenty-two hundred and twenty-nine, may, at the option of the beneficiary, be required to account for all profits so made, or to pay the value of its use, and, if he has disposed thereof, to replace it, with its fruits, or to account for its proceeds, with interest." Civ. Code, § 2237. Under the foregoing sections of the Civil Code, it seems clear that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the profits made by defendant through the sale of plaintiff's property.

The judgment is for $1,573.37, defendant's share of the net proceeds of the North Dakota land, with interest thereon from the 20th day of October, 1917, the date of the sale of plaintiff's land. Since plaintiff is suing for the profits made by the defendant, and it cannot be said that defendant received such profits until May 1, 1918, when they came into the hands of his trustee, Herbert, interest should be computed from the latter date. It may be that the North Dakota land increased in value between October 20, 1917, and May 1, 1918, and it would not be equitable to give the plaintiff the benefit of such increase in value and also interest from the earlier date. If the judgment were based on the value of such land on the 20th day of October, 1917, rather than its selling price May 1, 1918, then interest might properly be computed from the former date. It is to be presumed that the judgment rendered in the suit of Yarbrough v. Herbert awarded the former interest from May 1, 1918, and, therefore, in allowing the plaintiff interest from the same date, the defendant will be required to pay plaintiff the exact amount which he has recovered from Herbert.

[4-6] Appellant contends that the court erred in finding that the plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the statute of limitations, which the defendant set up as a separate defense. This contention must be sustained. The only testimony introduced to support such finding is that of plaintiff to the effect that he did not discover the fact that defendant had received an interest in the North Dakota land until the latter part of the year 1919. But defendant's fraud did not consist in the receipt of that property, but in the false and fraudulent representations which induced the plaintiff to agree to the terms of the sale of his land. There is no evidence as to when plaintiff discovered such fraud, except that he had no knowledge thereof prior to his conveyance to Herbert. "An action for relief on the ground of fraud" must be commenced within three years after "the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud." Code Civ. Proc. § 338. This action was commenced September 1, 1921, more than three years after the transaction induced by the fraud. The burden was on plaintiff to show that he first discovered the fraud within three years prior to the commencement of the action. Prewett v. Dyer, 107 Cal. 154, 40 Pac. 105. This he has failed to do. The complaint was defective. "Where an action for relief on the ground of fraud is brought after the expiration of the statutory period of three years, the complaint must show (1) when the fraud was discovered, which, of course, must be within the three-year period;

(2) why it was not discovered sooner; and (3) the circumstances under which it was discovered." Victor Oil Co. v. Drum, 184 Cal. 226, 241, 193 Pac. 243, 249. While it may be argued that the findings cure the defect in the complaint, such result cannot follow where there is no evidence to support the findings.

Some contention is made to the effect that a double judgment was rendered, and the judgment is somewhat ambiguous in this regard; but the error will doubtless not be repeated on the retrial of the case.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to grant the plaintiff a reasonable time within which to amend his complaint.

LEVY v. LARSON. (Civ. 4405.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 24, 1923. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1923.)

1. Sales ⚷14—Seller in selling for future delivery held within rights in "shorting" market.

One entering into a contract to sell certain grain bags and twine, which were to be delivered on demand of the purchaser during the following season, held within his rights in "shorting" the market so that the contract was not invalidated because the goods sold were not in the seller's possession.

2. Compromise and settlement ⚷8(3)—False representations by seller that goods were ready for delivery, held not fraud defeating agreement.

Where one having contract for the purchase of certain grain bags and twine during a certain year after failure of his crop and representations by the seller that the goods were ready for delivery, entered into an agreement, whereby he gave his note for the difference between contract price and market price at the time of delivery, held, that, though the representations by the seller that he had the goods on hand were false, and no actual damages were sustained within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 331, such representations did not amount to a fraud which would defeat liability on the note given in compromise and settlement; the seller being entitled to the profits which he derived from the transaction.

3. Sales ⚷153—Tender by seller held not necessary in order to put buyer in default for nonacceptance.

Where, after the purchase of grain bags and twine to be delivered the following year, the buyer's crop for that year fails and he notifies the seller that he cannot accept delivery, it is not necessary, in order to put him in default for failing to accept such goods, that actual tender be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Louis L. Levy against E. Larson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter E. Drobisch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Milton Marks, of San Francisco, for respondent.

TYLER, P. J. The complaint herein is based upon a promissory note in the sum of $3,066.43. The answer denies the execution of the note, except under circumstances which are alleged in a special defense, and which it is claimed constitute fraud and misrepresentation in the procurement of the instrument sued upon.
